He was scheduled later Wednesday to have dinner with Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and talk with Foreign Minister Taro Aso before departing early Thursday. Earlier in the day, he met with Emperor Akihito and Empress Michiko.

Also Wednesday, Cheney and Tokyo's top government spokesman, Yasuhisa Shiozaki, reiterated their countries' intentions to collaborate closely on missile defense and the realignment of U.S. troops stationed in Japan.

The U.S. has about 50,000 troops stationed throughout Japan under a mutual security pact that dates back to the 1960s. Tokyo and Washington have been reworking that alliance to make the presence more effective. They are also developing a joint missile defense shield.

Japan and the United States are also seeking to coordinate their stance on North Korea, which has rattled the region with its nuclear ambitions — and its first atomic bomb test in October — but earlier this month agreed to shut down its main nuclear reactor in exchange for energy aid and other incentives.

Despite the breakthrough, Japan has declined to contribute aid to the North until the issue of past abductions of its citizens is resolved. North Korea has admitted kidnapping Japanese in the late 1970s and '80s, but Japan believes it has not provided a full accounting of the victims.

DOJ_NMG_0134533

Abe said he planned to explain his government's position to Cheney, and said "the U.S. has already expressed its understanding on this issue."

Cheney was to meet the parents of one of the abductees before flying on to the U.S. Pacific island of Guam and to Australia, his final stop.

Vulnerable House Republicans Risk Ties To Bush On War Vote (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Three months ago, the unpopularity of President Bush and the Iraq war led many House Republicans to the closest reelection bids of their careers. Now, most of those with freshly painted targets on their backs have given Democrats an early vote to tie them to Bush and the war.

While Senate Republican defections on the non-binding anti-troop increase resolution last week tilted heavily toward those with tough reelection bids in 2008, the few House GOP crossovers came overwhelmingly from safe incumbents. Nearly all of those who narrowly survived in 2006 voted with Bush, possibly providing future opponents with campaign fodder.

Although many of these vulnerable Republicans expressed skepticism or opposition to the troop increase, they toed the party line and opposed the resolution, apparently in hopes that Democrats will overreach in future showdowns over Iraq, such as de-funding the war effort.

In all, 17 of 201 House Republicans voted with Democrats on the resolution. Only one of them, Rep. James Walsh (R-N.Y.), was among the approximately 20 House Republicans who won in 2006 by less than 5 percent — a threshold that Democrats have set for identifying potential 2008 targets.

The 17-vote defection was also smaller than expected. Predictions were as high as between 30 and 60 GOP votes for the measure, a purely symbolic resolution that many saw as an opportunity for Republicans to separate themselves from Bush on the record.

Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), for example, previously said that Bush's proposed troop increase would be a "huge mistake" if the Iraqis don't step up. But he struck a different tone during the House debate, when he criticized the resolution for failing to offer an alternative course in Iraq.

Shays beat back an anti-war challenger by 3 percent in November, while he watched his two Connecticut Republican colleagues fall.

"Two years ago, I believed this strategy had a better than even chance to work," Shays said last week. "Today it is less likely to succeed, but it is still the best opportunity we have."

Rep. Mike Ferguson (R-N.J.), who initially said he needed to be convinced that the increase was the correct choice, signaled that he had indeed come around.

The increase is "the best hope we have for the lasting success of the U.S. mission and for the future stability of Iraq's government," said Ferguson, who took less than 50 percent of the vote and won by less than 2 percent. "It may also be, I believe, our last chance for victory."

Offering similar sentiments were Republicans such as Reps. Charlie Dent (Pa.) and Mark Souder (Ind.), who each won by less than 10 percent, and Rep. Vern Buchanan (Fla.), a freshman whose race is still being contested. Souder railed against the war and said he disagrees with Bush, but voted against the resolution, saying "the battle has already begun."

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), has indicated that he sees the Iraq issue retaining its political legs through the 2008 election. Before the vote, he accused Republicans who sided with Bush of being "rubber stamps" — an enduring slogan from 2006.

DCCC spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said the Bush-Iraq ties were particularly effective in races in the Northeast and Midwest, and cited polls showing that a clear majority of Americans oppose the troop increase.

The vote "just drives home the point that these members are tied to President Bush's failed Iraq strategy," Crider said.

Narrowly reelected Republicans could mistakenly conclude that if the issues of Bush and Iraq didn't bring them down in 2006, the same will hold in 2008, said Amy Walter, house editor of the Cook Political Report.

DOJ_NMG_0134534

She noted that the casualties of 2006 in fact included centrist House Republicans and Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), who voted against the Iraq war.

"Voting record alone won't help in a bad political environment," Walter said. "But what you can hope for is that the other side overplays and overreaches."

Many Republicans didn't discuss the merits of the troop increase in detail during the debate, instead describing the vote as a political ploy and the first step on a slippery slope toward de-funding the war and hurting the troops.

Those voting with the president also included Reps. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), who won by 3 percent; Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.), who won by 3 percent; Jon Porter (R-Nev.), who won by 2 percent; Heather Wilson (R-N.M), who won by 1 percent; and New York Republicans Tom Reynolds and Randy Kuhl, who each won by about 3 percent.

Among the potential targets who voted for the resolution, Reps. Ric Keller (R-Fla.) and Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) each won by 7 percent.

Kirk comes from a district that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) won in 2004, as does crossover Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.). Democrats have also suggested a presidential bump could help them oust incumbents like Castle, even though he wasn't in any danger in 2006.

Conversely, of the seven GOP senators who voted Saturday to bring the Iraq resolution to a vote, five face reelection bids in 2008, including three of the most vulnerable: Norm Coleman (Minn.), Susan Collins (Maine) and Gordon Smith (Ore.).

Smith drew heat from Democrats for previously voting against cloture, and Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) remains under fire for opposing it.

War Debate Fuels Advocacy Groups (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Grass-roots organizing on both sides of the war issue has been galvanized by debate and anti-war resolutions in the Democrat-controlled Congress, and it appears the advocacy will grow more intense.

Anti-war groups are following members of Congress home during their week off, while groups who support the war are targeting those they call "white flag Republicans" for defeat in the 2008 elections.

The anti-war movement has "very high expectations for this Congress," said former Rep. Tom Andrews, Maine Democrat and national director of Win Without War.

"For the first time, there's a hope for a check and a balance on the administration," Mr. Andrews said. "Instead of banging your head against a wall, there's a chance that you might actually make some progress."

Win Without War is part of the Americans Against Escalation in Iraq coalition, which also includes MoveOn.org and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU). The groups are lobbying members of Congress while they are in their home districts this week.

The anti-war coalition has created a list of public events for senators and representatives who support the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Mr. Andrews' group is urging anti-war activists across the country to attend these events and persuade their members of Congress to stop supporting the surge.

Tomorrow, MoveOn will deliver letters to congressional offices, urging Congress to use its "power of the purse" to stop the surge by constraining or cutting off funding.

"They're home for recess, and this is our best opportunity to influence what they do when they return to Washington. They need to know that we're not going to rest until they start bringing our troops home," said an e-mail to MoveOn supporters.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, has outlined a strategy to limit President Bush's use of war funds that have been requested in a supplemental appropriation to be reviewed next month.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, support Mr. Murtha's plan, and they say it is not the equivalent of cutting off funding for troops in harm's way.

Republicans say that constraining funding has "exactly the same effect as cutting off funding."

DOJ_NMG_0134535

"If you have people ... who need reinforcements desperately and they have to have those reinforcements within a matter of hours, and the reinforcements can't go because the Democrats have put down metrics that say it's unlawful for this Marine machine gunner to leave Camp Pendleton because he hasn't done his requisite 14 months in the States before he goes overseas, you've had exactly the same effect," said Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Meanwhile, a grass-roots conservative group, called the Victory Caucus, is targeting the 17 congressmen and seven senators whom they have labeled "white flag Republicans."

The 17 congressmen Friday voted with the Democrat-led resolution opposing the president's surge plan. The seven senators voted Saturday to shut out Republican amendments to an anti-surge resolution.

The Victory Caucus, led by conservative radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt, is now looking for Republican primary candidates to challenge these legislators.

The Woman In The Middle (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin And Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

The Democratic majority was only three weeks old, but by Jan. 26, the grass-roots and Net-roots activists of the party's left wing had already settled on their new enemy: Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), the outspoken chair of the centrist New Democrat Coalition.

Progressive blogs -- including two new ones, Ellen Tauscher Weekly and Dump Ellen Tauscher -- were bashing her as a traitor to her party. A new liberal political action committee had just named her its "Worst Offender." And in Tauscher's East Bay district office that day in January, eight MoveOn.org activists were accusing her of helping President Bush send more troops to Iraq.

Helping? Jennifer Barton, the lawmaker's district director, played them a DVD of Tauscher blasting the increase as an awful idea in a floor speech eight days earlier.

"The words are fine and good, but we are looking for leadership," scoffed Susan Schaller, one of the activists.

Leadership? Barton showed them the eight golden shovels Tauscher had received for bringing transportation projects to her suburban district, along with numerous awards she had won for her work protecting children, wetlands, affordable housing and abortion rights.

"That's fine and good," Schaller repeated, "but this is about Iraq."

The anti-Tauscher backlash illustrates how the Democratic takeover has energized and emboldened the party's liberal base, ratcheting up the pressure on the party's moderates. That pressure is also reaching House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), a San Francisco liberal who recognizes that moderate voters helped sweep Democrats into the majority. Pelosi has clashed with Tauscher in the past, but she's now eager to hold together her diverse caucus and to avoid the mistakes of GOP leaders who routinely ignored their moderates.

So far, Pelosi and her leadership team seem determined to protect Tauscher and her 60 New Democrats -- up from 47 before the election. In fact, the day after Working for Us, the new progressive political action committee, targeted Tauscher, Pelosi sought her out at a caucus meeting and assured her: "I'm not going to let this happen." House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) spent 20 minutes complaining to Working for Us founder Steve Rosenthal, who swiftly removed the hit list of "Worst Offenders" from the group's Web site.

Said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly: "We want to protect our incumbents. That's what we're about."

Democratic leaders want their activists to focus on beating Republicans. But the grass roots and Net roots believe the political tide is shifting their way, and they can provide the money, ground troops and buzz to challenge Democratic incumbents they don't like. MoveOn.org had two Bay Area chapters before the election; now it has 15, and they could all go to work against Tauscher in a primary. "Absolutely, we could take her out," said Markos Moulitsas ZÃºniga -- better known as Kos -- the Bay Area blogger behind the influential Daily Kos site.

DOJ_NMG_0134536

Tauscher was reelected with 68 percent of the vote, but she said she takes this threat seriously; she has already used it in fundraising appeals. And though she has always highlighted her independence -- shortly before the election, she warned Democrats not to "go off the left cliff" -- she's now emphasizing her party loyalty.

She was once the only California Democrat to oppose Pelosi's campaign for leadership, but she now marvels that the speaker's performance has been "absolutely perfect -- and she looks so beautiful doing it!" Tauscher's Web site no longer features photos of her with Bush or Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), who lost a Democratic primary of his own last year but won reelection as an independent.

Those photos survived in Google's cache; bloggers have dubbed one shot that appears to show Bush's hand on Tauscher's thigh "The Caress," an allusion to "The Kiss" -- video and photos showing Bush embracing Lieberman after the 2005 State of the Union address -- which dogged the senator in his fight against insurgent Ned Lamont. Tauscher donated and has helped raise a total of $2 million for Democrats over the past decade, and since 2003 she has voted with her party more than 90 percent of the time. This year, she has marched in lock step with Pelosi. But to Net-roots sites such as Daily Kos, Firedoglake, and Crooks and Liars, she's Lieberman in a pantsuit.

"I don't think it's a fair comparison," Tauscher said. "My colleagues look at this and say, 'If they're going after Ellen Tauscher, holy moly!' "'A Vicious Fight'

Why are they going after Ellen Tauscher?

She has annoyed the left by supporting legislation to scale back the estate tax, tighten bankruptcy rules and promote free-trade agreements. She served as vice chair of the pro-business Democratic Leadership Council, which many liberal activists dismiss as a quasi-Republican K Street front group. And she voted to authorize the Iraq war, although she did so with caveats, and she was quick to express her displeasure with its execution.

But liberal groups such as the Children's Defense Fund and the League of Conservation Voters give Tauscher impeccable report cards, while the National Rifle Association gives her straight F's.

"It's not just about her voting record," said Bob Brigham of San Francisco, an activist who recently started the Ellen Tauscher Weekly.

The latest blog wars began simmering in December after Tauscher led a New Democrat delegation to meet with Bush about bipartisan cooperation, irritating the Net roots. They boiled after her former chief of staff, Katie Merrill, posted a scathing piece on a California Web site attacking the Net roots for attacking Tauscher. Outraged activists immediately began mobilizing for a fight in 2008. "I didn't even know who Tauscher was 5 mins ago, but now I support a primary challenge against her," one typical commenter replied.

Brigham says it's never wise to tell the Net roots not to do something: "That's the worst move you can possibly make." But the anti-Tauscher backlash isn't just about pique, either. It's also partly about her district. And it's partly about her.

Tauscher grew up in working-class New Jersey, the daughter of a secretary and a shop steward for the meatpackers union. She was the first member of her family to attend college and, by 25, the youngest woman to hold a seat on the New York Stock Exchange. After 14 years on Wall Street, she married a technology executive (they're now divorced) and moved to California, where she became a Democratic fundraiser.

In 1996, Tauscher ran for Congress as a pro-business, pro-environment, pro-military centrist against Bill Baker, a conservative Republican she portrayed as too far right for his suburban swing district. Pelosi supported her, and she won. But when Pelosi ran for whip, Tauscher supported moderate Hoyer, a close friend. And later in 2001, Tauscher accused Pelosi and her allies in the California Senate of redrawing her congressional district as payback. The new district was much more Democratic, which made it a safer seat for the party, but not necessarily for Tauscher -- unless she followed Pelosi's lead.

That's why Kos has promised "a vicious fight for her seat." He's often portrayed as a raving ideologue, but he's really a savvy strategist; he has no problem supporting conservative Democrats in conservative districts, such as new Rep. Heath Shuler (N.C.). But he sees no need to tolerate a DLC type in Tauscher's district, where Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) received 58 percent of the presidential vote in 2004. And he said that primaries are the only way to force incumbents with safe seats to pay attention to constituents.

"We're creating real democracy," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134537

Kos and MoveOn.org founder Eli Pariser serve on the board of They Work for Us -- an issue advocacy group affiliated with Working for Us -- which also plans to focus on Democrats more conservative than their districts.

"We're not going to the Heath Shulers of the world and saying, 'We want you to be more like Barney Frank,' " Rosenthal said, referring to the liberal congressman.

But Tauscher's district is not Pelosi's San Francisco or Kos's Berkeley. It's connected to Berkeley by tunnel, but as Tauscher likes to say, everything changes when you drive through that tunnel, even the microclimate. "Suddenly it's 25 degrees warmer, there's not a cloud in the sky and you know you're in Tauscher territory," she said.

Tauscher territory is mostly soccer moms, software executives and Restoration Hardware stores. It also includes the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, Travis Air Force Base and several farm towns. "Ellen's a perfect fit for that district," said Audrey Gordon, a local Democratic fundraiser. "We've got a lot of tough seats to defend this year; why on Earth would Democrats want to attack Ellen?"

Tauscher's liberal critics say she has undermined the party during the Bush years, making a fetish of bipartisanship at a time when Republicans had no interest in real compromise, demonizing the far left at a time when Democrats needed to unify against the far right. And they're still seething about her "left cliff" quote, which echoed GOP talking points before Election Day.

"She reinforces the idea that lefties are out-of-control children," said Brian Leubitz, who runs a liberal California blog called Calitics. "She provides cover for Republican extremists."

Tauscher says it's obvious that Democrats will alienate independent voters if they tack to the hard left and she won't apologize for stating the obvious. "The speaker has been indefatigable about saying she's going to govern from the center," she said. "I guess if you're looking to be offended, that's what's going to offend you."

Her rhetoric infuriates activists, who still quote her statements that she never met a trade deal she didn't like, even though she later voted against one, and that she slept fine after her 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq war, even though she now opposes it. She supports same-sex marriage, but she's not an activist's idea of a Bay Area politician: too Wall Street, too establishment, too comfortable with the Chamber of Commerce.

"You can sense her contempt for the grass roots," Leubitz said. "She really doesn't represent her district."Doing It Her Way

How does Tauscher represent her district?

On a typical day this month, she started with a three-hour Transportation and Infrastructure Committee markup. California faces a water crisis, and Tauscher had two water bills on the agenda that she had pushed for years. She made a point of allowing freshman Rep. Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.) to share credit on one bill; she had supported his centrist opponent in his primary, to the disgust of the Net roots, but now she was trying to help him keep his seat.

She then raced to catch the last minutes of an Armed Services Committee hearing, just in time to question Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. As five women from the antiwar group Code Pink stood in protest, Tauscher asked two quick questions: Why didn't Bush's budget increase production of the C-17, a plane based at Travis? And how much would the president's troop increase cost?

Pace called the C-17 a "great aircraft" and hinted that he wouldn't be too upset if Tauscher, who chairs the subcommittee on strategic forces, stuck a few more into the budget, as she did last year. Gates then revealed the price of the troop increase: $5.6 billion.

"It's amazing how you can walk right in after doing something else for three hours and get them to answer the question nobody had asked," Tauscher said.

But Code Pink activist Zanne Joi, whose shirt read "Stop Funding, Start Impeaching," was not impressed. She said she was horrified that Tauscher hadn't challenged Gates about Iraq, that she had treated the increase as a done deal. "We need her to stand up and end this war," said Joi. She and her Code Pink colleagues recently told Tauscher that if she wouldn't support a bill calling for total withdrawal from Iraq within six months, they'd occupy one of her district offices.

Tauscher rolls her eyes at this kind of talk. She said she doesn't trust anything the Bush administration says, but it's the administration in power. "I want to represent my constituents, so I have to work with this president," she said. "I'm a pragmatic person. I don't have the luxury of saying, 'I'll come back in January 2009 and try to get some work done.' "

DOJ_NMG_0134538

Tauscher spent the rest of her day dealing with local issues. She talked immigration with the California Farm Bureau; she strategized about a contract to run Livermore with the University of California; she discussed a traffic plan for Alameda County with a group of public officials. A lawyer named John Gibson stopped by to thank Tauscher for telling his mother nice things about him at a recent event, shortly before his mother died. "I went out on a high note with my mother," he said.

To Tauscher, this is what it means to be a representative. "I bring people together. I get things done," she said. "And I get things done the way the speaker wants."Appeasing the Left

On Feb. 2, when the House Democrats held their annual retreat in Williamsburg, Gerald W. McEntee, president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, made it clear that Working for Us didn't work for him.

"Our majority can disappear in a wisp," he told the members. "I'm the sheriff of the incumbent-protection program, and if you need help, let me know. In Blue America, there's no room for PACs to chase vulnerable members they have differences with."

From the crowd, a voice squealed: "Woo hoo!"

It was Tauscher.

Working for Us was created in January by a coalition of bloggers, trial lawyers and labor leaders, the trifecta of Democratic interest groups. But once the group took aim at Tauscher, the trial lawyers quietly withdrew. And Tauscher soon met for a glass of wine with Andy Stern, the feisty liberal who runs the Service Employees International Union; he assured her of his union's support, even though it had helped launch the political action committee. For 12 years, Republicans ran the House according to the "majority of the majority," which meant that the conservative majority within the GOP caucus ruled. Pelosi is trying to run her House according to a consensus of the majority, avoiding legislation that does not have broad Democratic support. She hasn't forced members in swing districts to take tough votes on same-sex marriage, gun control or trade. She is focused on the minimum wage, ethics reform and other issues that can bring together Tauscher and MoveOn.org.

"Having served in the majority and the minority, I can tell you, the majority is better," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), another moderate who has sparred with Pelosi in the past. "It will take a big tent to keep it."

But Kos points to Harman as a perfect example of how the Net roots can keep Democrats in line. He said Harman used to be a constant irritant, a go-to quote for reporters looking for a Democrat to tweak liberals -- until she had to fight off a primary challenge from the left in 2006. "She's been great ever since," he said. Now Harman even writes on the liberal Huffington Post blog.

Kos can imagine a day when Tauscher still holds her seat but is no longer distasteful to the left. "That's what victory would look like -- a more responsive representative," he said. So when Tauscher praises Pelosi as "perfect on substance, perfect on optics," it's hard to know if that's a result of personal evolution, political trends, or blogospheric pressure, but it's music to Kos's ears. It's helpful to Democratic leaders, too.

Said Rosenthal, the Working for Us founder: "We want them to understand what we're doing helps and enhances the majority."

But Pelosi still faces two potential dangers.

She could work so hard to appease the moderates that she alienates her base. In fact, the left blogosphere is already grumbling that Democrats aren't doing enough to stop the war. And there's always the left cliff. Those moderate first-termers could be one-termers if Pelosi overplays her hand.

"Nancy knows our majority is fragile in its newness," Tauscher said. "If you keep our most endangered species in your frontal lobe, you know what you have to produce."

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Many House Members Cite, But Don't Read, Full NIE Iraq Report (HILL)

By Mike Soraghan

The Hill, February 21, 2007

During last week's war debate, House members repeatedly cited the new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. Judging from the debate, it supported both sides.

DOJ_NMG_0134539

Democratic Rep. David Wu (Ore.) warned that "[t]he fact that we are in a civil war is backed up by our own National Intelligence Estimate."

But Republican Jeb Hensarling (Texas) said the report shows that the U.S. troop presence in Iraq is preventing attacks within the United States.

"If we leave Iraq before subduing [the enemy], he will follow us to America, make no mistake about it ... Read the National Intelligence Estimate," Hensarling said.

But it seems very few, if any, House members read the full, classified version of the report. That 90-page tome is now available to all representatives, thanks to a surprise decision by the House Intelligence Committee a week before the debate.

A sampling by The Hill could not find a single House member who had trekked to the committee's secure office in the Capitol to view the classified version of the document. When asked, many said that they had read only the three-and-a-half-page declassified summary of "key judgments" that the office of the director of national intelligence released earlier this month.

The Hill's query of members was unscientific and non-comprehensive, so it asked Kira Maas, spokeswoman to House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas), which members had dropped by the secure office to read the full report.

"I'm not sure, given the classified nature of the information, if that's something that's public," Maas said. She promised to check again with the committee, but she didn't call back over the course of the week. The Hill repeatedly left messages asking whether the problem was not the sensitive nature of the information but embarrassment that no one had bothered to read it.

Like most members, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he had read the unclassified summary available to the public, but not the full, classified report.

"That's just more detail," Hoyer said. "I think it has more specifics, but its conclusions aren't that different than the public version."

When the committee decided to let members review the classified version, it required them to take a secrecy oath before viewing the report in the committee's secure office in the Capitol. They are not to be allowed to leave with notes.

Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) also noted the NIE's conclusions about civil war on the floor of the House. But she said she drew her knowledge of the text from media reports. She said it was only one part of her decision-making on the Iraq resolution.

"The NIE adds to the weight of the evidence that we shouldn't escalate this," DeGette said.

Leading war critic John Murtha (D-Pa.) was dismissive of the classified NIE, but noted that he constantly reviews intelligence reports.

"I don't think there's anything in there I haven't seen in the press," Murtha said. "The best intelligence I get is in the field."

Rep. Greg Walden (R-Ore.) said he plans to read the full NIE, although he didn't do so in time for the debate. He said it's difficult to carve out the time to make a special trip to the Intelligence Committee office.

"You've got to go sit up there," Walden said. "The last time, there wasn't much more in the long version than there was in the summary."

A Peaceful Death, Then The Blast (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

Unlike so many deaths in this city these days, the passing of Ahmed Lami was remarkable not for its violent end, but for its lack of bloodshed: He died of natural causes at 65.

But even peaceful death has become a magnet for violence. As his Shiite Muslim family and friends gathered to mourn his passing Tuesday afternoon under a tent in a middle-class, religiously mixed neighborhood on Palestine Street, a suicide bomber walked in, sat down and detonated his explosives, killing at least seven people and injuring 21.

The funeral blast was among several car bombings, shootings and explosions around Iraq on Tuesday that suggested insurgents were finding new ways to evade the ongoing security crackdown by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

At least six people were killed in what authorities described as a crude attempt to detonate a chemical weapon in Taji, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad. Insurgents blew up a truck holding two tanks of chlorine gas, which were thrown clear of the vehicle and leaked, the U.S. military said. Scores of people suffered nausea, vomiting and irritated eyes from exposure to the gas, according to wire service reports. Prolonged exposure to high concentrations of the gas can cause deadly respiratory damage.

DOJ_NMG_0134540

The U.S. military said a Marine died Tuesday during combat in Al Anbar province, in western Iraq. The death brought to 3,147 the number of U.S. military personnel killed in the Iraq theater since the March 2003 American-led invasion, according to the website icasualties.org.

At the Lami funeral, attendance was smaller than usual for such public events, because fear of death grips the capital. Lami's family even took precautions to guard against a car bomb attack, blocking entrances to the tent with a minibus and palm trunks.

But the suicide bomber took advantage of common courtesies extended to those attending such ceremonies, where food is served and strangers are welcome to partake.

"The suicide bomber came in and greeted us and sat down," said Lami's cousin, Sabur Abdul-Hussein, who suffered slight shrapnel wounds in the blast. "We thought he was poor, waiting for the feast to be served. We asked each other if someone might know him." After two minutes, Abdul-Hussein said, the stranger blew himself up.

Abdul-Hussein said his family had begun to feel safer when the new security plan was announced but now thought the city was gripped by violence that would not let go. Those killed in the funeral bombing were two of Abdul-Hussein's brothers and five of his cousins.

"The scene was chaos — women came out from the deceased's house and started wailing and beating their chests," he said. "And there were my relatives' bodies, scattered and torn to pieces."

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, a bomb Monday evening caused severe damage to a provincial office of the Iraqi National Accord, the party of former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who returned to Iraq last week in a bid to unify the nation's political factions. Allawi, a onetime protege of Western intelligence agencies, had been living in London and Amman, Jordan, after his party fared poorly in 2005 parliamentary elections.

Police also found 25 corpses dumped around Baghdad. A source in the Interior Ministry said the bodies, all with gunshot wounds, bore no markings of torture, as they often have in the past.

The U.S. military on Tuesday also updated the number of American military personnel wounded in Monday's attack on a U.S. base in Tarmiya, about 25 miles north of Baghdad, from 17 to 29.

*

christian.berthelsen@latimes.com

Special correspondents in Baghdad, Najaf and Taji contributed to this report.

Copter Attacks In Iraq May Indicate New Battle Strategy (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

The Army's senior aviation officer in Iraq said yesterday that Sunni fighters probably used a sophisticated SA-14 or SA-16 shoulder-fired missile to shoot down a Marine helicopter on Feb. 7, killing all seven people on board.

If confirmed by an ongoing Marine Corps investigation, it would mark the first time since last summer that insurgents in Iraq struck U.S. aircraft with such an anti-aircraft missile, and it would provide fresh evidence of a new strategy of targeting helicopters, according to Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, deputy U.S. commander in Iraq.

Simmons said that, upon reviewing a videotape of the attack on the Marine Corps CH-46 Sea Knight transport helicopter, it appeared that the missile used was not the Vietnam-era SA-7, which insurgents and militias are known to have, but more likely an SA-14 or SA-16. Those pose a bigger threat because they have greater range, size and ability to overcome aircraft defensive systems. The helicopter's defensive system did not appear to deploy properly, the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James T. Conway, testified before the Senate last week.

The Russian-manufactured SA-14 or SA-16 probably would have been brought into the country from abroad relatively recently, Simmons said in an interview.

DOJ_NMG_0134541

The attack in Anbar province was the latest in a string of seven U.S. military and civilian helicopter downings in Iraq since last month. U.S. commanders say that Sunni and Shiite extremist groups have begun to use deadly strikes in a new and carefully planned effort to rally support for their causes.

"The extremists on both ends of the spectrum, Sunni and Shia, recognized that whenever you have an aircraft shot down that belongs to the U.S. government, that is a spectacular international press event" and sends the message that "they are a capable adversary," Simmons said.

The strategy of stepping up the targeting of U.S. helicopters, revealed in recently captured insurgent documents, was devised specifically to counter the U.S. and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad, he said.

In addition to confronting missiles, the U.S. military is seeing an intensification of ground fire from automatic weapons against its helicopters. On Monday, for example, three U.S. military helicopters were struck by ground fire as they helped repel an unusually bold insurgent attack on an American outpost in the town of Tarmiyah, north of Baghdad. The pilots were able to fly the helicopters back to their bases, where the aircraft are undergoing repair.

Army and Marine Corps helicopters in Iraq carry out hundreds of missions each day. On average, they are shot at about 100 times a month, with 17 of them hit.

Simmons said some recent attacks exhibited unusual coordination, planning and patience. These include a Jan. 20 assault, when an Army Black Hawk helicopter was shot down northeast of Baghdad, killing 12, and one on Feb. 2, when an Apache attack helicopter was downed north of the capital, killing its crew of two.

In both cases, Simmons said, insurgents in heavily Sunni regions used multiple weapons systems, including heavy machine guns, "clearly emplaced to attack the aircraft" from several different directions. It was the first time in months that such a concerted effort had been made using multiple weapons systems to attack aircraft, he said.

Insurgents apparently readied for the attacks by watching U.S. flight patterns over several days.

"These are patient fighters," Simmons said, adding he believes the attacks were linked and involved fighters from the same Sunni extremist group.

All of the recent helicopter downings occurred during daylight hours. The U.S. military flies extensively at night, but it cannot limit operations to nighttime.

Instead, Simmons said the military is responding by giving pilots detailed updates on threats and terrain, directing them to the least risky routes, and then allowing them to modify their altitude, speed and course to evade attack.

Meanwhile, U.S. forces are aggressively going after groups believed to be responsible for the recent helicopter downings, Simmons said. "We're not being passive about this."

Joint Force Weighs Move On Sadr City (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

U.S. and Iraqi forces have moved aggressively in the last week to combat Sunni Arab insurgents in neighborhoods across the capital and to establish a stronger presence in religiously mixed districts long plagued by sectarian violence.

But as the new security crackdown enters a second week, they face their most sensitive challenge: whether, when and how to move into the Shiite-dominated slum of Sadr City, stronghold of the Al Mahdi militia.

Political pressure has mounted to crack down on the Baghdad neighborhood that harbors the militia loyal to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. Sunni Arabs, who make up the backbone of the insurgency, have long accused Shiite Prime Minister Nouri Maliki of allowing Sadr City to remain a haven for the militia to keep the support of Sadr's followers.

"We think that much of the … violence that comes as a result of operations emanating from Sadr City will be remarkably diminished if they crack down," said Ammar Wajuih, a leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's main Sunni political organization.

U.S. and Iraqi military commanders setting out the next steps of the Baghdad security plan are concerned about stirring up a hornet's nest in a neighborhood of more than 2 million Shiites.

They worry that by moving too aggressively they could sabotage one of the few success stories in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0134542

The teeming streets of Sadr City are thriving while the rest of the violence-racked capital wilts. The district pulses with commerce and youth, even as huge stretches of Baghdad fade into ghost towns.

Sadr City may shelter troublemakers, but they're lying low for the most part now. Moreover, Sadr's deputies have endorsed the security crackdown.

Even amid the bloodshed across Baghdad, customers fill Sadr City's shops. Workers repair its streets and sewage lines. Children play soccer on its dusty fields and walk to school along newly prettified squares, verdant emblems of progress in a quarter long one of Iraq's most deprived.

"Sadr City has always been safe, with the exception of the suicide and roadside bomb attacks," said Talib Saad, a barber along the district's main thoroughfare.

U.S. troops took heavy casualties when they tried to storm Sadr City in the spring and summer of 2004. For the Americans, the grueling street fights with black-clad teens holding AK-47s while running down the streets represented a nadir few want to relive.

Rather than crush the Al Mahdi, the U.S. wound up bolstering Sadr's street credibility and undermining the popularity of then-Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who was pro-American.

Any new move into Sadr City remains controversial among military experts. Army Gen. Jack Keane, a former vice chief of staff, and military analyst Frederick Kagan, who were among the most influential advocates of the current Bush administration plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 21,500, have warned that a push into Sadr City would unnecessarily unite the country's now-splintered Shiite leadership.

"Attempting to clear Sadr City would almost certainly force the [Al Mahdi militia] into [a direct] confrontation with American troops," they wrote in a January report for the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank.

"It would also do enormous damage to [Maliki's] political base and would probably lead to the collapse of the Iraqi government."

But now at least one of the authors questions that view. In an interview Tuesday, Kagan adjusted his position and said some early signs of success, including Sadr's recent disappearance from public view and successful sweeps of other heavily Shiite neighborhoods nearby, suggest that U.S. forces could move into Sadr City earlier than Keane and Kagan had advocated.

"It appears that I overestimated the Sadrists and underestimated Maliki," Kagan said. "Our troops have operated in these neighborhoods and these neighborhoods are not resisting."

U.S. officials in Iraq have taken pains not to depict Sadr City as a singular source of trouble.

"Our intent is for people to recognize that we view it as any other place," said Army Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, a battalion commander with the 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat Team, which has been sweeping parts of north and east Baghdad as part of the crackdown that began Feb. 13.

But Sunnis insist on action. After years of watching their communities be targeted aggressively by local security forces and U.S. troops, Sunni leaders and officials insist that the success or failure of the security plan and possible reconciliation between sects hinges on whether Sadr City is treated like the hive of militants they consider it to be.

Beyond Baghdad, Grass-Roots Security (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

IBRAHIM BIN ALI, Iraq -- The mud sucked at the soldiers' boots as they crept across the wet pasture after dawn. To their right, Humvees and tanks tracked the soldiers' progress from a narrow dirt road. To their left and in front stood cinder-block huts, shaded by date palm trees, where they believed the enemy was hiding.

The only sound as they approached the insurgent stronghold was the lowing of piebald cows and the faint gobble of turkeys.

"I'll tell you right now there's a lot of bad guys watching," Sgt. Anthony Palkki said.

The security plan for Baghdad is a fight not only in the teeming streets of the capital but also in places like this, a Sunni-dominated village on the northern outskirts, where U.S. commanders say the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq is terrorizing

DOJ_NMG_0134543

Shiite residents, planning attacks on Americans and funneling explosives into Baghdad along a network of country roads. Hundreds of U.S. soldiers from the 2nd Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment, 1st Cavalry Division pushed into Ibrahim bin Ali village Saturday morning for a two-day operation designed to take back the hamlet from insurgents and catalogue every fighting-age male in the village.

"This is a large part of the Baghdad security plan because this helps disrupt [al-Qaeda in Iraq] movement and foreign fighter movement into Baghdad," said Maj. Chad Shields, a company commander. "It's about getting to the level of detail where you understand the town that you're operating in, and you know the people you're operating among."

Gaining this understanding is one of the most difficult challenges facing U.S. soldiers operating here. Over two days, more than 350 U.S. troops involved in the operation searched 95 homes, discovered about a dozen roadside bombs -- including two that exploded under their tanks, causing no injuries -- and took scattered small-arms fire. But they failed to capture a single insurgent.

Although the security plan has been cast as an Iraqi-led mission, no Iraqi police operate around Ibrahim bin Ali. And Lt. Col. Kurt Pinkerton, the battalion commander, said he could not persuade Iraqi army commandos to assist.

"They didn't return my calls," he said.

So the U.S. troops proceeded alone along muddy canals, over irrigation ditches, amid flocks of sheep. The supporting tanks and Humvees sealed off roads around the village. Soldiers swabbed some residents for traces of explosives, took digital photographs of every male adult and logged Global Positioning System readings to mark the location of each building. Commanders said the census was necessary to learn who might be out of place when they return. But even before the operation, officers warned that insurgents might flee such a large American onslaught, and finding them would be difficult.

"They know we're looking for bad guys, and they know we don't . . . know what the bad guys look like, so we've got to check everybody," Staff Sgt. Patrick O'Neil told other platoon leaders at the pre-mission briefing.

Once in the village, a platoon led by 1st Lt. Chris Larsen, 24, a West Point graduate, encountered several frustrations. Some residents blithely pronounced the area safe, even though guerrillas regularly attack U.S. patrols with roadside bombs, gunfire and rocket-propelled grenades. Others complained about the lack of jobs, electricity and fuel, and said they cower in their homes at the sound of explosions and don't know who is responsible.

"I am not afraid of your visit or of you, the Americans, I'm mostly happy when you come over. I'm afraid of the interaction between you and the terrorists and then firing starts," said one villager, Onaid Merza Alwan. "Or when the terrorists see you in my house and they start to wonder why you are here, maybe I'm giving you information. It's very scary."

"So where are these terrorists that are watching right now?" Larsen asked him.

"If the Americans cannot see them, can I see them?"

"Yeah, he'll know who they are," Larsen told his interpreter. "I don't know who they are. They look exactly the same. The bad guys and the good guys look exactly the same."

Some residents took a more defiant stand when questioned by the platoon.

"Any individual on Earth values his country and refuses occupation. I am hoping this is not an occupation," Hassan Ali Hamid Hassan, 27, a recent graduate in Arabic literature from Baghdad University, told Larsen. "Jihad is a duty. Jihad was within our power since the beginning to protect our women, our property, our way of living. Jihad is cited in the Koran."

"I am not liking this guy right now," Larsen said. Hassan eventually told the soldiers he did not support violence.

On Dec. 30, the battalion uncovered large weapons caches in the area, including a warehouse that contained 3,000 pounds of explosives, car bombs, explosive belts and propane-tank weapons. But Larsen's platoon discovered no illicit weapons on this weekend hunt, or at least no new weapons. One villager kept a forearm-size shell from the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s that he had converted into a flower vase. Behind another house, the soldiers examined 11 Russian ammunition boxes that held spare car parts.

Gunfire broke out once, when a U.S. soldier shot a snarling dog.

"Use rocks from now on, please. Rocks!" Larsen shouted at the soldier. "We're trying not to scare these . . . people. Tell them that we're sorry."

DOJ_NMG_0134544

When the sun set, and the bats began to circle, the platoon moved into an Iraqi home, posted rooftop guards and spent the night on blankets on the concrete floor. Maintaining around-the-clock presence in trouble spots is key to the battalion's plan to disrupt the insurgents. For weeks the soldiers have lived in a series of abandoned houses in the village to send the message that their presence is not temporary. The Baghdad security plan encourages commanders to make such deployments, Pinkerton said.

The plan has "given them the authority, if you would, to go out there and occupy and sit full time," he said.

Without such heightened presence, he said, even armed residents are afraid to confront the insurgents. "I know they have AK-47 weapons in their house. What they'll always tell you is, 'until you're out here full time we can't' " respond, Pinkerton said.

To build a sense of trust, the soldiers in the operation tried to help the villagers. The platoon's medic, Pfc. Bruce Cardenas, 18, sterilized and bandaged one man's festering ankle wound. The soldiers spent part of the second day passing out truckloads of supplies -- rice, flour, blankets, kerosene heaters, stew, diapers -- to the residents. The handouts caused a mob scene, soldiers said.

After the Humvees rolled out Sunday afternoon, the commanders called the operation a success because it laid the groundwork for further counterinsurgency operations, familiarized them with the villagers and likely caused insurgents to flee, at least temporarily. Some of the soldiers on the ground were less sure.

"I think there will always be people who don't want us to be here," said Spec. Logan Gathman, 26, of Sacramento. "And whenever we show up the bad guys leave, anyway."

"I really thought there'd be more going on," Sgt. Josh York said.

Rape Accusation Reinforces Fears In A Divided Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 20 — The most wicked acts are spoken of openly and without reserve in Iraq. Torture, stabbings and bodies ripped to pieces in bombings are all part of the daily conversation.

Rape is different.

Rape is not mentioned by the victims, and rarely by the authorities. And when it is discussed publicly, as in several high-profile cases involving American soldiers and Iraqi women, it is usually left to the relatives of the victim to give the explicit details.

So when a 20-year-old Sunni woman from Baghdad appeared on the satellite television station Al Jazeera on Monday night with a horrific account of kidnapping and sexual assault at the hands of three officers in the Shiite-dominated Iraqi National Police, people across the country were stunned, some disbelieving, others horrified, but all riveted.

Almost immediately, Shiite leaders lined up to condemn the woman, calling her charges propaganda aimed at undermining the new security campaign. Sunni politicians offered the woman their support. Whatever the truth of the accusation, though, it played to sectarian fears on both sides.

For many Shiites, the charges appeared to be an attempt to smear them and attack the Shiite-led government; for Sunnis, the woman's account only highlighted what they already believed to be true — that the Iraqi government cares little for justice and promotes a Shiite agenda.

Bitter exchanges between politicians of various sects were relayed to millions on television, interspersed with clips of the woman telling her story, her face veiled, just the tears in her eyes visible.

The Americans, who have advisers working with the Iraqi National Police, found themselves caught in the middle without answers. The woman said the Americans had rescued her from the officers and gave her medical treatment. The American-backed, Shiite-led government said the Americans would show the woman's claims to be false.

The American military said only that it was investigating the charges.

That was also the first response of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who issued a statement soon after the woman appeared on television on Monday, promising a full investigation and the most severe punishment for anyone involved.

Only hours later, however, Mr. Maliki reversed himself. His office released a second statement after midnight, that one calling the woman a liar and a wanted criminal and going on to praise the officers involved.

DOJ_NMG_0134545

"It has been shown after medical examinations that the woman had not been subjected to any sexual attack whatsoever, and that there are three outstanding arrest warrants against her issued by security agencies," said the second statement. "After the allegations have been proven to be false, the prime minister has ordered that the officers accused be rewarded."

The government did not elaborate on the statement or say why the prime minister had so quickly reversed himself. His office only said that "known parties" had been responsible for the allegations.

But in siding with the security forces, Mr. Maliki threatened to only heighten the tensions surrounding the already highly charged case. His government also released the woman's name, which is not being published by The New York Times.

Sunni politicians rushed to her defense, accusing the government of revealing its true sectarian bias.

The case "should not be dealt with on a sectarian basis," said Saleem Abdullah, a spokesman for the Tawafiq bloc of Sunni parties, which helped the woman come forward. "She is a sister for all Iraqis."

He went on to say the government's handling of the issue could undermine its credibility in directing the security crackdown.

With fears of violence pervasive throughout the country, many Iraqis stay inside their homes whenever they can. Satellite television is their connection to the outside world and, just as often, their own country. On the two most prominent channels, Al Jazeera and Al Arabiya, they would have heard the woman telling her story over and over.

If she made up the story, it was an elaborate piece of propaganda and the contradictory statements by the Iraqi government only added to its power.

The woman was lying on a bed as she was interviewed, a blue blanket pulled up nearly to her chin. She had a light pink scarf covering her hair and a black scarf covering her face.

She said she was taken from her house on Sunday morning by the National Police while her husband was out, something no one disputes. The officers, she said, were looking for weapons but when they arrived at the police garrison, they accused her of cooking for Sunni insurgents.

It was at the garrison that she says the first officer raped her, covering her mouth to muffle her screams. Others were in the room at the time.

"I begged one of them to get me out," she said. "He said, 'No, no. I will after you give me one thing.' " She asked what that was, and he told her he wanted to "get close to me." She said she was led into a small room with a bed and a machine gun against the wall. Another officer came in and told the first man to leave. "Leave her to me," the man said, according to her account.

"I swear on the Koran and the Prophet Muhammad, I am not that kind of woman," she said she told the officer. He repeated her words scornfully and beat her with a black water hose, she said.

"If we want something, we will take; and things we don't want, we will kill," the woman said she was told.

She said that the attack was videotaped and that she was told she would be killed if she told anyone about it.

A nurse who said she treated the woman after the attack said that she saw signs of sexual and physical assault. The woman, according to the nurse, could identify one of her attackers because he was not wearing a mask, as were the others, and could identify a second attacker by a mark on his genitals.

The nurse would speak only on the condition of anonymity because she feared that Shiite militiamen would kill her for speaking out. The nurse said she was also wanted by the authorities, who believed the clinic she works at was used by insurgents.

She said the clinic was simply for Sunnis in the Amil neighborhood who were too afraid to the visit the Shiite-run hospital.

In Amil, which has been almost totally cleared of Sunnis, people were outraged, but not surprised. The woman's charges seemed to confirm their worst fears that the security forces were little better than militias in uniform.

A spokeswoman for the American military here in Baghdad, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, confirmed that the woman had been detained by the Iraqi National Police on Sunday morning, but said that everything that happened after that was under investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0134546

But a senior Iraqi official, speaking only on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to be seen as critical of the Americans, said that he had alerted the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, on the day the woman made her allegations, cautioning him that if the case was not handled delicately, it could further inflame sectarian passions.

A spokesman for Mr. Khalilzad could not be reached.

The sectarian tensions further complicated an already delicate topic in Iraqi society.

The most high-profile rape cases since the American invasion four years ago have involved charges against American soldiers. And even in those cases, it was left to the relatives to speak publicly. Iraqis said they could not remember the case of a rape victim going on television.

Sabah Salem, a professor at the Baghdad University College of Law, said that while men were occasionally charged with rape in Iraq and punished, many cases went unreported.

"Rape cases in Iraq are viewed as a shameful thing to any woman regardless of the fact that she is the victim," he said in an interview.

The charges and countercharges occurred on yet another day of unrelenting violence in the capital, as two car bombs and a suicide bomber, in separate attacks, killed at least 17 people. One of the car bombs exploded in a neighborhood that was visited earlier in the day by Mr. Maliki, on a rare foray outside of the Green Zone.

North of Baghdad, a truck carrying chlorine exploded, killing nine people, The Associated Press reported. More than 150 others were made violently ill by the toxic fumes.

A Rape Case Goes Public, Igniting Political Fray (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 20 -- Most facts surrounding the reported rape that has become Iraq's latest political firestorm remain in dispute. But this much is clear:

Three Iraqi policemen, in the span of a few hours, went from being rape suspects to distinguished officers in the eyes of the Shiite-led government.

A Sunni woman's assertion that the officers sexually assaulted her was taken seriously enough to gain her admittance into a U.S.-run medical facility in the fortified Green Zone.

And the handling of the alleged assault has offered a window into Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's idea of damage control.

The 20-year-old married woman said she was taken to an Iraqi police station Sunday after police officers searched her house and accused her of aiding insurgents. She later graphically described her alleged sexual assault in a televised interview that has made her a fixture on Arab news channels since the story broke Monday.

The woman said neighbors alerted U.S. soldiers that she had been arrested, which led to her release. She was admitted to Ibn Sina Hospital, which is run by the U.S. military. Iraqis treated there are generally admitted at the request of U.S. officials.

"The woman was here," a hospital spokesman, 1st Lt. Justin Kocher, said Tuesday night. "She received the care she needed," he added, declining to elaborate.

Reports of rape are rare in Iraq, as in most of the Middle East. They seldom become newsworthy events. But Maliki injected himself into the case, issuing a news release announcing that the government had convened a committee to investigate and would hold the perpetrators responsible. The initial news release identified the woman, who has a common Sunni name.

Hours later, Maliki reversed course, issuing another statement calling the woman an impostor and a criminal with three outstanding warrants.

"After confirming the falsehood of these claims," it said, Maliki "has ordered that these distinguished officers be honored." It did not identify the officers or explain why the accolades were justified.

Saleh Muhamed al-Mutlaq, a Sunni member of parliament, decried the way Maliki handled the case and accused him of covering up the acts of what he said must have been a rogue group of officers at the Shiite-led Interior Ministry.

"They gave them a compliment," he said about the officers. "That's an insult to the family and the tribe. To do that in such a fast way is not fair. The investigation should have been done in a quiet, steady way, taking time to get the reality."

DOJ_NMG_0134547

The Sunni speaker of parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, also criticized Maliki. "By God, if you don't bring justice to this Muslim Iraqi woman, whom you should view as your sister or daughter," he said in a televised interview, "history will curse us with eternal disgrace."

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, weighed in more forcefully, issuing a statement on its Web site vowing to avenge the alleged assault. The statement declared a "state of maximum alert" and called on its followers to "intensify attacks against the Iraqi security forces" in support of Sunni Muslim women.

The threat came on a day when at least 11 people were killed by car bombs in the capital, a police spokesman said.

North of Baghdad, at least six people were killed and more than 100 hospitalized after a truck apparently carrying a toxic chemical exploded, another police spokesman said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair planned to announce Wednesday the withdrawal of 1,500 British troops from Iraq in the coming months, rising to 3,000 by Christmas, the BBC reported Tuesday. Britain has about 7,000 troops in Iraq.

Meanwhile, the president of the Iraqi Journalists Union said U.S. troops raided the group's office Monday and detained 10 of its guards. Shihab al-Timimi called the raid "a strange and irresponsible act" and said he has called the U.S. ambassador in Iraq and the U.S. military.

Military officials did not immediately respond to an e-mail sent Tuesday night asking for information on the reported raid.

The U.S. military disclosed the death on Tuesday of a soldier killed in Anbar province in western Iraq.

Britain To Announce Trimming Of Iraq Force, Reports Say (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

LONDON, Wednesday, Feb. 21 — Prime Minister Tony Blair is planning to announce Wednesday that up to 1,500 of the 7,000 British troops in southern Iraq will begin withdrawing in coming weeks, the British news media reported, quoting unidentified sources.

An official spokesman for the prime minister declined to confirm widespread reports in newspapers and from the BBC about a withdrawal, saying that Parliament should be informed first of any such move.

But in Washington, a spokesman for the National Security Council, Gordon Johndroe, said that “while the United Kingdom is maintaining a robust force in southern Iraq, we’re pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis.”

Mr. Johndroe added that President Bush and Mr. Blair had spoken to each another on Tuesday and that Mr. Bush “sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad.”

Britain has insisted for several months that it will reduce its troop levels in Iraq as soon as Iraqi security forces can take over from them — a marked contrast to America’s decision to increase military personnel in and around Baghdad with a buildup of more than 20,000 troops.

Britain has long been America’s most prominent ally in Iraq, with most of its forces deployed in and around the city of Basra. But with British troops engaged in Afghanistan as well, senior military commanders here have complained that their forces are overstretched and might well be exacerbating tensions by their very presence in Iraq.

The announcement could have political significance, too.

Mr. Blair is readying himself to redeem a promise to step down this year. Political analysts say he wants to set a timetable to extricate British troops from a war that has proven deeply unpopular among Britons, overshadowing his legacy after almost 10 years in office.

British newspapers said he would announce Wednesday that a total of 3,000 soldiers would return home by the end of the year.

Mr. Blair routinely faces legislators’ questions in the House of Commons on Wednesdays when Parliament is in session and may make his announcement after that scheduled 30-minute appearance. He may also repeat what British officials have frequently said in the past — that troop withdrawals are dependent on the level of security in Basra.

DOJ_NMG_0134548

For several weeks, British and Iraqi forces have been conducting an operation code-named Sinbad to challenge Shiite militias in Basra. Mr. Blair said in a television interview on Sunday that the operation had been successful and that it was "now complete."

The newspaper The Sun said 1,500 troops scheduled to rotate out of Basra in April would not be replaced and others would withdraw to a heavily-fortified base. Britain has lost some 130 soldiers in the Iraq campaign.

British leaders, including Mr. Blair, have stressed that their mission in predominantly Shiite southern Iraq is less fraught than the insurgency and sectarian strife facing American and Iraqi forces in Baghdad.

The Ministry of Defense said Iraqi forces in southern Iraq took a "significant step" toward taking responsibility for Basra's security on Tuesday when an Iraqi Army division in Basra was transferred to Iraqi command.

Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, a senior British commander in southern Iraq, called the move "another important milestone on the road to Iraqi self-reliance."

Some politicians saw the expected announcement of a withdrawal as closely tied to the as yet unannounced schedule for Mr. Blair's departure.

"I always assumed that he would want to be able to announce some limited withdrawal before he left," said Tony Benn, a retired member of the British Parliament and a fierce critic of the Iraq campaign. "It is nothing to do with the real question, it doesn't represent any change of policy whatsoever in my opinion, but tactically it looks good."

British Muslim leaders, who have been vociferously opposed to the war, generally welcome the idea of a British withdrawal. "We should never have been there in the first place, and of course the sooner we come out of this mess the better it is," said Sir Iqbal Sacranie, the former head of the Muslim Council of Britain.

Sir Menzies Campbell, leader of the antiwar Liberal Democrats, told the Press Association news agency that the expected announcement did not go far enough toward a complete British withdrawal.

Blair To Reveal 1,600 Cut In Iraq Troops (FT)

By James Blitz

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Tony Blair is to announce on Wednesday that Britain will cut the number of UK troops stationed in Iraq by about 1,600 – the first time the UK's military presence in the country has been reduced since the 2003 invasion.

The Financial Times has learnt that Mr Blair will tell MPs that the current UK contingent in Iraq – numbering 7,100 troops – is to come down to 5,500. The reduction in troop numbers will pave the way for Iraqi forces to begin taking control of the city of Basra.

In a statement to the Commons, Mr Blair will present the reduction in troop numbers as an initially modest move that does not undermine the UK's fighting capability.

However, Mr Blair will also say that a large part of the UK military in and around Basra will now start to return to barracks, acting as a potential back-up force for the Iraqi military as it begins to take full control of Basra.

For Mr Blair, in his final months as prime minister, Wednesday's announcement is highly symbolic. After being dogged by the debacle in Iraq for nearly four years, today's statement allows him to leave office conveying the impression – albeit a limited one – that the UK intervention has had some success.

However, the announcement will be watched with anxiety by politicians across the political divide in the US. Britain's troop reduction comes as President George W. Bush has started to commit the US to a "surge" of US troop numbers in Iraq, a move contested by the Democrats in Congress.

Mr Blair, who on Tuesday spoke with Mr Bush about Wednesday's announcement, will insist that there has been no opposition from Washington to the British move.

Mr Blair has told allies that senior White House figures regard today's announcement as good news for the coalition because it underlines that parts of the US-UK invasion have gone well.

Even so, Mr Blair's critics are likely to argue that conditions in the south of the country, where British troops have been in operation, have always been more favourable than they are in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0134549

Downing Street will want to convey today's announcement as one of the most significant stages of Mr Blair's final few months in office. Next month, Mr Blair plans to help pull off a big achievement in the Northern Ireland peace process, with hopes that a power-sharing executive will be formed after the assembly elections on March 7. Mr Blair is also focused on helping Angela Merkel, German chancellor, achieve agreement on a post-Kyoto deal on climate change at the G8 summit in June.

Apart from the situation in Iraq, Mr Blair is also likely to place emphasis on a possible climate change deal with Mr Bush – although White House concerns that Washington will only commit to a post-2012 treaty if China and India do the same have been taken into account.

Mr Blair's announcement on Iraq on Wednesday comes at the end of Operation Sinbad – a four-month security operation conducted by UK forces that has been aimed at gradually putting the Iraqis in front-line control of the city.

The British handed over security responsibility for two of their four provinces to Iraqis last year and abandoned their main base in a third.

The UK force is now concentrated in Basra itself and at a nearby air base.

Blair Readies Timeline For British Cuts In Iraq Force (WT)

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

LONDON -- Prime Minister Tony Blair will announce today a new timetable for the withdrawal of British troops from Iraq, with 1,500 to return home in several weeks, the British Broadcasting Corp. reported.

Mr. Blair also will tell the House of Commons during his regular weekly appearance that about 3,000 British soldiers will have left southern Iraq by the end of 2007, if security there is sufficient, the BBC said, quoting government officials who weren't further identified.

The withdrawal was announced as President Bush implements a surge of 21,500 more troops for Iraq.

Mr. Blair said Sunday that Washington had not put pressure on London to maintain its troop numbers. Britain hopes to cut several thousand of its 7,000-member force in the southern city of Basra by midyear.

Britain put Iraqis in command of the main Iraqi army unit in Basra yesterday in an apparent move to pave the way for London to formally announce major cutbacks in troops.

"The Iraqi army division based in Basra has transferred from under coalition command, and is now -- for the first time -- taking its orders directly from an Iraqi headquarters in Baghdad," the British military said.

"The transfer is a significant step towards Iraqi forces taking responsibility for security in the city."

Since the 2003 invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, British troops have been responsible for Iraq's southern-most four provinces, which are mainly Shi'ite and have been quieter than mixed or mainly Sunni areas patrolled by Americans. But a British decision to draw down forces could prove diplomatically sensitive at a time when Mr. Bush is sending thousands more American troops on a "surge" to fight sectarian violence in Baghdad.

The British handed over security responsibility for two of their four provinces to Iraqis last year and abandoned their main base in a third.

The force is now concentrated in Basra itself and at a nearby air base. Commanders say they hope to withdraw from the city and keep a reserve force on standby at the base.

U.K. May Pull 1,500 Troops From Iraq (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

LONDON -- Prime Minister Tony Blair will announce today a new timetable for the withdrawal of British troops from Iraq, with 1,500 to return home in several weeks, the BBC reported.

Mr. Blair will also tell the House of Commons during his regular weekly appearance before it that a total of about 3,000 British soldiers will have left southern Iraq by the end of 2007, if the security there is sufficient, the British Broadcasting Corp. said, quoting government officials who weren't further identified.

The BBC said Mr. Blair wasn't expected to say when the rest of Britain's forces would leave Iraq. Currently, Britain has about 7,100 soldiers there.

DOJ_NMG_0134550

Britain has long been the most important coalition member in Iraq after the U.S. But Mr. Blair knows the British public and politicians from his own Labour Party want the troops out as quickly as possible, and don't want to see Britain stick with the U.S. in Iraq for the long haul.

Militarily, a British withdrawal isn't likely to have much effect on the stepped-up U.S. operation in Baghdad or the war with the Sunnis in Anbar province west of the Iraqi capital. However, Iraqi forces could have a tough time maintaining security in mostly Shiite southern Iraq, including Basra city.

Mr. Blair's Downing Street office refused to comment on the BBC report, which also said Blair would tell the Commons that if the situation worsens on the ground on Iraq, his new game plan could change.

The announcement comes even as President Bush implements an increase of 21,000 more troops for Iraq.

Messrs. Blair and Bush talked by secure video link yesterday morning, and President Bush views Britain's troop cutbacks as "a sign of success" in Iraq, said U.S. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Nine Killed in Chlorine Gas Tank Explosion

A hidden bomb ripped through a tanker carrying chlorine gas Tuesday, killing nine people and filling hospital beds with more than 150 wheezing and frightened villagers after noxious plumes covered homes and schools north of Baghdad.

The attack was part of a string of blasts -- including a suicide bomber who killed seven mourners at a funeral -- that further rattled officials marking the first week of a major security crackdown seeking to calm the blood-soaked city. U.S. forces, meanwhile, called in airstrikes during intense clashes against insurgents in strongholds northwest of Baghdad.

With the death toll in the Baghdad area climbing above 100 since Sunday, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki tried to court some rare upbeat publicity with an even rarer event -- leaving his heavily guarded quarters for a visit to the city's streets and markets.

The bombing of the tanker took place near Taji, 12 miles northwest of Baghdad. A military spokesman, Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, said a bomb was planted under the tanker, but it was not known whether it had a timer or was remotely detonated. His remarks contradicted earlier reports that a roadside bomb blew up the truck.

Hospitals were soon flooded with terrified people -- including many children -- complaining of breathing problems, vomiting and stinging eyes. Most of the people treated were released after several hours and there were no apparent life-threatening cases, hospital officials said.

Authorities were left questioning whether the bombing could signal a new tactic by militants to try to spread greater panic with chemical fallout.

Blair To Unveil British Troop Reduction From Iraq (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

LONDON -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair is expected to announce Britain's first major troop pullout from Iraq, with 1,500 troops likely to return home within the next few months, British news agencies reported Tuesday.

A total of 3,000 troops -- or more than 40 percent of Britain's contingent in Iraq -- could be pulled out by the end of the year, if the handover of security to Iraqi government forces in the southern part of the country continues to go smoothly, the reports said.

The expected announcement to Parliament on Wednesday, which the prime minister's office refused to confirm, follows the British government's pledge to consider drawing down troops this year as the Iraqi military and police shoulder more responsibility for quelling sectarian violence.

An important signal came earlier this week, when Blair announced that a program to place Iraqi troops to take "main frontline control" of security in the southern city of Basra had been "successful," clearing the way for British troops to assume a largely supportive role.

Critics have questioned just how successful Iraqi forces have been when taking charge. The Iraqis also have been assigned the lead in at least two other provinces of southern Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0134551

"It is absolutely true, as we have said for months, that as the Iraqis are more capable down in Basra of taking control of their own security, we will scale down," with the proviso that sufficient troops are "in reserve" to help in the event a "particular problem" arises," Blair told the BBC's Sunday AM over the weekend.

"The operation that we have been conducting in Basra is now complete, and that operation has specifically been to put the Iraqi forces in the main frontline control of security within the city," he said.

He said British forces in the south face a somewhat easier task than that of the Americans, who are preparing to deploy 21,500 additional troops in Baghdad and Anbar province, because there is no Sunni insurgency or al-Qaida suicide attacks in the predominately Shiite Basra area.

Several British newspapers and the BBC reported that Blair Wednesday will tell Parliament he plans to reduce Britain's 7,100-troop contingent to 5,500, with most of the reduction coming from troops now deployed in Basra.

A Blair spokesman said Tuesday night: "The prime minister has said that Parliament will have to be told about this matter first."

In Washington, the White House said it is grateful for Britain's past and future military support in Iraq. Blair and President Bush spoke on Tuesday, when the British prime minister presumably briefed Bush on his plans.

The Financial Times said Blair will assure members of Parliament that Bush expressed no opposition to a pullback.

Blair To Announce Timetable For Pulling Troops From Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson And Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the Bush administration's closest ally in Iraq, plans to announce on Wednesday a phased pullout of British troops from that country, he told President Bush Tuesday.

Blair's decision comes as the U.S. force in Iraq is growing by 21,500 troops to try to improve security.

The British leader had said recently that conditions in southern Iraq, where British troops are concentrated, are stable enough to begin withdrawals.

Bush and Blair discussed the move by secure videoconference. The White House called it positive step and said it was not a surprise because the British have been turning over power to Iraqi forces for months. Tuesday, they transferred command of Iraqi forces in Basra to the Iraqi army. Those forces had been training under British leadership.

"President Bush sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said Tuesday.

But Jeffrey White, an Iraq military expert at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the move is "not a good news story from the point of view of security." A former Mideast analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency, White said the British presence in southern Iraq "acted as a check on a whole slew of bad guys."

ON DEADLINE: Share your thoughts

The British Broadcasting Corp. quoted unnamed sources in Blair's government as saying the prime minister will tell the House of Commons today that the first 1,500 of the 7,100 British troops in Iraq will begin heading home in several weeks. The BBC said Blair plans to reduce the force to 3,000 soldiers by Christmas. That could not be independently verified.

British troops have been in charge of security in the southern part of Iraq, including Basra, the country's second-largest city. The area is populated largely by Shiite Muslims and has not seen the kind of violence directed at U.S. troops. A total of 132 British troops have died in operations in Iraq, the Defense Ministry says. More than 3,000 U.S. troops have been killed.

The British presence in Iraq has been declining since the March 2003 invasion. Three years ago there were roughly 8,500 troops.

Blair has been a steadfast ally of Bush throughout the Iraq war. He argued that Iraq had to be made secure before withdrawal would be an option. Like Bush, Blair has seen domestic support for his course of action in Iraq decline as the war has continued.

The plan could mean Prince Harry, third in line to the throne, won't be deployed to Iraq. The prospect of Prince Charles' son, an army officer, going to war has been the subject of many stories in the British press.

DOJ_NMG_0134552

Congressional Democrats said the move showed Bush should step up diplomatic efforts in Iraq.

"It is not in the interest of our troops to continue sending them in harm's way without a clear diplomatic strategy that will bring closure to this war," Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., said.

Stinson reported from London.

How Monument's Razing Might Preserve Iraqi Rift (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The young Iraqis who hawk souvenirs in the shadow of Baghdad's best-known landmark -- the giant crossed-sword arches built by Saddam Hussein after the Iran-Iraq War -- had something new to sell yesterday: pieces of the memorial itself.

The Shiite Muslim parties that dominate Iraq's government had quietly given orders to dismantle the statues, which have dominated the capital's skyline for 17 years. As word spread, a few peddlers grabbed some of the green metal helmets, captured from Iranian soldiers in the 1980s, which had long been part of the so-called Hands of Victory. They were soon joined by American and British officials, who tore helmets of their own off the base of each statue to keep as souvenirs and who posed for pictures in front of the bright orange cranes that had been brought to the monument to do the actual demolition work.

For some of the gawkers, it was a chance to make a final visit to one of Iraq's most-recognizable monuments. For other Americans and Iraqis, however, it was cause for alarm -- and concern that the demolition of the monument would cause more than just aesthetic damage. Critics said the memorial's destruction would further fuel the country's intensifying sectarian strife and become another symbol of the central government's increasingly hard-line stance toward Iraq's Sunni Muslim minority.

"This monument represents a piece of our history," said Abu Sara, a Sunni computer engineer, as he heard the news. "The government is trying to wipe us away, in the present and in the past."

The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite with ties to Tehran, ordered the dismantling without consulting the U.S. or making any formal public announcement. By nightfall, workers had torn the handles off several of the swords, punched large holes in the blades, and begun chipping away at the monuments' concrete bases.

Large orange construction machines were parked next to two of the swords, and demolition work is set to resume this morning. Aides to Mr. Maliki say they expect the memorial to be completely destroyed by the end of the week.

There are few monuments here that are as widely known -- or as controversial -- as the Hands of Victory memorial, which is an Iraqi Arc de Triomphe of sorts.

Mr. Hussein began building the monument in 1988 after the conclusion of Iraq's bloody war with Iran, which effectively ended in stalemate. H+H Metalform, the German firm that built much of the monument, said it had been given photographs of Mr. Hussein's forearms to use as models, according to a history of the memorial on the GlobalSecurity.org Web site.

When the monument was completed, each set of crossed swords reached approximately 140 feet into the sky. The blades of the swords were made, in large part, of metal melted down from the guns of fallen Iraqi soldiers.

Mr. Hussein inaugurated the arches in 1990 by riding under them on a white horse that was an allusion to the favorite horse of Hussein, the Shiite martyr killed near the Iraqi city of Karbala centuries earlier, according to the GlobalSecurity.org history. The long stretch of concrete between the two arches was later used for a series of Iraqi military parades overseen by Mr. Hussein and other top Iraqi officials.

After the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, the section of downtown Baghdad housing the monument became part of the "Green Zone," the walled and heavily fortified compound housing thousands of Iraqi officials, U.S. military personnel and civilian officials, and foreign contractors. The stringent security measures protecting the Green Zone prevented insurgents from being able to target the edifice, but they also left the monument off-limits to the vast majority of Iraqis.

Early yesterday afternoon, Iraqi officials began alerting U.S. embassy staffers that a demolition order had been given. Word of the demolition plans spread quickly across the Green Zone, and soldiers, civilian personnel and contractors from countries ranging from the U.S. to Nepal soon descended on the memorial to take photographs or break off souvenirs.

DOJ_NMG_0134553

One U.S. Army sergeant clambered up onto the base of one of the statues to pose for a photo but lost his footing and fell backward onto the concrete. He stood up, brushed himself off, and picked up a loose Iranian helmet to take home with him. "I'm going to have the most unique flowerpot in all of Tennessee," he said.

The jovial dismantling of the monument rubbed some of the soldiers the wrong way.

"What's the quote -- those who forget history are condemned to repeat it?" said Sgt. Harry Good, an Alabama native working on a government reconstruction team here. "I mean, Saddam was part of their history, too."

Afghan Suicide Bomber Wounds 6 Soldiers (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 20 — A suicide bomber disguised as a doctor blew himself up Tuesday morning at the opening of a hospital ward built by American forces in eastern Afghanistan, wounding six American soldiers as they tackled him at the entrance, officials said.

An American soldier was also killed farther north, in Kunar Province, on Monday, the United States military reported.

“A suicide bomber with explosives on his body and dressed in a white gown like a doctor entered the hospital where the ceremony was being held,” the governor of Khost Province, Arsallah Jamal, said in a telephone interview. The governor said he and about 50 guests had been just yards away when the bomber detonated the explosives.

An Afghan security officer and an American soldier had stopped the man, and when he tried to escape, the soldier grabbed him, the governor said. The man was shot in the leg, and then set off the bomb, he said. A hospital staff member was wounded.

The officials were cutting the ribbon of a new emergency ward built by the American military’s Provincial Reconstruction Team. The American soldier who was killed in Kunar Province, which borders Pakistan, was taking part in combat operations in Naray. A military statement on the operation did not give more details.

And on Tuesday, Afghan and NATO forces retook control of the Baqwa district of Farah Province, the government said. On Monday, the Taliban had seized the district from the local police.

A Problem Of Passivity (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

AFTER THE attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, there was a painful and sometimes bitter debate in this country about how two administrations could have failed to take decisive action against an obvious threat -- al-Qaeda's camps in Afghanistan. The Sept. 11 commission concluded that it was partly a "problem of imagination": Few U.S. officials considered the possibility that al-Qaeda was capable of reaching out from its remote base to stage devastating strikes on New York and Washington.

We know now that allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven can have terrible consequences for U.S. homeland security. And yet the Bush administration appears to be letting the threat develop again. For several months U.S. intelligence officials and independent observers have been telling journalists -- most recently at the New York Times -- that al-Qaeda has established several camps in the Pakistani territory of North Waziristan, along the Afghan border. Those camps are populated by Pakistani, Afghan and foreign militants; some may be Westerners who are being trained for attacks in Europe or the United States.

The camps have operated unhindered since at least September, when Pakistan's military ruler, Pervez Musharraf, agreed to a separate peace deal with local Taliban leaders. Since then, cross-border attacks by the Taliban into Afghanistan have tripled, according to the U.S. military. Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders in Waziristan have developed a "complex cooperative relationship," Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan, testified before the House Armed Services Committee last week. Yet no action has been taken, either by the United States or by Pakistan, its nominal ally in the war on terrorism.

President Bush accepted and endorsed Mr. Musharraf's truce with the militants when it was reached. Now senior administration officials acknowledge that it has created serious problems. "A steady, direct attack against the command and control in Pakistan in sanctuary areas is essential," Gen. Eikenberry said. In separate congressional testimony, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "President Musharraf . . . has to do something." Mr. Musharraf has done nothing. Instead, he has continued to defend his deal with the Taliban and suggested that similar havens should be created in Afghanistan. The provincial governor who brokered the deal held a news conference last weekend at which he said the truce was a success and called the Taliban's terrorism against U.S. and NATO forces "a resistance movement, sort of a liberation war."

DOJ_NMG_0134554

The administration's response to such statements -- and Pakistan's failure to act -- has been to heap praise on Mr. Musharraf and to express sympathy for the pressure he is said to be under. Such indulgence, which has gone on for five years while the general has tempered his action against Islamic extremists and suppressed Pakistan's pro-Western democratic parties, will be hard to defend if the consequences of allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven are unchanged. "Direct intervention against the sanctuary in Afghanistan apparently must have seemed . . . to be disproportionate to the threat," said the Sept. 11 commission report. Is that how the administration thinks of Waziristan?

DOJ:

Interim U.S. Attorney For Northern California Sworn In (BAYCNS)

Bay City News Service, February 21, 2007

A career federal prosecutor was sworn in at a ceremony in San Francisco today as the interim U.S. attorney for Northern California.

Scott Schools, 44, who previously worked for the U.S. Justice Department in South Carolina and Washington D.C., was given the oath of office by Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker.

Schools told a courtroom gathering of federal lawyers and several judges, ``I'm very excited and honored to be here."

Schools was appointed last week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to replace Kevin Ryan, who served in the top federal lawyer's job in San Francisco for 4 1/2 years.

Schools said after the swearing-in that he was about to hold his first meeting with his staff and was planning to tell the federal lawyers ``what my hopes and expectations are" for the job.

Schools will be in charge of about 115 lawyers in San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose who handle federal criminal cases as well as civil cases involving the U.S. government in coastal California from Monterey to the Oregon border.

Schools was most recently general counsel to the Justice Department's executive office, which gives guidance in ethics and employee matters to the 94 U.S. attorney's offices around the country.

Before that, he was second in command of the U.S. attorney's office in South Carolina four years and was interim U.S. attorney in that office for 10 months in 2001.

Under a provision of the federal Patriot Act reauthorization last year, Schools can remain in office as interim chief until a presidentially appointed U.S. attorney is confirmed by the Senate, which could be for the remaining two years of the Bush Administration.

Until the law was changed last year, the U.S. attorney general could appoint an interim U.S. attorney for only four months, after which the power to make a temporary appointment moved to the local federal court.

U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, has criticized the change in the law on the ground that it can be used to bypass the Senate confirmation process.

Editorial: Trading In U.S. Attorneys (PROJO)

The Providence Journal, February 21, 2007

The U.S. Senate should extend its inquiry into why the Bush administration has forced at least seven U.S. attorneys out of office. By tradition, presidents appoint these federal prosecutors when they first enter office. President Bush replaced nearly all those who had been appointed by Bill Clinton; President Clinton had done much the same before him. But it is odd for a president to remove his own choices, especially if they are performing adequately.

One who got the boot, Carol Lam, oversaw the corruption investigation that put California GOP Rep. Randy Cunningham in prison. Two others targeted in the probe, Kyle Foggo and Brent Wilkes, were indicted just last week. Until retiring last spring, Mr. Foggo was the No. 3 official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Mr. Wilkes is a San Diego-area defense contractor. The indictments were handed up just a few days before Ms. Lam's scheduled departure, raising the question of whether there was more to come — and whether it will now be pursued.

DOJ_NMG_0134555

Also out is Bush supporter H.E. Cummins III, a U.S. attorney in Arkansas credited with stepping up prosecutions of drug and gun cases. He is being replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former deputy to presidential adviser Karl Rove. Another casualty, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, took on backdated stock options and steroid use by Major League Baseball players.

In a hearing early this month, the Senate Judiciary Committee was not able to shed much light on these changes. Though the president is within his rights, a pernicious brand of politics seems to be at work. It seems clear, though not unusual, that friends and allies are being rewarded. More disturbing is the idea that certain investigations are perhaps being quashed.

An amendment tacked onto the reauthorized Patriot Act last year empowers the attorney general to replace U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods. Though Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales has vowed to submit new appointees' names to the Senate for confirmation, the law apparently does not require it. Previously, U.S. District Court judges had the power to make limited interim appointments. But Mr. Gonzales recently argued that this was improper: The judges might install their friends.

Some Democrats are pushing for a return to the old system, which seems better insulated from executive whims. The more heavily politicized these offices become, the less independently U.S. attorneys will act. The ultimate casualty is justice.

Editorial: U.S. Attorneys Get No White House Respect (TRICH)

Tri-City Herald (Kennewick, Paco, & Richland,, February 21, 2007

The firing of federal prosecutor John McKay of Seattle is lamentable, but the job of U.S. attorney is - always has been - steeped in politics.

And some of politics, sadly, is steeped in lying.

So the explanations out of the Department of Justice that McKay and five other U.S. attorneys were fired for "performance" issues call into question the source.

Seven months before McKay was forced to resign, he received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators, The Seattle Times reported.

"McKay is an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the [U.S. attorney's office] and the District's law enforcement community," the team of 27 Justice Department officials concluded, according to a copy of their final report obtained by The Seattle Times.

Underscoring the mendacious assertions of "performance problems" by the Washington, D.C., bureaucracy is the discovery that at least four more of the six attorneys fired had recently received similarly positive evaluations of their job performance.

As McClatchy news service reporter Marisa Taylor wrote, the administration has been "forced to defend the firings in recent weeks after critics raised concerns that well-respected, competent U.S. attorneys known for their independence were being removed to make way for handpicked candidates who'd be less likely to buck the White House."

It seems a reasonable assumption that McKay and the others weren't well connected to the heavily political Attorney General's Office. Some may not possess the right ideological bent.

There's always been an element of political patronage in doling out these plum jobs, but the checks and balances against the worst abuses are no longer required.

Replacements for the ousted attorneys won't have to face potentially grueling confirmation hearings before the Senate unless the Bush administration agrees to it.

Count it as another unintended consequence of the war on terror.

As Taylor reported, Democrats now in control of the Senate have only recently discovered that "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales could use a little-noticed change in the Patriot Act to fill vacancies with interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms without Senate approval."

There's little doubt that McKay and at least most of the others weren't treated fairly. But fairness is separated from politics by more than just 605 pages in Webster's New World Dictionary.

It shouldn't work this way, but U.S. attorney appointments - and jobs - are among the most political in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0134556

Replacements for the six, if they are indeed chosen as "handpicked candidates who'd be less likely to buck the White House," probably shouldn't make any long-range plans beyond January 2009.

No matter which party winds up in the White House, loyalty to George W. Bush will mean less then.

And the Senate Judiciary Committee has now voted to repeal the administration's authority to simply replace U.S. attorneys without seeking congressional approval.

If the Senate and House go along, they will help stymie the impulse to fire good attorneys for bad reasons.

Study On Privacy Protections Finds Citizens Distrust Security Agencies (NJTECHD)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, February 21, 2007

The CIA, Homeland Security Department and National Security Agency are the least trusted federal agencies when it comes to protecting Americans' privacy, according to a new study by the Ponemon Institute.

The annual survey, which will be released Wednesday, asked more than 7,000 citizens whether they believe the government takes appropriate steps to safeguard personal information. Answers were mixed, but the overall trend suggested a decline in public trust since the think tank first studied the issue in 2004.

The NSA has suffered a substantial flogging by lawmakers and privacy advocates amid questions in the past year over its domestic spying in search of terrorists. It also was revealed recently that the CIA has been utilizing a special subpoena power of the 2001 anti-terrorism law known as the USA PATRIOT Act to comb bank and credit-card records.

Homeland Security and the Transportation Security Administration, which were evaluated separately in the survey, have experienced their fair share of controversy over the mining of information from government and commercial databases and a program that screens travelers entering the United States.

After last year's massive breach of more than 27 million military personnel's data, furthermore, the Veterans Administration fell from a top-five ranking in 2006 to just outside the bottom five in the 2007 Ponemon study.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office also was among the least trusted of the 74 federal entities included in the poll.

"There's a clear correlation between bad publicity and poor privacy trust performance," survey author Larry Ponemon said. Previous studies "lacked a big headline negative event," whereas this time, there were several.

"Initiating more transparent operations and communications with the public is often the first step toward repairing damaged trust, but for obvious reasons, those are not options that agencies like the CIA or NSA can take," Ponemon said. The confidential nature of the agencies' operations "will always carry a certain cloud of mistrust with some."

Lisa Graves, deputy director of the Center for National Security Studies, said the study "rightly gives these agencies rock-bottom privacy trust scores." "Some politicians may believe they can make political gains by going along with the president's anti-terrorism policies that strip away Americans' privacy rights," she said. But the survey makes clear that Americans do not think the entities can be trusted to protect their rights, she said.

The U.S. Postal Service received Ponemon's top ranking for protecting privacy the third year in a row. Other notable high achievers were the FTC, its Bureau of Consumer Protection, the National Institutes of Health, and the Census Bureau.

The study's overall findings concluded that Americans remain concerned over a "loss of civil liberties and privacy rights," "surveillance into personal life," and "monitoring e-mail and Web activities."

While diminishing public trust for the NSA and VA was not surprising to privacy advocate Marc Rotenberg, the FTC "may not be out of the woods" given mounting public concerns about identity theft. "If the FTC doesn't get a better handle on that problem, the commission may find its own trust rating drop in the 2008 survey," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Oops! Orrick Associate Lets Slip Mercury Backdating Document (LAW)

By Scott Graham, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134557

A fourth-year associate at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe inadvertently disclosed a sensitive document about stock option backdating that the firm has spent the last five months fighting to keep under seal.

The document -- a complaint in a shareholder derivative action against former executives of Mercury Interactive Corp. -- contains explosive allegations against the executives and quotes extensively from e-mails in which the executives allegedly discuss backdating their own stock options.

"What do you want to do about [Chief Financial Officer Douglas Smith]'s option since the price is going up?" former General Counsel Susan Skaer is quoted asking CEO Amnon Landon in one e-mail. "Keep waiting?"

The complaint, Morillo v. Abrams, 1:05-cv-50710, had been filed under seal on Sept. 22 as part of a confidentiality agreement with the executives' lawyers -- but without judicial approval. The Recorder and two other news organizations have been trying since then to unseal the complaint and its supporting exhibits.

But a Dow Jones News Service reporter discovered Friday that Orrick associate M. Todd Scott had inadvertently filed the complaint publicly with a motion to stay the derivative action in October. The Wall Street Journal posted the complaint on its Web site over the weekend and wrote a story about it on page A-4 of Tuesday's print edition.

In a filing for an emergency hearing on Tuesday, Orrick partner James Kramer wrote that Scott thought the complaint had been filed under seal when Scott included it as an exhibit to his own declaration.

"At the time the exhibit was filed, counsel for Ms. Skaer intended for the exhibit to be filed under seal, and, indeed, believed the exhibit had been filed under seal," Kramer wrote. "Counsel continued in this belief until the afternoon of Feb. 16, 2007, at which time the court clerk notified all parties that the exhibit had not been filed under seal and was publicly available."

The Mercury executives -- represented by Orrick; Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati; Shearman & Sterling; and Farella Braun & Martel -- have been fighting vigorously against The Recorder, the San Francisco Chronicle and Bloomberg to keep the complaint confidential. The executives succeeded in January in getting the derivative action dismissed for lack of standing, but shortly thereafter Santa Clara County, Calif., Judge James Kleinberg ordered that the complaint be unsealed nevertheless.

The Mercury executives last week obtained an emergency stay from the 6th District Court of Appeal. Orrick also asked U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel to block Judge Kleinberg's order unsealing the motion.

On Tuesday, Kleinberg resealed the complaint, but only after it had been published by the Journal. He noted that it apparently had been "present and unsealed" among the 25 volumes of files held by the clerk's office for the past four months.

The complaint alleges that four former Mercury executives "grossly enriched themselves at the expense of Mercury by granting themselves (and their colleagues) millions of underpriced options to purchase Mercury stock."

The complaint, by Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins partner Amber Eck, alleges that Skaer, Smith, former CFO Sharlene Abrams and former COO Kenneth Klein caused the company "to improperly pay out $164 million to themselves in unwarranted stock-option based compensation." The complaint states that $54 million of that $164 million is directly attributable to backdating.

It also states that Mercury spent $70 million in attorney fees investigating its stock option backdating problem.

COVER-UP ALLEGED

Mercury was one of the first companies to publicly admit problems with its options grants. The company was forced to restate earnings by $570 million following an internal investigation. Its board of directors took the rare step of joining plaintiff lawyers in a shareholder suit seeking damages from ousted executives. That changed after Hewlett-Packard Co. announced it had acquired the company last year.

The complaint accuses all four former executives of acting improperly. As for former GC Skaer, it alleges that she "created and falsified documents regarding the backdated options, personally selected backdating dates based on stock price, took minutes in the board and committee meetings where backdating was discussed, and was involved in covering up the backdating."

In one instance, Skaer was granted 25,000 options and Smith got 400,000 at a Feb. 12, 2002, board meeting. The options were backdated to Nov. 2, 2001, when the stock was trading some $12 lower. "This difference ... equates to a $4.8 million benefit to Smith, and a $303,500 benefit for Skaer," the complaint alleges.

DOJ_NMG_0134558

Smith had begun lobbying for a low strike price in October 2001, when he sent an e-mail to CEO Landon with a blind copy to Klein, stating, "[A]ssume a $25 strike for new options (could we go back to the lows??). ..." The board voted to grant Smith his 400,000 options on Nov. 6, 2001, but put off pricing the grant because by then the company's stock was trading above the price Smith had suggested, according to the complaint.

"What do you want to do about Doug's option since the price is going up," Skaer e-mailed CEO Landon on Nov. 14. "Keep waiting?" The next month, Smith himself sent Skaer an e-mail proposing various dates that could be chosen, according to the complaint.

On Jan. 11, 2002, Landon e-mailed the compensation committee members, with a "cc" to Skaer, asking them to fax their "unanimous written consent" for the option grants to Skaer. The consent forms were dated Nov. 5, 2001, according to the complaint. The committee members faxed the forms to Skaer's office, but either Skaer or "someone at her direction" altered the forms by whiting out the Jan. 20, 2002, fax dates at the top of the pages, according to the complaint.

"Skaer's intentional deception is revealed, however, by the fact that, because one of the [consent forms] was apparently sent upside down, the actual fax date is listed on the bottom of the document -- a detail that Skaer overlooked and thus did not alter as planned."

At the actual Feb. 12 board meeting -- which Abrams, Klein, Smith and Skaer all attended -- the compensation committee members backed up the date by another three days, to Nov. 2, 2001, which locked in an additional $2.50 per share gain for Smith and Skaer, according to the complaint.

When Smith filed his so-called Form 5 listing the grant, he listed the previously agreed date of Nov. 5. In 2003, a legal assistant noticed the discrepancy and proposed filing an amended Form 5. But Skaer told him not to because the amount was "de minimus," the complaint alleges -- even though the difference was worth more than $1 million.

The complaint also quotes several other e-mails that seem to suggest knowledge of backdating. Payroll manager Susie Fregoso e-mailed Abrams on May 5, 1999, "[W]hat is the date for the April grant going to be? Right now I have it as April 7 with a price of $27.125. You had mentioned that this might change, any news?"

In an Aug. 3, 2000, e-mail to Fregoso about an employee's stock options that had already been granted, Assistant Controller Kathy Hawkes wrote, "I betcha that Sharlene [Abrams] will overrule these type of things ... and we will use her magic backdating ink. Let's see what happens!"

And another e-mail from Fregoso stated, "The reason the paperwork was not sent out is because the stock price drop made us change the grant date so that you could get the lower price. The 'new' grant is being approved next week by Sharlene[Abrams]/Amnon [Landon]. I know it has been a while, but believe me, you will be happier with the new price." The sentence concluded with a smiley face.

Fannie Won't Pay $44.4 Million In Bonuses (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty And Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Fannie Mae, struggling to atone for a $6.3 billion accounting scandal, announced that it won't pay $44.4 million of shares in the company previously promised as bonuses to 46 current and former executives. The giant provider of funding for U.S. home mortgages said it will "take into income" that amount, previously expensed for unpaid share awards that were based on earnings growth that proved illusory.

In December, Fannie restated earnings for 2002 through mid-2004, reducing retained earnings by $6.3 billion, to correct dozens of violations of accounting rules. Some of those accounting violations helped maximize bonuses for executives, regulators have found.

The decision will cancel planned payments totaling about $11.4 million for former Chief Executive Officer Franklin D. Raines; $4.1 million for the current CEO, Daniel Mudd; and $3.4 million for a former chief financial officer, Timothy Howard, a spokesman said. The values are based on yesterday's closing price of $59.88 for Fannie Mae shares in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Among other current senior executives, Robert Levin, chief business officer, will miss out on about $2 million of shares; Michael Williams, chief operating officer, $1.9 million; and Peter Niculescu, executive vice president, $600,000. The planned awards were for incentive-pay cycles that ended in 2003 and 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0134559

The company also announced that it will eliminate a series of perquisites for executives, including free financial counseling, travel and country-club memberships. Fannie also is ending "gross-up" increases in compensation to cover taxes due on insurance provided by the company for officers.

Companies rarely take back money already paid to executives for results that prove to have been exaggerated. Partly because of the legal difficulties, most boards don't even try to recover the money, and those that do often face years of litigation. But some executives have repaid parts of their past compensation. For example, in 1998, then-CEO Lawrence Coss returned roughly a third of his $102 million 1996 bonus to Green Tree Financial Corp., now part of Conseco Inc., after a restatement wiped out $174 million of pretax profit on which the bonus was based.

Fannie may avoid some complications by withholding money that hasn't yet been doled out rather than clawing back sums already paid, but former executives could contest the decision. A lawyer for Mr. Raines declined to comment; a spokesman for Mr. Howard couldn't be reached immediately. Fannie's regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, or Ofheo, said it approved the decision to withhold the payments. Ofheo last year ordered Fannie to review compensation to top executives for the years in which Fannie violated accounting rules.

Mr. Mudd, a former General Electric Co. executive who joined Fannie in early 2000 as vice chairman and chief operating officer, received total compensation for 2000 through 2003 of $26.3 million. He became chief executive in December 2004 when the accounting scandal forced his predecessor, Mr. Raines, to resign. Mr. Mudd didn't receive a bonus for 2004, and his pay has been well below that of Mr. Raines since then. For 2006, Mr. Mudd received total compensation of about $14.4 million, up about 25% from a year earlier. That raise prompted an angry letter to Ofheo several weeks ago from four Republican U.S. senators -- Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John Sununu of New Hampshire, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Mel Martinez of Florida.

"We would like to know why Ofheo approved this 25% raise at a time when Fannie has paid almost $1.4 billion in accounting and consulting fees to clean up their financial mess and they are still two years behind on their financial reporting," the senators wrote. Congress is debating legislation that would tighten regulation of Fannie and its rival Freddie Mac.

Write to James R. Hagerty at bob.hagerty@wsj.com3 and Damian Paletta at damian.paletta@dowjones.com4

Fannie Cancels Executive Bonuses (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Fannie Mae's board has decided not to give out executive bonuses potentially worth $44.4 million for some of the years when the federally chartered housing finance company's earnings were misstated.

The stock awards had been on hold since early 2005 after the company was caught up in an accounting scandal. They could have totaled $11.2 million for Franklin D. Raines, former chairman and chief executive; $3.4 million for J. Timothy Howard, former finance chief; $1.1 million for Jamie S. Gorelick, a former vice chairman; and $4 million for Raines's successor as chief executive, Daniel H. Mudd, company spokesman Brian Faith said.

A total of 46 current and former executives were affected.

Under a long-term incentive plan, the payouts had been pegged to the company achieving a combination of financial and other goals. The District company recently corrected years of past financial results, acknowledging that it had overstated profits by $6.3 billion.

It was unclear how much money the executives could have received based on the restated results, and spokesmen for the company declined to say.

The awards, known as "performance shares," were one component of overall pay packages that typically included salaries, cash bonuses, stock options and other forms of compensation. The stock awards were granted on a rolling schedule, based on the company's performance over various three-year periods.

DOJ_NMG_0134560

For instance, executives had already received the first installment of awards for a cycle covering 2001 through 2003, and the board is not trying to reclaim that money, spokesman Chuck Greener said. Those awards were worth $4.1 million to Raines, $1.4 million to Howard and $1.8 million to Mudd.

The board "determined not to pay" the second installment for that cycle and "determined that no award was due" with respect to a three-year cycle ending Dec. 31, 2004, Fannie Mae said in a report filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Regulators have alleged that Fannie Mae's senior management intentionally manipulated the company's accounting to hit earnings targets and maximize bonuses. Raines's pay totaled more than $90 million from 1998 through 2003, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said last year.

The agency has filed administrative charges against Raines, Howard and former controller Leanne G. Spencer, seeking to recoup more than $115 million of compensation plus penalties that could exceed $100 million.

The three former executives are contesting the charges.

Attorneys for Raines and Howard did not respond to requests for comment on Fannie Mae's announcement, which came after the markets closed yesterday.

OFHEO said it concurred with the board's decision not to issue the stock awards.

The action "was not directed at any specific individual but rather reflected the performance of Fannie Mae in the years 2001-2004," the regulatory agency said in a news release.

In addition to denying the bonuses, the board recommended "other actions regarding current employees" and the company "has undertaken disciplinary and remedial steps," the agency said. Neither the company nor the agency would elaborate on those other developments.

"With these actions OFHEO considers the board's required review of current officers and employees complete," the agency said.

Fannie Mae also announced that it was eliminating certain executive perquisites, such as company-owned country club memberships and payments for personal financial counseling, which help executives manage their money. In the future, executives would also be required to reimburse the company for personal use of corporate transportation, such as aircraft.

In 2003, Raines's compensation included $37,548 for tax counseling and financial planning services and $196,852 for personal use of company transportation, according to a Fannie Mae report. Mudd's compensation included $80,400 in club membership fees.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jury To Deliberate In CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Five weeks and 19 witnesses into the CIA leak trial, jurors are set to begin deciding the fate of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Jurors heard a full day of closing arguments in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial Tuesday and are scheduled to begin deliberating Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he planned to instruct the jury about legal issues Wednesday morning before sending them off to deliberate.

Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is charged with lying and obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. He faces up to 30 years in prison if convicted, though he'd likely get far less under federal sentencing guidelines.

Plame is married to former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, who emerged in mid-2003 as an outspoken critic of the Bush administration's case for the Iraq war. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says Libby learned about Plame from Cheney and other officials in June 2003 and relayed it to reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0134561

Attorneys left jurors with two very different impressions of the case. Prosecutors described a methodical effort by Libby to conceal the fact that he discussed Plame with reporters in June 2003. Defense attorneys recounted a confusing, sometimes contradictory month of testimony that they believe is too shaky to base a conviction on.

Plame was outed by reporter Robert Novak, who touched off an FBI investigation with a July 2003 syndicated column. Though Libby wasn't Novak's source, prosecutors say he feared he'd be charged with discussing classified information with other reporters.

So, prosecutors say, Libby lied. He told investigators he learned about Plame from Cheney, then forgot about it until a month later, when he was surprised to hear it during a phone call with NBC's Tim Russert. Russert says the conversation about Plame didn't happen.

"It's simply not credible to believe he would forget this information about Wilson's wife," prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said during closing arguments Tuesday. "It's ludicrous."

Libby's attorneys say it's the prosecution's story that doesn't make sense. Why, they ask, would Libby make up a story that hinges on Russert, someone Libby knew could be questioned?

And while prosecutors have shown that Plame came up in several conversations with government officials in mid-2003, defense attorneys say there's no proof Libby deliberately set out to lie when he spoke to investigators three months later.

"They haven't given you anything that says Mr. Libby didn't just have one of those moments that we all have in life where he thought something happened one way and it happened another," said defense attorney Theodore Wells.

Prosecutors used opening statements to remind jurors that one witness after another testified to discussing Plame with Libby. Zeidenberg pointed to a flow chart showing arrows tracking information from several officials to Libby and on to other sources. With each conversation, it became less likely the CIA operative would just slip Libby's mind, Zeidenberg said.

Wells presented a similar chart. Under each name and photograph, however, Wells noted their memory inconsistencies. Some changed their stories. Others seemed less certain in FBI interviews than they did on the stand.

Why is Mr. Libby being treated differently?" Wells told jurors. "He should not. Treat him fairly. Ask yourself: 'Did the government give me some evidence that he intentionally lied as opposed to, did he just forget?'"

Jurors To Begin Deliberations Today In Libby Perjury Trial (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors shouldn't vent their anger over the war in Iraq on former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, his defense attorney said Tuesday as Libby's perjury and obstruction trial neared completion.

"Don't … sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or about the Bush administration," a tearful Theodore Wells, Libby's chief defense attorney, told jurors during closing arguments.

If during deliberations a juror says, " 'He's a Republican, he works for Cheney, let's do him,' " that juror must be discouraged, Wells said.

Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued Tuesday that the Bush administration's attempts to discredit an Iraq war critic, and Libby's role in it, are at the heart of the case against Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. "There's a cloud over the White House as to what happened here," Fitzgerald said. "Don't you think the American people deserve to know?"

Jurors will begin deliberating Libby's fate after instructions from federal Judge Reggie Walton today.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying when he told investigators and later grand jurors in 2003 and 2004 how he learned that Valerie Plame, wife of administration critic Joseph Wilson, worked at the CIA. Libby said he learned the information from Cheney, forgot, then heard it a month later from NBC newsman Tim Russert.

Russert testified in Libby's trial and to the grand jury that he didn't tell Libby about Plame.

Libby also faces charges of perjury and obstruction of justice based on a conversation about Plame with Matthew Cooper, then a Time magazine Washington correspondent.

In summations that lasted 6½ hours, the two sides presented starkly contrasting views of Libby and the case against him.

Only the shaky memories of two reporters with credibility problems held together the case against Libby, Wells said.

DOJ_NMG_0134562

"It's what I mean by 'he said, she said,' " Wells said. "They want you to make a choice beyond a reasonable doubt that (would leave) my client's life destroyed."

Fitzgerald countered that Libby concocted the Russert story and lied about his conversation with Cooper to sidetrack an investigation into who leaked Plame's identity to reporters.

In February 2002, the CIA sent Wilson, a former ambassador, to investigate reports that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger.

No one was indicted for leaking information about Wilson's wife despite an investigation that lasted over two years.

Libby, Fitzgerald said, feared being fired or prosecuted for leaking confidential information. By sourcing the story back to reporters, he said, Libby believed his role would remain secret.

"He made a gamble that he's going to tell them a story about the rumors and hope it goes away," Fitzgerald said. "He threw sand in eyes of the FBI and grand jurors, he obstructed justice and he stole the truth from the judicial system."

The prosecution used a large interactive screen to rebut Libby's version of events. Peter Zeidenberg, a Fitzgerald assistant, posted in succession the names of eight people who spoke with Libby about Plame between June 11, 2003, and about July 10, when Libby said Russert told him about Plame.

"Ladies and gentlemen, that's not forgetting," Zeidenberg said. "That's lying."

Wells directed jurors away from those witnesses, whom he called "background evidence." Jurors must focus, he said, on the Russert and Cooper conversations at the core of the charges.

"This is just about different recollections of conversations with different reporters," Wells said.

It's "crazy," Wells said, to believe Libby invented that Russert told him about Plame. Libby, he said, didn't know Russert and believed investigators would likely call the newsman to verify the account. Russert's network, NBC, was hostile to the White House, Wells argued.

Libby's Memory Is At The Heart Of The Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

At I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial, his lawyers have argued that pressing matters of state prevented the former vice presidential chief of staff from accurately recalling events. But the question of Libby's guilt or innocence, which is expected to be in the hands of a federal jury today, may turn more on what he says he remembered, rather than what he says he forgot.

Again and again, meeting with the FBI and appearing before a grand jury, Libby recalled details of conversations with Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials. But when it came to discussions he had about the core issue in this case — his involvement in disclosing the identity of a CIA officer married to an administration war critic — he frequently drew a blank.

In closing arguments Tuesday, the government asserted that there was nothing wrong with Libby's memory: His repeated lies, the prosecution argued, were part of a calculated cover-up.

"Ask yourself if that pattern is just a convenient way of avoiding the truth," prosecutor Peter R. Zeidenberg said of versions of meetings that Libby recalled for investigators. Libby had "a great memory" when it came to remembering self-serving facts, the prosecutor said derisively.

Defense arguments

Defense lawyers strenuously rejected that characterization in their closing statements, attempting to shift the focus from Libby to prosecution witnesses — principally three journalists — whom they portrayed as the ones who were not credible and had memory problems.

Libby's lawyers contended that their client had no motive to mislead anyone and that it made no sense for him to lie — an action they said would jeopardize a long and distinguished career of government service.

"Scooter Libby's innocent. He didn't do anything. He didn't leak anything," said his lead attorney, Theodore V. Wells Jr. "Think about the madness of this prosecution."

DOJ_NMG_0134563

The pleas ended a month of testimony and argument in a case whose backdrop was the march to war in Iraq and accusations that the administration had twisted prewar intelligence.

The defense has sought to portray Libby as a sympathetic figure who, on the orders of his boss, Cheney, got caught up in a "meat grinder" of dealing with reporters that left him fearing that White House political operatives were conspiring to "scapegoat" him.

Prosecution's side

The government has claimed that Libby's actions were driven by another sort of fear — realizing that he might have disclosed classified information about a CIA officer, Valerie Plame, whose husband had publicly criticized the way intelligence was used to justify invading Iraq. As a result, the prosecution argued, Libby chose to make up a story to cover his tracks.

Zeidenberg told the jury that the defense had failed to offer a shred of evidence to support the conspiracy theory. He said the testimony of a string of nine government witnesses proved that Libby was not credible.

"That's not a matter of 'misremembering' or 'forgetting,' " he said. "It's lying."

Defense lawyer William H. Jeffress Jr. responded that Libby did not behave like an ordinary criminal and had even produced notes, which proved helpful to the government, that "he would have ditched … if he was that kind of person."

Jeffress added that it made no sense for Libby to make up his central defense — that he learned about Plame from NBC's "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert — because Russert was "the world's most famous television newsman" who was bound to be questioned by investigators.

In their closing statements, both sides acknowledged the broad political issues underlying the case.

Wells pleaded with jurors not to allow their personal opinions of an unpopular war to affect their verdict.

"Don't in this case sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or how you may feel about the Bush administration," Wells said. "You give him a fair shake…. This is a man with a wife and two children."

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald argued that Cheney's office was behind many of the prewar claims that Iraq had stockpiles of banned weapons and that it had aggressively sought to silence critics. "Let's talk straight," he said. "There is a cloud over the vice president."

Single page

In Closing Pleas, Clashing Views On Libby's Role (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Defense lawyers and prosecutors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. made their final summations on Tuesday, offering the jury two starkly different ways to evaluate the evidence presented over the last few weeks.

In their closing statements, the prosecutors presented a detailed and businesslike summing up of their case that Mr. Libby willfully lied to both a grand jury and F.B.I. agents investigating the leak in the summer of 2003 of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, countered with an intensely emotional defense ending in a choked sob. He argued that Mr. Libby's testimony to the grand jury and his interviews with the Federal Bureau of Investigation may have contained inaccuracies but that they were the result of innocent memory lapses explained by his pressing schedule of national security issues.

Unlike the prosecutors, Mr. Wells stalked about the courtroom during his summation, his cadence and pitch varying, but his tone of outrage constant.

"If it turned out that what he said was wrong that doesn't mean he is a liar," Mr. Wells told the jury. "It means he may have misrecollected what happened."

Mr. Libby, who faces five felony counts, was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff in the summer of 2003 when Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed publicly. The jury is expected to begin its deliberations on Wednesday, after final instructions from Judge Reggie B. Walton.

DOJ_NMG_0134564

In his closing argument, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, said that disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity was used by the White House to discredit her husband's assertions that the Bush administration had distorted intelligence to justify invading Iraq. He said the disclosure of her name cast a cloud over the Bush White House in general and over Mr. Cheney in particular.

But Mr. Wells argued for the defense that when Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed in the summer of 2003, Mr. Libby had been so preoccupied with growing questions about the inability of United States forces in Iraq to find any unconventional weapons, a principal justification for going to war, that he did not have time to pay attention to the issue of Ms. Wilson.

"The wheels are falling off the Bush administration," Mr. Wells said. "Thousands of young kids are on the ground there. It's a crazy period."

"This is a man with a wife and two children; he is a good person," Mr. Wells told the jury in his final words. "He's been under my protection for the last month. I give him to you. Give him back to me."

With that, Mr. Wells teared up, sobbed audibly and sat down.

Mr. Fitzgerald and Peter Zeidenberg, another prosecutor, told the jury that Mr. Libby learned about Ms. Wilson's role as a Central Intelligence Agency employee from several of his fellow Bush administration officials. He then discussed her with reporters, they said, as part of an effort to discredit the claims made by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, that the administration had twisted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium from Africa to justify going to war.

"Mr. Libby had a motive to lie and the motive matches up exactly with the lie he told," Mr. Fitzgerald told the jury. "He made up a story and stuck to it."

Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak. Only days before, The New York Times had published an Op-Ed article by her husband recounting how he had been sent to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq was trying to buy uranium for its weapons program. He asserted that there was no truth to President Bush's claim in the January 2003 State of the Union address that there was evidence of Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Africa.

Mr. Novak wrote that Mr. Wilson was chosen for the Africa mission by the C.I.A. at the suggestion of his wife. That assertion, echoed by other critics of Mr. Wilson, tended to diminish the importance of his trip, with its suggestion of nepotism.

Mr. Fitzgerald seemed for the first time to lend his weight publicly to the assertion by critics that Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed to punish Mr. Wilson and undermine his credibility.

Mr. Fitzgerald said the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity had left "a cloud over the White House over what happened" as well as a cloud over Mr. Cheney because he had been behind the effort to counter Mr. Wilson's charges.

Neither Mr. Libby nor anyone else was charged with unlawfully disclosing Ms. Wilson's identity. But Mr. Libby was charged with misleading the grand jury and investigators.

"Don't you think the American people are entitled to a straight answer?" Mr. Fitzgerald asked of the jury. He said that "a critic points fingers at the White House and as a result his wife gets dragged into the newspapers."

He said Mr. Libby "made a gamble, he threw sand in the eyes of the grand jury" rather than tell the truth and risk being prosecuted for leaking her name.

Mr. Zeidenberg began the day for the prosecution by telling the jury that the parade of witnesses the government had presented demolished the contention of Mr. Libby's lawyers that he merely had a bad memory and forgot a whole series of conversations he had about Ms. Wilson.

"He claims he forgot nine conversations with eight people over a four-week period," Mr. Zeidenberg said. He was referring to a former spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, a senior State Department official and two C.I.A. officials, all of whom testified that they had informed Mr. Libby in early July 2003 of Ms. Wilson's role at the agency and three reporters who spoke to Mr. Libby in that period. Mr. Zeidenberg then noted that Mr. Libby had sworn under oath that those people must have been wrong because he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity days later on July 10 or 11 from Tim Russert of NBC News.

Both sides agreed that Mr. Russert's testimony was crucial to the case.

Mr. Wells's response to the prosecution's claim of an avalanche of testimony from so many people was to try to convince the jury that only two of the witnesses counted in the indictment, Mr. Cooper and Mr. Russert.

Mr. Wells set about disparaging Mr. Russert's credibility and memory. "In a case where what is at stake is a man's freedom and reputation, you have to in this situation give the benefit of the doubt to Mr. Libby," Mr. Wells said.

DOJ_NMG_0134565

Mr. Wells argued that Mr. Libby held one of the world's most high-stress jobs and was trying to prevent another attack like the ones on Sept. 11, 2001. "He was bombarded with a blizzard of information," Mr. Wells said, noting the intelligence briefings Mr. Libby received daily. "Those briefings would make your toes curl," he said.

Mr. Fitzgerald countered that Mr. Russert's testimony was not needed to convict Mr. Libby. "If Tim Russert were run over by a bus and had gone to the great news desk in the sky, you can still find plenty of evidence that the defendant lied," he said.

Scooter Jury Hears Of 'memory Lapse' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

The trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice-president's former chief of staff, closed on Tuesday with prosecutors accusing him of concocting a "ludicrous" story about how he learned the name of a CIA agent, while the defence called it "madness" to convict him on the basis of a witness "suffering public memory lapses".

Making closing arguments in the month-long perjury and obstruction of justice trial, which could see Mr Libby face up to 30 years in prison, the lawyers offered competing narratives to explain how and when Mr Libby discovered the identity of Valerie Plame, the wife of ambassador Joe Wilson who had emerged as a leading critic of the Iraq war.

Peter Zeidenberg, a prosecution lawyer, argued that Mr Libby had a clear motive to lie to protect his job and Vice-President Dick Cheney from whom he first learned the name of Ms Plame on June 11 2003.

He set out nine separate conversations during June and early July 2003 in which Mr Libby discussed Ms Plame with reporters and administration officials. "Is it conceivable that all those nine witnesses make the same error in their memory?" he asked. "This is a case of lying, not conspiracy."

The defence yesterday portrayed Mr Libby as so preoccupied with national security issues in his 14-hour work day that he merely forgot details about Ms Plame. They argue the case boiled down to the credibility of two men: Mr Libby and Tim Russert, an NBC talk show host and one of the most respected Washington journalists.

Mr Libby argued that he learned about Ms Plame from him and was "taken aback" to hear it during a conversation they had on or about July 10. Mr Russert, however, unequivocally denied that while giving evidence during the trial.

Theodore Wells, the main defence lawyer, sought to undermine the credibility of the prosecution witnesses in an effort to make the case as much about the media's ability to recall events accurately as his client's memory lapses.

"Mr Russert has memory problems," he said. "Do not convict Scooter Libby on the word of someone who is suffering public memory lapses."

The jury is due to begin its deliberations on Wednesday.

Libby 'Told A Dumb Lie,' Prosecutor Says In Closing Argument (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to investigators about his role in leaking a CIA officer's identity in order to keep his job and protect the White House from political embarrassment, prosecutors told jurors yesterday in the closing arguments of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial.

Pointing to a courtroom screen showing eight witnesses who contradicted Libby, Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald said it was no coincidence that Bush administration colleagues and reporters recalled Libby as intensely focused on undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame early in the summer of 2003, as her husband was publicly challenging the White House's rationale for going to war in Iraq.

"This is something important, something he was focused on, something he was angry about," Fitzgerald said. "He had a motive to lie, and . . . he stole the truth from the justice system."

Libby "told a dumb lie and got caught" when leak investigators refused to go away, Fitzgerald said. He added that Libby's lies had "left a cloud over the vice president" because Cheney's role in the leak remained unclear.

But two defense attorneys argued that Libby was a harried and hardworking public servant who was guilty only of forgetfulness about a relatively insignificant matter given his pressure-cooker job.

DOJ_NMG_0134566

In impassioned, and at times disjointed arguments, the defense lawyers drew attention to numerous witnesses who had faulty or questionable memories and conflicting recollections. They said it was unfair to assume that the witnesses had made honest mistakes but that Libby's untruths were deliberate.

"If you're not sure, that's not guilty," said attorney Theodore Wells Jr. "It's impossible to say with any degree of certainty that Mr. Libby is engaged in intentional lying."

Libby is charged with five felonies: two counts of lying to FBI agents, two counts of perjuring himself in grand jury testimony and one count of obstructing the federal probe into whether Bush administration officials illegally leaked classified information by disclosing Plame's identity to reporters.

They say Libby lied when he told investigators he learned about Plame from NBC's Tim Russert and passed it along as unconfirmed gossip.

Libby has pleaded not guilty, contending he inaccurately remembered conversations that he recounted to FBI agents and a grand jury. No one is charged with the leak itself.

The 12-member jury will receive instructions from presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton early today about how to weigh the high-profile case against Libby. Jurors are expected to begin deliberations before noon.

Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, whose accusations in 2003 that the Bush administration twisted intelligence to justify the war with Iraq set in motion events leading to the leak of his wife's name in a syndicated column by Robert Novak. Wilson's claims infuriated Cheney and others in the White House, and Cheney deputized Libby to contact reporters and rebut Wilson's claims.

Wilson turned out to be a potent critic. He had been sent to Niger by the CIA a year earlier to check on reports that Iraq had tried to obtain material for nuclear weapons there, and concluded that the reports were false. Within days of Wilson going public about his findings in July 2003 , the White House acknowledged that President Bush's State of the Union address should not have included the assertion that Iraq was trying to purchase uranium.

Fitzgerald told the jury yesterday that Libby was engaged in a campaign to make reporters skeptical of Wilson. His wife's post at the CIA and her role in suggesting him for the mission became a useful tool to insinuate that he wasn't qualified for the mission to Niger. The prosecutor disputed the defense's argument that Libby did not remember Plame because she was so trivial to him.

"To [Libby] she wasn't Valerie Wilson, she's wasn't a person," the prosecutor said, sipping from a plastic cup of water as he walked back and forth in front of the jury box. "She was an argument, a fact to use against Joe Wilson."

Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg, summing up the government's evidence, said Libby "absolutely fabricates two conversations that never happened" -- with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper and NBC's Russert. He said Libby's claim that he didn't remember the conversations was "just not credible" because Cheney considered the matter very important and it commanded much of Libby's time.

Zeidenberg also said Libby had several motives to lie. The president had said he would fire whoever had disclosed Plame's identity, a criminal investigation had begun, and, at Libby's urging, Cheney had personally vouched for Libby, getting the White House to say publicly that Libby was not the leaker.

In the defense's closing argument, Wells countered that the case was simply "he said, she said." He contended that it was "madness" to try to convict Libby of a crime based on his foggy memory about fragments of conversations that were the subject of FBI questions three and four months after they took place.

"It's a case about different recollections between Mr. Libby and some reporters," Wells said. "This is an important trial, and I represent an innocent man."

Wells said that Libby honestly believed he learned about Plame for the first time from Russert in a July 10, 2003, conversation -- a month after he was actually told about her by the vice president, Libby later acknowledged. Wells emphasized to the jury that Russert first told the FBI that he couldn't completely rule out discussing the subject with Libby because he talks to so many people.

"That's reasonable doubt right there," Wells said of an FBI agent's notes. "If you say, 'I believe Mr. Russert beyond a reasonable doubt,' my client's life would be destroyed. His reputation would be destroyed."

DOJ_NMG_0134567

Defense attorney William Jeffress Jr. reminded the jury of the pointed questioning that Libby endured when Fitzgerald asked Libby several different ways about nearly every conversation he had in a two-month period in 2003.

"It's not easy being in a grand jury. And Mr. Libby was there for eight hours," Jeffress said. "If he got something wrong in eight hours of questioning, that wasn't an intentional lie. Which witness came in here that didn't get something wrong?"

Jeffress highlighted the conflict between testimony of former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, who said he had not told Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus about Plame, and Pincus's account, in which Fleischer was his source for that information. Jeffress said there were a lot of possible explanations, including that Fleischer lied.

"Of course, possibilities don't cut it in a criminal case," Jeffress said.

The Defense Rests, And Not A Minute Too Soon (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

For a brief moment yesterday, Scooter Libby was not a former White House aide on trial for perjury. He was an orphan in need of a loving home.

"He's been under my protection for the last month; now I'm entrusting him to you," defense lawyer Ted Wells told the puzzled jurors.

His voice breaking, the $700-an-hour lawyer pleaded: "Give him back! Give him back to me!"

Wells sobbed loudly and went back to his chair, where he sat staring at the floor and emitting the occasional sniffle.

Exactly what Wells was trying to achieve with this outburst -- if he intended it at all -- was a mystery. And that made it an appropriate coda for the defense's closing argument in the CIA leak case yesterday. Wells, who has successfully defended the likes of Robert Torricelli and Mike Espy, may yet win an acquittal from the jury, which will start deliberations today. But it won't be because of the cohesion of his closing arguments. Libby was alternately portrayed as a man who told the truth, a man who inadvertently misspoke, and the victim of conspiracies involving everybody from President Bush to Tim Russert.

Wells's shots rang out from every direction.

On his client: "He's not stupid, man."

On the prosecutors: "Think about the madness!"

On his opening argument: "Maybe I was drunk or something."

On prosecution witness Judith Miller: "Ms. Miller's gone. Boom!"

On Bush's chief strategist: "Karl Rove lied!"

On Bush's press secretary: "Gimme a break.' "

What he lacked in focus, Wells made up for in folksiness. He used words such as "skullduggery" and said White House intelligence briefings "make your toes curl." He credited his partner with "a Perry Mason moment in the courtroom" and informed the jury: "I'm gonna give you a homework assignment."

Wells returned repeatedly to a note written by Vice President Cheney expressing concern that Libby was being sacrificed to protect others. "Ted Wells didn't write that!" he exclaimed. Making a crawling motion, he elaborated: "I didn't crawl into the White House, get into a time machine and go back and forge the vice president's handwriting."

At times, Wells asserted that his client told the truth. "I represent an innocent person," he told the jury. "He didn't leak to anybody!" At other times, he portrayed Libby as benignly befuddled. "No question he's gotten some things wrong in the grand jury, no question about it," he granted. "It may turn out that Mr. Libby is totally confused." Or maybe he was tricked by prosecutors, who were "beatin' on him in the grand jury." Reasoned Wells: "Libby should not be penalized for having a different memory system from the investigators."

Of course, one man's "different memory system" is another man's perjury. And that's why Wells had a series of slides to accompany his argument with titles that read like political attack ads: "Serious questions have been raised about Russert's credibility. . . . No 'Smoking Gun' Documents. . . . Memory problems were common in this trial."

Some of the memory problems, as it happens, were Wells's. Just minutes into his argument yesterday, he confused Libby's grand jury testimony with his answers to the FBI; he quickly corrected himself. Earlier in the trial, Wells twice confused Steve

DOJ_NMG_0134568

Hadley, now Bush's national security adviser, with former CIA spokesman Bill Harlow. At another point, he absentmindedly read to the jurors from an exhibit of a newspaper article, neglecting to stop even as he pronounced "Copyright 2004, the New York Times." He resumed reading the article from the beginning before observing: "I read that already."

After modest attendance throughout the Libby trial, yesterday's closing arguments were as packed as a JetBlue terminal; even the "overflow room" was overflowing with lawyers and journalists sitting on the floor. Peter Zeidenberg, leading off the closing arguments for the prosecution, delivered two hours of matter-of-fact chronology, detailing how Libby leaked the identity of a covert CIA operative and then said otherwise to the FBI and a grand jury.

Zeidenberg's low-key delivery only made Wells seem more flamboyant. Tall and mustachioed, Wells paced in front of the jurors, a vein in his neck protruding as he recited, indignantly, the various wrongs done his client.

"They were hanging him out to be a public scapegoat!" Wells said of Libby's colleagues in the White House. "Andy Card" -- Bush's chief of staff -- "blew him off!" Wells also held Cheney responsible: "The vice president of the United States had directed him to talk with Judith Miller." Nor did the defense stop there. "And President Bush was behind it, too," Wells argued.

Wells portrayed prosecution witness Russert, the NBC News Washington bureau chief, as the type of man who forgets where he parked his car. "Mr. Russert has memory problems," the lawyer told the jurors during a lengthy assault on Russert's gray matter.

The worst treatment, naturally, was reserved for the prosecutors, who were at least twice accused of "madness." Said Wells: "It's outrageous! Just outrageous! They haven't given you anything."

Wells had so thoroughly skewered his opponents that he lost track of time. Racing to finish before his allotted time expired, he skipped through slides with remarks such as "I got seven minutes here" and "Next slide!" and "Move!"

"Where am I on time?" he asked a colleague.

"You're over," came the answer.

"Yeah," Wells said, "but by how much?"

It was late in the afternoon when Wells finally finished the last of his slide show. He was practically breathless as he made his final tug at the jurors' heartstrings. "Give him a fair shake," he pleaded. "This is a man with a wife, two children." In the front row, Libby's wife, Harriet Grant, began to cry; after Wells uttered his closing sob, she gave a kiss on the cheek to Wells's mother, sitting in a wheelchair.

But Wells, overcome, was not so pleased. He returned to his chair, where he sat, staring at the floor, for 10 minutes. His colleagues kept their distance. Libby walked over to give his thanks, but the spent Wells, dispatching his client with a brief word, resumed his study of the courtroom floor.

Ted Wells, Center Of The Defense (WP)

By Linton Weeks, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Scooter Libby's Attorney Makes His Case for the Powerful

For most of the month-long trial, Ted Wells, Scooter Libby's high-priced attorney, had been all smiles. He laughed. He shared light moments with the judge, the jury and with his opponent, special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald. At one point Wells and Fitzgerald were so palsy-walsy, Judge Reggie B. Walton chastised them.

Yesterday, in his closing argument, he struck a much different note. Speaking to the jury, Wells said Libby "has been in my protection for the past month."

Now, he told them, he was turning Libby over to them.

Then, as he asked the jury to presume Libby's innocence and "give him back to me," Wells began to cry. He sat down at the defense table and wiped his eyes.

It was a strange moment in a strange case.

Before beginning his argument yesterday morning, he paced in front of the empty jury box. He stood in a corner --tall, athletic, mustachioed -- like a fighter imaging the bout to come. Under the outwardly gentle guise you could see an inner toughness of someone who will use any combination of punches to win big.

DOJ_NMG_0134569

Family and friends came to watch him work. At one point he stopped to check on his 83-year-old mother, Phyllis, who sat in a wheelchair in the courtroom aisle.

There were moments when he seemed out of sync, checking on how much time he had left, hurrying through slides in his PowerPoint presentation.

At other times, he was impressive, trying to convince the jury that the prosecution was attempting to ruin Libby based on a few conversations with reporters. In charcoal suit, white shirt and red tie, he marched through pertinent evidence, occasionally lapsing into shtick.

He said he didn't agree with the way the prosecution portrayed his opening argument. "Maybe I was drunk or something," he said, working the jury like a Jay Leno audience.

"Ted has a wonderful demeanor," says Stanley M. Brand, a Washington litigator who has worked with Wells. "He's a master tactician. He's a bulldog, but in a gentle way."

Brand considers Wells -- a native Washingtonian who is a partner in the New York-based firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison -- to be "one of the five best trial lawyers in the country."

Wells would not sit for an interview for this story. But through conversations and e-mails with friends, colleagues, his mother and others who know him well, a portrait emerges of a tough defense attorney who has mastered the balance between easygoing and hard-charging.

Often he stands up for the Big Guy, comforting the comfortable. When some political or corporate hotshot has been charged with white-collar wrongdoing, Wells is likely to come to the defense. He has championed the causes of ExxonMobil, Schering-Plough and Carnival cruise lines.

After all, somebody has got to do it.

He's had victories. He successfully represented Clinton administration agriculture secretary Mike Espy and former senator Robert Torricelli. In 1987, he represented Raymond J. Donovan, a former Reagan administration labor secretary, and others on fraud charges. When the prosecution rested, Wells did not put any defense witnesses on the stand, a minimalist maneuver for which he's famous. The jury announced 137 acquittals.

In 1999, Brand called Wells in as a fireman in the case of Clinton-Gore fundraiser Franklin Haney, who was in court on 42 counts of election law fraud. "Ted and I went to trial," says Brand. "Boom! Forty-two acquittals."

Wells has had failure, too. In 2001 he represented Mitsubishi in a criminal antitrust case. The company was accused of price-fixing. One reason he lost the case, he has said, is because a week before jury deliberations began, the movie "Pearl Harbor" came out.

Born in Washington in 1950, Theodore V. Wells Jr. grew up in a small rowhouse in Northwest. His mother -- known in the neighborhood as Ma Wells -- still lives there. "He was like an all-American boy," Phyllis Wells says of her son. "He didn't give me trouble."

She was a mailroom clerk at the Department of the Navy for 35 years. His father was a taxi driver with a sixth-grade education. When Wells was very young, his parents split. He was raised by his mother. He has a younger sister, Toni, who lives in the District, and several half-brothers and sisters from his father's other marriages.

"He did extremely well in school," his mother remembers. She says he kept track of his grades on a piece of paper and would make out his own report card before the official one was issued. Once in elementary school he received a grade he felt he didn't deserve. He went to the teacher, pointed out the error and she changed the grade. "He knew how to argue his case," Phyllis Wells says, "even back then."

At Coolidge High School, he was passionate about football. He played center. He was smart enough to help call the plays, recalls Wells's coach, Phillip Gainous, and was strong enough to protect the quarterback.

"He was a tough guy," Gainous says. "One time he broke his coccyx -- his tailbone. He didn't miss any games. We made a doughnut for him by cutting a hole in a piece of foam. We stuck it down his pants and sent him in. He played through the pain."

Gainous, now the principal at Blair High School, says that Wells was not an arguer. "But he would," Gainous says laughing, "debate with you."

DOJ_NMG_0134570

At 6-feet-2 and 225 pounds, Wells was offered various college athletic scholarships. He chose Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass. After his first year, Wells quit the team to focus on academics.

About Wells "there was a kind of intensity I recognized early on," says Holy Cross classmate Edward P. Jones, a fellow Washingtonian who went on to win the 2004 Pulitzer Prize for Fiction.

As freshmen, Jones and Wells roomed in the same dorm. Jones remembers that one time he and Wells and several other students borrowed a car to go to New York to meet with law-school recruiters at Fordham University. The caffeine-fueled driver was sophomore and future Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

Wells graduated from college in 1972 and from Harvard University in 1976 with degrees in law and business. Along the way he married his high school sweetheart, Nina Mitchell. They were both 21. Today she is the secretary of state for New Jersey. They have two children: Teresa, 28, and Phillip, 26.

He worked for several New Jersey law firms over the years. He was national treasurer for Sen. Bill Bradley's presidential run in 2000. That same year became co-chair of the Paul Weiss litigation department.

He is proud of his longtime association with the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund. Last year, according to the National Law Journal, he helped defend desegregation education programs in two cases before the Supreme Court.

He also prides himself on being one of the rare trial lawyers in the country with a national jury trial practice. Last year the National Law Journal named him Lawyer of the Year.

Longtime friend Vernon Jordan called Wells up on Super Bowl Sunday and asked him over to his house to eat some chili and watch the game. Wells thanked him but said he was too busy preparing for the Libby case. "He works very hard," Jordan says.

And as for Wells's demeanor, Jordan says, "you don't have to be an [expletive] to win cases."

Washington attorneys took the day off yesterday to watch his big-league matchup with Fitzgerald. Wells -- who didn't put Libby on the stand -- argued that his client is an innocent man with a bad memory. Fitzgerald said Libby lied under oath.

There in the middle of the courtroom, Wells was playing center again, helping call the plays and protecting the guy with the ball. Laughing in the beginning, crying in the end.

Justice Rebuffs Call For Berger Inquiry (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

The Justice Department says it is unaware of any new facts to support a call by the former chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee for a new investigation into the theft of National Archives documents by former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger.

Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling, in a letter Friday to the committee's new Democratic chairman, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California, said an "extensive investigation" led to a guilty plea by Mr. Berger in which he admitted removing the classified documents and the department "stands by its investigation."

"The department takes investigations regarding the mishandling of classified information and documents very seriously, and vigorously investigates and prosecutes those who endanger our national security," Mr. Hertling said.

His letter was in response to a report by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and now the committee's ranking member, saying Justice gave Mr. Berger a "free pass" in its investigation and called for the committee to investigate the matter instead.

In a terse letter signed by 17 Republicans, Mr. Davis said the Justice Department was "unacceptably incurious" about Mr. Berger's visits to the Archives in May 2002 and July 2003 and never told the September 11 commission that he removed original, uninventoried documents. Mr. Davis also said the department failed to administer a polygraph examination, despite the test being part of a plea agreement Mr. Berger signed in exchange for a lesser sentence.

Mr. Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser from 1997 to 2001, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material. He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years.

DOJ_NMG_0134571

The material was removed while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, which was investigating intelligence and security failures.

David Marin, the oversight committee's Republican staff director, said the Justice Department told the September 11 commission that it had everything Mr. Berger removed from the Archives and that the nation's national-security exposure was "zero."

But, he said, no one told the commission -- including September 11 commission Executive Director Philip Zelikow and General Counsel Dan Marcus -- that Mr. Berger had access to original documents, which he could have taken without detection.

"We wanted the highest possible level of assurance that Mr. Berger did not take other documents," Mr. Marin said. "We still have the same concerns. Obvious investigative tools were not used. If you do not look, you will obviously not find the evidence."

In his letter, Mr. Hertling said the Justice Department and the FBI devoted "significant resources" to the Berger probe, conducted more than 50 interviews, inspected the Archives facilities, and reviewed thousands of pages of documents. He also disputed the report's conclusion that the department did not inquire about Mr. Berger's first two visits to the Archives.

"Neither Mr. Berger nor any other witness provided the department with evidence that Mr. Berger had taken any documents beyond the five referenced in the plea agreement," he said.

Berger Case Still Roils Archives, Justice Dept. (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

In a chandeliered room at the Justice Department, the longtime head of the counterespionage section, the chief of the public integrity unit, a deputy assistant attorney general, some trial lawyers and a few FBI agents all looked down at their pant legs and socks.

While waving his own leg in the air in illustration, Paul Brachfeld, inspector general of the National Archives and Records Administration, asked the group rhetorically if "something white" could be easily mistaken if it was wrapped around their legs, beneath their pant legs.

Under debate during the Nov. 23, 2004, meeting was Brachfeld's contention that President Clinton's former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger could have stolen original, uncatalogued, highly classified terrorism documents 14 months earlier by wrapping them around his socks and beneath his pants, as National Archives staff member John Laster reported witnessing.

Brachfeld said he was worried that during four visits in 2002 and 2003, Berger had the opportunity to remove more than the five documents he admitted taking. Brachfeld wanted the Justice Department to notify officials of the 9/11 Commission that Berger's actions -- in combination with a bungled Archives response -- might have obstructed the commission's review of Clinton's terrorism policies.

The Justice Department spurned the advice, and some of Brachfeld's colleagues at the Archives greeted his warnings with accusations of disloyalty. But more than three years later, as Brachfeld and House lawmakers have pushed new details about Berger's actions onto the public record -- such as Berger's use of a construction site near the Archives to temporarily hide some of the classified documents -- Brachfeld's contentions have attracted fresh support.

A report last month by the Republican staff of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee said for the first time that Berger's visits were so badly mishandled that Archives officials had acknowledged not knowing if he removed anything else and destroyed it. The committee further argued that the 9/11 Commission should have been told more about Berger and about Brachfeld's concerns, a suggestion that resonated with Philip Zelikow, the commission's former executive director.

Zelikow said in an interview last week that "I think all of my colleagues would have wanted to have all the information at the time that we learned from the congressional report, because that would have triggered some additional questions, including questions we could have posed to Berger under oath."

The commission's former general counsel, Dan Marcus, now an American University law professor, separately expressed surprise at how little the Justice Department told the commission about Berger and said it was "a little unnerving" to learn from the congressional report exactly what Berger reviewed at the Archives and what he admitted to the FBI -- including that he removed and cut up three copies of a classified memo.

DOJ_NMG_0134572

"If he took papers out, these were unique records, and highly, highly classified. Had a document not been produced, who would have known?" Brachfeld said in an interview. "I thought [the 9/11 Commission] should know, in current time -- in judging Sandy Berger as a witness . . . that there was a risk they did not get the full production of records."

In an April 1, 2005, press conference and private statements to the commission, the Justice Department stated instead that Berger had access only to copied documents, not originals. They also said the sole documents Berger admitted taking -- five copies of a 2001 terrorism study -- were later provided to the commission.

Those assertions conflicted with a September 2004 statement to Brachfeld by Nancy Kegan Smith, who directs the Archives' presidential documents staff and let Berger view the documents in her office in violation of secrecy rules. Smith said "she would never know what if any original documents were missing," Brachfeld reported in an internal memo.

In a letter to House lawmakers last week, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling did not address the issue of why the department told the commission so little. But Hertling wrote that in numerous interviews, "neither Mr. Berger nor any other witness provided the Department with evidence that Mr. Berger had taken any documents beyond the five."

Hertling said the department "stands by its investigation" and believes the guilty plea it negotiated with Berger on April 1, 2005, "was the best one possible in light of the available evidence." He also criticized the Archives staff for failing at the time to confront Berger, search him or contact security officials, saying this failure "had to be weighed against the evidence."

Brachfeld has similarly expressed frustration that Smith and others who suspected Berger of wrongdoing chose not to inform him of their suspicions until more than a week after Berger's last visit to the Archives. "If I had been notified, I would have put cameras in the room. I would have caught him leaving with documents on him. . . . We could have had FBI agents around the facility. . . . He would have been arrested," Brachfeld said.

Brachfeld pressed Justice Department officials on six occasions in 2004 to make a fuller statement to the commission about Berger's actions, to no avail. He also contacted Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine, who organized an April 2004 meeting between Brachfeld and Justice officials that convinced him that "these issues had to go before the 9/11 Commission," according to two people present.

But in a notification to the commission the following month, the department did not mention that Berger had cut up documents, that he reviewed uncatalogued originals or that Brachfeld worried that Berger's theft was greater.

In the Hertling letter, the department noted obstacles in its investigation. The FBI was not advised of the case until Oct. 15, 2003, almost two weeks after Smith concluded that Berger had stolen documents. By then, Archives General Counsel Gary Stern had called Berger and former Clinton lawyer Bruce Lindsey about it and obtained two documents from Berger, who surrendered them at home after first denying they were in his possession.

The letter also said that six months after beginning the probe and well after Berger testified to the commission, "the Department had not yet asked Mr. Berger any questions, as he had not yet agreed to an interview." Berger's lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said Berger first spoke to the FBI in March 2005 and was interviewed a second time in July of that year, after his April 1, 2005, guilty plea to unauthorized removal and retention of classified material.

Judge Deborah A. Robinson imposed a stiffer penalty in the case than the Justice Department sought, fining Berger a total of $56,905, canceling his security clearance, and requiring monthly reporting to a probation officer for two years. Breuer said Berger has also picked up trash in Virginia parks for 100 hours to fulfill a community service requirement, and he criticized the renewed attention to Berger's case.

"It never ceases to amaze me how the most trivial things can be politicized. It is the height of unfairness . . . for this poor guy, who clearly made a mistake," Breuer said.

Some of Brachfeld's colleagues have not been cheered by his new congressional support. An Archives lawyer, who Brachfeld said was one of those involved in the Berger case, this month sent Brachfeld an e-mail accusing him of poor judgment and stating that "I don't think it comes as a great surprise if I were to venture the opinion that senior management at this agency have serious problems with the manner in which your office conducted itself . . . during the Berger investigation."

DOJ_NMG_0134573

On Friday, Archivist Allen Weinstein assured Brachfeld in writing, however, that this criticism did "not reflect either my views or the views of the overwhelming majority of NARA employees."

Inquiry Of Campbell Staffers Wears On (HILL)

By Mike Soraghan

The Hill, February 21, 2007

It may have been forgotten by many, but the corruption investigation of the office of former Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (R-Colo.) isn't over.

The FBI and the Justice Department are pursuing the case, records show, nearly three years after it was opened and more than two years after Campbell left office. But charges have yet to be levied and an explanation as to why it's taken so long to wrap up has yet to be offered.

"I don't understand why it would take so long," said Tom Gorman, who heads a Denver-based, anti-drug task force and complained to the Justice Department that Campbell's office pressured him to award a no-bid contract. "It didn't seem to me to be that complicated of a case."

Campbell, too, said he's eager to put the investigation behind him, stressing that he has been told he is not a subject of the investigation. Investigators have not interviewed Campbell.

"Senator Campbell is eager to learn the results of the Department of Justice's investigation into the alleged actions of a former staff member," a Campbell spokeswoman, Kate Dando, said.

The "former staffer" is Campbell's onetime chief of staff, Ginnie Kontnik, who resigned just before the allegations surfaced. The Justice Department's anti-corruption unit is investigating a no-bid contract that Campbell and Kontnik tried to steer to a company co-owned by one of Campbell's top fundraisers. More sensationally, Kontnik allegedly shook down an underling for a $2,000 kickback in 2002.

A Jan. 12 letter from the Justice Department Criminal Division, obtained by The Hill, denied a request for documents about the investigation, saying they "relate to open and on-going law enforcement proceedings being conducted by the Public Integrity Section," referring to the department's anti-corruption unit.

The letter said releasing documents could interfere with the investigation.

A former Campbell staffer who came forward with the kickback allegation, Brian Thompson, said he figures the investigation has been shelved, even if the department says it's still open.

"I haven't talked to or seen anyone in this in a long time," Thompson said. "I think the FBI's interviewed everybody they can interview."

Since the Campbell allegations surfaced, the Justice Department has started an investigation of former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and sent him to prison. Former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) is also on his way to prison on related charges.

The allegations helped to tip the balance of power in the Senate. Amid the revelations, Campbell reversed his plan to seek a third term. He was replaced by a Democrat, Ken Salazar.

A Department of Justice spokesman, Bryan Sierra, declined to comment on the investigation or whether its status has changed since the date of the letter. Attempts to reach Kontnik were unsuccessful.

Since announcing his retirement, Campbell used unspent campaign funds to pay more than $150,000 in legal fees to the firm of Patton Boggs.

The investigation does not seem to be impeding Campbell's seven-figure lobbying job in Holland & Knight's Washington office. His client roster lists nearly 20 firms, including United Air Lines, the PGA Tour, the Washington Metro Transit Authority and the National Indian Gaming Association. Campbell and his firm recently landed the Seneca Nation of Indians.

Kontnik, Thompson and most of Campbell's other former staffers have been interviewed by the FBI, according to press accounts. Dando said the former senator always encouraged his former aides to cooperate.

Former District of Columbia U.S. Attorney Roscoe Howard said the secrecy of the investigation makes it difficult to determine whether prosecutors are sitting on the case or actively pursuing it. The case could be in someone's drawer, Howard said, or prosecutors could be negotiating a deal with one suspect and building cases against others.

DOJ_NMG_0134574

"At Public Integrity, I don't think they're particularly aggressive," Howard said. "The nature of their targets makes everybody a tad gun-shy, but they don't just sit on a case to sit on a case."

The allegations surfaced days after Kontnik resigned from Campbell's office in 2004.

Thompson, who had worked under Kontnik in Campbell's suburban Denver office, told the Denver Post that Kontnik gave him a bonus in 2002, but demanded $2,000 back so she could pay her divorce attorney.

Kontnik confirmed the basics of Thompson's account, but said the money was reimbursement for legitimate "political-slash-Senate-related expenses."

She said she got the money "under an arrangement previously agreed to by the senator [Campbell]," but then backed off, saying, "He might not have technically signed off on it."

Gorman's no-bid contract allegations became public after Campbell announced his retirement in March 2004. Records showed that Campbell and Kontnik worked to steer a $1.15 million appropriation to Thinkstream Inc. The company was co-owned by Michael Smith, Campbell's 1992 campaign-finance chairman. Gorman and the directors of his task force resisted awarding the contract without bidding.

Kontnik's attorney "categorically" denied wrongdoing in the Thinkstream matter, but not in the case of the alleged kickback.

FBI, DOJ Continues Probe Of Wisc. Travel (AP)

By Ryan J. Foley, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ: Probe Into Wisconsin's State Travel Contract Continues

MADISON, Wis. (AP) -- The FBI and the state Department of Justice are continuing their investigation into Gov. Jim Doyle's administration, investigators said.

With one state employee convicted of steering a travel contract to a company with political ties to the governor, the criminal probe "remains open," the state Division of Criminal Investigation said in a letter to The Associated Press.

The disclosure means an investigation that distracted Doyle during his first term in office and gave ammunition to his critics could continue into his second. Doyle has not been accused of wrongdoing and has defended his administration from accusations of corruption.

The news came in DCI administrator James R. Warren's Feb. 14 response to a public records request for documents relating to the agency's investigation of the travel contract.

Warren turned over more than 50 pages detailing the probe that led to last summer's conviction of Georgia Thompson, a state purchasing supervisor, on federal fraud charges.

But he declined to release an additional 105 pages, including 40 pages of FBI reports, that he said involve "persons other than those who testified at the trial of Georgia Thompson."

Their release would undermine the probe, he said. Warren also blacked out the identities of two people from the released records.

"DCI's investigation remains open, and releasing identifying information about these individuals would interfere with that ongoing investigation," he wrote.

Prosecutors said Thompson steered a contract to a company whose executives gave $20,000 to Doyle's re-election campaign. She is serving 18 months in prison. After her trial, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic in Milwaukee told reporters the probe was not over.

Doyle's opponent in the November election, Republican Mark Green, repeatedly claimed Doyle's administration was facing "an ongoing FBI investigation." But the probe seemed to fizzle out as months went by with no additional action.

Doyle's former top aide, Marc Marotta, figured prominently at Thompson's trial last June. Prosecutors introduced evidence showing he met with Adelman Travel Group officials before the bidding process and his phone line traded calls with company executives on a key date of the competition.

Marotta served as secretary of the Department of Administration from 2003 to October 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0134575

He did not testify at the trial and said afterward that he promised investigators he would not discuss his role in the award of the contract. But he broadly denied wrongdoing and kept a low-profile during Doyle's re-election campaign despite his role as chairman.

In the DOJ files, investigators note Thompson worked beneath two political appointees who worked for Marotta. Doyle's aides have argued the trial proved Thompson acted on her own -- despite some jurors' belief that higher-ups were involved.

Mike McCabe, director of the Wisconsin Democracy Campaign, which tracks political donations, said investigators last asked his group for information on Doyle's campaign donations weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

"I have not heard a peep since then," he said. "That's the last inkling we had about the nature of the investigation. It gave us the sense it was ongoing, it was both state and federal authorities involved, but that's all I know."

Kevin St. John, spokesman for Attorney General J.B. Van Hollen, declined comment. Administration spokesman Scott Larrivee referred questions to investigators.

Surprising New Evidence In The John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case (WREG)

WREG-TV, February 21, 2007

MEMPHIS, TN -- Today there is surprising new evidence in the John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case. With video and audiotapes, the FBI says Ford took thousands of dollars in bribes.

The hearing this afternoon is about the Rolex watch Ford said he received as a gift from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman. FBI agents seized the diamond-studded Rolex when they arrested Ford in May 2005 and now Ford's defense is trying to get the watch thrown out as evidence in the former Senator's corruption trail.

Today the government unveiled proof that the watch is relevant in the bribery case by introducing new undercover audio and video tapes.

At one point, Ford is heard saying to an undercover FBI agent that he is going to receive a $50,000 Rolex because he did Hyneman a big favor. He then tells the agent that Hyneman is a "rich white boy".

He is on video again later, showing off the Rolex and telling another FBI agent that he paid zero for the watch because he did the developer a big favor by saving them up to $1.5 million dollars.

Prosecutors are also trying to prove that Ford eased fines for environmental fines on some of Hyneman's projects and according to the govenment, this is why Ford got the watch.

John Ford Goes To Court Over Rolex Watch (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, February 21, 2007

We have new information on the bribery charges against John Ford.

Prosecutors want John Ford's Rolex watch to be used as evidence during his upcoming bribery trial.

They say prominent developer Rusty Hyneman gave Ford the watch in return for a favor, but the defense says Ford bought the $32,000 watch.

After hours of hearing arguments from prosecutors and the defense, the judge did not make a decision Tuesday about whether John Ford's Rolex watch can be used as evidence during his Tennessee Waltz bribery trial.

John Ford spent today in court over something similar to this $32,000 Rolex watch. In the end, the judge didn't decide whether it can be used as evidence in Ford's bribery trial.

His attorney Mike Scholl says, “We're just here to argue the motion today and whatever time the judge needs it's his decision so we're not anxious to push anything or anxious for a decision one way or another.”

Prosecutors say Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman bought Ford the watch.

They say Ford met with Hyneman on October 4, 2004 to talk about Hyneman's state environmental violations.

On Oct 14, Hyneman bought a $32,000 Rolex watch. On Oct 15, Ford tells an undercover FBI agent on a videotape that he needs his Rolex from Rusty Hyneman.

On November 19, Ford shows an undercover FBI agent a Rolex and says he did Rusty Hyneman a "big favor."

Rusty Hyneman plead the fifth amendment in court today when asked about the Rolex watch.

DOJ_NMG_0134576

His lawyer Jim Garts says, “They're basically on a fishing expedition on that and we advised Mr. Hyneman that he could exercise his constitutional right.”

Ford's lawyers say there's no proof Hyneman gave Ford the watch.

On Jan. 31, 2005, Ford changed his story. Ford told an undercover FBI agent he bought the watch.

FBI agents acknowledge Hyneman has not saved any money for state environmental violations he faces.

We also learned some new information about Ford's involvement with E-cycle.

That's the fake FBI company he's accused of taking bribes from.

Just months before his arrest, Ford was suspicious of the company.

During a conversation with FBI informant Tim Willis, Ford asks Willis, "Are they legit?"

He also asks Willis if he is working for the FBI.

Ford tells Willis, "If you are, just tell me. I got a gun. I'll just shoot you dead."

John Ford's trial starts on April 9th.

He is accused of taking bribes in return for sponsoring legislation for the fake FBI company called E-cycle.

Judge Mulls Decision After Ford's Rolex Hearing (WHBQ)

By Amy Cowman

WHBQ-TV, February 21, 2007

Memphis, Tenn. (WHBQ FOX13 MyFoxMemphis.com) -- The prosecution scored a partial victory in former state Senator John Ford's Tuesday Tennessee Waltz hearing. At the center of the court appearance is a $40,000 Rolex watch and a question over whether it was a gift or a bribe.

Former state Senator John Ford and his attorney's walked out of federal court with not much to say.

"We're not really going to comment on the hearing half," said Ford's attorney Michael Scholl. "The proof came out in the hearing as it is and the judge hasn't made a decision. So we'll wait on that decision."

Judge J. Daniel Breen did deny the defense's request to suppress the watch due to the way it was seized, saying the government had the right to seize it, but the judge still wants more proof on the relevance of the Rolex before he allows it into trial.

Ford declined to comment after the prosecution showed several taped conversations between Ford and undercover officers.

The conversations included segments where Ford referenced a $50,000 Rolex watch he said he paid nothing for and received from developer Rusty Hyneman in return for saving him more than a million dollars in fines.

Hyneman's attorney's advised him to plead the fifth on the witness stand.

"It was a bunch of embellishment by Senator Ford as to what happened," said Hyneman's attorney, Jim Jartz. "There were four or five different versions, one of those was apparently the state's theory. But pick which one and there's just no point in Mr. Hyneman subjecting himself to that when he's not a defendant."

The defense argued Ford never saved Hyneman money on fines, also they argued Ford paid for his own Rolex watch and made an even swap with Hyneman for a different watch, saying Ford boasted about things that weren't true.

Defense attorneys said the judge probably won't rule on whether the Rolex will be admitted until once the trial has begun.

Ford's trial is set to begin on April 9.

Memphis Developer Refuses Testimony On Ford Watch (WMC)

WMC-TV, February 21, 2007

Prosecutors and Defense Attorneys battled for hours over whether the now-infamous wrist watch should be allowed into evidence.

The judge is going to take some time to make that decision.

And some highly-anticipated testimony turned out to be a waste of "time."

We've shown you video of former Senator John Ford "caught on tape" before.

The feds say he took cash in exchange for political favors.

It's the same reason they say he accepted a Rolex watch from developer Rusty Hyneman.

Hyneman was as evasive outside court Tuesday as he was inside. He pleaded the 5th on every question concerning his relationship with Ford. In other words, he answered nothing.

"He's not a defendant, he's not on trial, he's not been charged with anything," said Hyneman's attorney Jim Garts. "So, there's really no point in him giving testimony in that courtroom," he added.

Prosecutors want the watch presented as evidence during Ford's upcoming corruption trial.

They say it proves Ford is willing to take a bribe. They presented audio and video tape of Ford boasting about the watch.

At one point, he's heard saying that he is going to receive a $50,000 Rolex because he did Hyneman a big favor.

He later tells an undercover agent that Hyneman is a quote "rich white boy."

"Whatever time the judge needs, it's his decision," said Ford's attorney Mike Scholl. "So, we're not anxious to push anything to anxious for a decision one way or the other," he added.

As usual, Ford was not willing to comment, for the most part. Reporter Jason Miles asked him what kind of watch he is currently wearing.

"You don't need to know that," Ford replied.

The judge might not make a decision about Ford's Rolex until his trial begins April 9th.

Sen. Cooper Intoxicated, Speeding, THP Charges (TENN)

By Leon Alligood, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, February 21, 2007

Lawmaker hurt in Feb. 7 wreck

State Sen. Jerry Cooper was legally drunk when he rolled his sport-utility vehicle on Interstate 24 earlier this month after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee Highway Patrol said Tuesday.

The Democrat from Morrison, 58, who was already free on bail on federal fraud charges, was charged with drunken driving and speeding in connection with the Feb. 7 one-vehicle wreck in Rutherford County.

As for how drunk he was, the THP wasn't saying Tuesday. A spokesman refused to disclose details of the charges, including the senator's blood-alcohol level and the estimated speed of his vehicle.

"Until it's been served, we cannot release the warrant," said Mike Browning, spokesman for the THP.

The legal threshold for drunkenness in Tennessee is 0.08.

Cooper was seriously injured in the wreck and is convalescing at home from rib fractures, a concussion and a severe arm injury. He will be arrested or required to turn himself in "when he is physically able," according to the THP statement.

Last week, Cooper's doctor said the senator would need months to heal. It wasn't clear Tuesday how long the senator could wait before being booked on the charges.

District Attorney General William Whitesell of Murfreesboro, whose office will prosecute the case, did not return a phone call Tuesday.

Efforts to contact the senator or his attorney, Jerry Summers of Chattanooga, were not successful. Neither returned calls.

In light of the accident, Summers has asked the judge in Cooper's fraud case to postpone the March 5 start date of the trial.

Information from The Associated Press was used in this report.

Contact Leon Alligood at 615-259-8279 or at lalligood@tennessean.com.

One On Trial Blames Another: His Twin Brother (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 21, 2007

Andre L. Henry - who stands accused of violent crimes against a police officer, two banks, two grand-jury witnesses, and eight fast-food restaurants - has offered jurors in his trial an unusual defense.

The man secretly recorded in a prison cell confessing?

Not him, Henry testified. It was his twin brother; they had traded cells in prison.

"We figured, why not?" Henry told jurors. "Who would know?"

A federal jury in Philadelphia is expected to begin deliberating Henry's fate this morning. If convicted of the most violent charges - including car-jacking and solicitation to murder - he probably faces life in prison.

In closing arguments yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle Rotella mocked Henry's assertion, and said the government had provided ample evidence that Henry doesn't have a twin brother.

"His story is just absurd," Rotella told the jury.

Federal officials say Henry is an extremely violent man. In addition to the charges in this case, he faces state murder charges and, according to grand jury testimony, was investigated for an alleged plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall.

The alleged 2003 plot against shoppers and commuters at the Center City mall had not been previously reported. Henry was never charged with terror-related crimes; he and his lawyer, Christopher Warren, have denied that any attack was planned.

Jurors in his trial have not been told directly about the alleged Gallery plan. But during cross-examination, Henry unexpectedly began to talk about it, accusing Rotella of fabricating evidence against his family.

"When the public hears about domestic terrorism, they're going to want to know what happened," Henry said. "Were these guys actual terrorists? What happened?"

"You were arrested, Mr. Henry," Rotella shot back. "That's what happened."

The government's best evidence of a terror plot is the secret recording of Henry made by his cell mate - an unredacted copy of which was reviewed by The Inquirer.

At one point, Henry, who is a black Muslim, said on tape that the purpose of the blasts, timed for rush hour near the Market East SEPTA station, would represent "domestic terrorism" against white Americans.

At another point on the recording, however, Henry said the purpose would be to divert Philadelphia police long enough to pull off a major bank robbery.

"Prior to robbing the bank, he was going to plant 17 pipe bombs in the Gallery," the cell mate, Kreg Williams, said during grand-jury testimony.

When Henry was arrested on a parole violation in 2003, agents from the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said they had found materials for making pipe bombs in his trunk.

In the basement of Henry's home, agents said, they found a Glock pistol, a Fanchini shotgun, a Marlin rifle, a Romanian AK-47 assault rifle, a Point Blank bulletproof vest, $14,000 in pink-dye-stained cash, and photos of Henry and others holding weapons.

As Henry sat in prison on the parole charge, the ATF received a letter from Williams.

"Henry's case is much more involved than the weapons...," Williams wrote. "I can wear a wire and get all the evidence on tape."

Williams, a self-styled jailhouse paralegal, was fitted with a wire. Under the guise of helping Henry prepare his legal case, Williams got him to talk.

Besides speaking about the alleged Gallery plot, Henry was recorded speaking about a car-jacking, a plan to kill a grand-jury witness, a 2003 shoot-out with a Philadelphia police officer, and two bank robberies.

In a tape excerpt played at trial, Henry described one of the bank robberies: "I jumped over the counter, and I emptied the drawers, and I told the manager to open up the... vault."

Henry is also charged with making straw gun purchases - using women who did not have criminal records to buy his weapons, including six assault rifles.

In closing arguments, Warren reminded jurors that most witnesses against Henry had testified hoping to reduce their prison sentences. The lawyer also noted that authorities had failed to obtain incriminating fingerprints or DNA from a trove of evidence, including the cash, seized at Henry's home.

Capano's U.S. Appeal Detailed (AP)

By Randall Chase

AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134579

DOVER, Del. - Thomas Capano's lawyer argued in a federal appeal yesterday that a judge had violated the convicted killer's constitutional right to a fair trial by refusing to let the jury consider charges other than murder and by allowing hearsay testimony.

In a 71-page brief supporting Capano's habeas corpus petition, attorney Joseph Bernstein said the Delaware Supreme Court had erred in upholding the judge's decision to give the 1998 jury only two options: acquittal or conviction for first-degree murder.

Under a 1980 U.S. Supreme Court ruling, a defendant in a capital murder case is entitled to jury instructions that include lesser offenses if any evidence supports those offenses, Bernstein told the Associated Press.

Capano, now 56, acknowledged in his trial that he had dumped the body of Anne Marie Fahey, who was Gov. Tom Carper's scheduling secretary, into the Atlantic Ocean, but said her death had been an accident.

"If you're on a jury and you hear that, and you only have two options, what are you going to do?" Bernstein said. "Even if you don't think it was intentional murder, you're not going to let him go."

Capano, once a wealthy and politically connected lawyer, was convicted of shooting Fahey, 30, in 1996, allegedly because she was breaking off an affair with him.

Bernstein also argued in the federal appeal that hearsay testimony by Fahey's friends and psychotherapists should have been excluded from the trial.

In 2001, the state Supreme Court upheld Capano's conviction, his death sentence, and Judge William Swain Lee's decision to reject lesser offenses such as manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide.

While finding that Capano's trial included "obvious hearsay," the Supreme Court said Lee had admitted it with careful limiting instructions to the jury.

Certain inadmissible hearsay testimony did not amount to reversible error, the court added.

"What we're saying is that, under state law, the Delaware Supreme Court was wrong," Bernstein said.

He said the overturning of Capano's death sentence last year and subsequent sentencing to life in prison without parole did not affect his federal appeal.

"When the jury was originally instructed, it was a capital case," he said.

Loren Meyers, a criminal appeals attorney with the state Department of Justice, did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment on Bernstein's filing. The state has until April 16 to file an answer.

Elmira Man Admits To Child Porn Charge (ELMSG)

Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette, February 21, 2007

John R. Maggese, 44, pleaded guilty today to a felony charge of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Maggesse was accused of having child pornography on a computer he owned from July 2003 through August 2005, the release stated. He received the images over the Internet; some of the images showed children under 12 years old.

Maggese is scheduled to be sentenced at 2 p.m. May 24 in U.S. District Court in Rochester. The charges carry a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment, a $250,000 fine, or both.

Investigator Pleads Guilty To Fraud Against Law Firms (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 21, 2007

A Montana man Tuesday pleaded guilty to defrauding law firms involved in major litigation by claiming to have proof of illegal activity by opposing counsel and parties.

Michael Lair, 46, headed consumerdefense.com Inc., which held itself out as a consumer complaint investigator and researcher for large fraud cases. Tuesday, Lair admitted to defrauding attorneys and litigants of more than $311,000 in 2003 and 2006 as he pleaded guilty to four counts of wire fraud before Southern District of New York Judge John Keenan.

Under a plea agreement with Assistant U.S. Attorney Helen Cantwell, Lair is expected to be sentenced to serve somewhere between 2 years and 3 months to 2 years and 9 months in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0134580

The victims of the fraud included two of Manhattan's top litigation firms, Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason; Anello & Bohrer; and Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman.

While the guilty plea Tuesday covered the litigation involving the Morvillo and Kasowitz firms, prosecutors had been prepared to obtain a superseding information that would have charged Lair with attempting to defraud 10 other firms in litigation in New York and other parts of the country.

Tuesday, with defense attorney Leonard Joy by his side, Lair told Judge Keenan, "I agreed with a number of law firms to supply information about the parties involved in legal actions in which the law firms were involved. I charged the firms' fees knowing that I did not have and could not have obtained such information."

Name partner Robert Morvillo was representing former AIG Inc. Chairman Maurice Greenberg in a dispute with the insurance giant when he was approached by Lair in 2005 with an offer to sell sensitive information about the company and opposing counsel.

Lair then allegedly turned around and tried to sell information to the opposing counsel about illegal and unethical acts purportedly committed by the Morvillo firm, when, in fact, he had no such information.

The Morvillo firm paid Lair $75,000 on behalf of Greenberg to provide information about alleged misconduct by AIG auditor PriceWaterhouseCoopers, but Lair never provided any information.

He then approached lawyers for AIG and said he had been hired by the Morvillo firm to hack into the company's computers and obtain telephone and e-mail records -- also a fabrication, according to the government.

Following Lair's arrest in November, Michael Bowe of Kasowitz Benson said Lair contacted him in March 2006, claiming to have information on hedge fund SAC Capital, which was being sued by Bowe's client, pharmaceutical company Biovail Corp., for allegedly colluding with analysts to publish misleading reports that damaged the company's stock price.

The Kasowitz firm paid Lair less than $5,000 for travel expenses to New York but never received any information from him.

"We paid $5,000 in travel expenses for one meeting that went nowhere," Bowe said Tuesday. "We never paid any money for services or information."

Lair also tried, prosecutors said, to have SAC Capital's lawyers pay $50,000 for the "information" that the Kasowitz firm had hired him to hack into SAC's computers.

According to the complaint the FBI had already been alerted to Lair's activities and agents were monitoring his communications with SAC's lawyers.

Morvillo could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

In addition to the two named New York law firms, the information filed against Lair alleged that between 2003 and 2006 he also defrauded 10 other law firms. He allegedly received $10,000 from New York attorneys involved in trade secrets litigation; $50,000 from an attorney representing an Internet services company in litigation with hedge funds; $25,000 from an attorney weighing whether to start litigation against a software development company; and $35,000 from an attorney representing an investor against a computer software company and its outside auditors.

The other firms were not named.

Cantwell is also seeking the forfeiture of $311,000, which represents the total Lair received from the 12 firms.

Lair, who has been behind bars since his arrest in November, is scheduled to be sentenced March 21.

Lawyer Admits Stealing More Than $20 Million (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

WHITE PLAINS (AP) - A lawyer pleaded guilty to stealing more than $20 million from a bank and at least one client, spending the loot on vacation homes, a wedding and generous salaries for his employees, authorities said.

Under a deal with prosecutors, Anthony Bellettieri, 53, faces more than a decade in prison after admitting in federal court to bank and mail fraud dating to at least 2003.

Bellettieri, a real estate lawyer, stole the funds through check kiting - taking money from his law firm's escrow account and writing checks on another account to cover the escrow account's losses.

DOJ_NMG_0134581

According to J.P. Morgan Chase, the primary victim, the tactic worked partly because he used checks with a printed error. The scheme fell apart after the bank issued correct checks in November.

Prosecutor Cynthia Keefe Dunne said the stolen money paid for, among other things, a swimming pool at Bellettieri's Pleasantville home, a family wedding, high salaries for the law firm's workers and condos in Miami Beach and Aruba.

Five Plead Guilty To Bilking Investors In Years-long Scam (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 21, 2007

Ring's victims were mostly churchgoers

SAN DIEGO – Five men have pleaded guilty in federal court to defrauding investors of $20 million in a long-term scam that preyed mostly on churchgoers.

John Harrell, the ringleader of the scam, admitted he recruited investors with bogus schemes and then spent all the money on himself and other members of the enterprise, said prosecutor Jason Forge.

Harrell pleaded guilty Tuesday before U.S. District Judge Thomas Whelan to fraud, conspiracy and money laundering charges. He faces a sentence of up to 335 years in prison, Forge said.

The others – Ocean Beach liquor store owner Gregg Stavros, Daniel Anderson, Kenneth Hodgell and John Reitz – pleaded guilty to fraud and tax charges, and each faces a maximum of 10 years in prison.

One of the bogus stories used to lure investors: Descendants of Mormon church founder Joseph Smith had created a $1.6 trillion trust fund held overseas, and investors were needed to bring the money back home.

"Mr. Harrell and his co-conspirators utilized a complex fraud scheme to steal millions through promises of high rates of return with no risk," said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego.

"He also preyed on his victims' religious faiths and their suspicion of government. Today's result will make others think twice before defrauding the American public."

The defendants used investor money to pay their rent, to pay for privately chartered flights, and to rent cars for themselves, Forge said. The rental car bill was more than $400,000 per year. The defendants targeted many of their victims through churches.

The massive fraud ring operated out of an Ocean Beach liquor store and a Mission Valley apartment complex. Millions of dollars were laundered through Stavros' Chris' Liquor Store in Ocean Beach, officials said.

Authorities described the organization as "a cult-like investment scheme" that operated out of San Diego beginning in the late 1980s.

Former Judge Collapses As He Is Sentenced For Child Porn Possession (LAT)

By Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

Ex-Orange County jurist Ronald C. Kline quickly recovers. He must serve 27 months in prison and register as a sex offender.

A former Orange County judge collapsed in a Los Angeles federal courtroom Tuesday moments after being sentenced to 27 months in prison for possessing child pornography, bringing a dramatic end to a case that tested privacy rights and nearly fell apart because of a computer hacker's role in the investigation.

Ronald C. Kline was standing with his hands in his pockets and swaying slightly as U.S. District Judge Consuelo B. Marshall indicated he would do prison time. Kline's knees suddenly buckled, and he fell backward, with his eyes closed, into the arms of one of his attorneys.

A nurse and paramedics rushed to the courtroom. . They monitored his heart and administered other tests on the 66-year-old Kline. He was on his feet about a half-hour later, and his attorneys said he was well enough to sit through the rest of the hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0134582

When it resumed, Marshall also ordered Kline to serve three years of strictly supervised probation. During that time, he cannot use the Internet or possess any technology — including a cellphone — that would allow Internet access without prior written approval.

Other conditions bar him from lingering within 100 feet of schools, parks and other common gathering points for children under 18. He must also register as a sex offender for the rest of his life.

Marshall said she based her ruling on a variety of factors, including a recommendation by probation officers that Kline serve from 27 to 33 months, the seriousness of the offense, Kline's lack of prior criminal history and his acceptance of responsibility.

Assistant U.S. Attys. Gregory W. Staples and Deirdre Z. Eliot said they were satisfied with the sentence, even though they had asked for the maximum 33 months.

The prosecutors spent a good deal of the hearing chronicling Kline's pursuit of an 18-year-old man he met while both were enrolled last year at a treatment center for sexual disorders. Kline had been ordered by the facility's staff to stay at least 10 feet away from the teen, who is described in court records as emotionally and developmentally disabled. Instead, Kline wrote him letters and asked him to move in.

Kline's attorneys were seeking probation for their client, arguing that he had accepted responsibility and was voluntarily undergoing rigorous treatment for what they described as a sex addiction. . They repeatedly pointed out that Kline broke no laws by interacting with the 18-year-old, who was legally an adult.

"This is a tragic case," said Paul S. Meyer, one of his attorneys. "Our client has obviously suffered throughout this entire ordeal."

Kline, who has been confined to his Irvine home and has had to wear an electronic monitoring device since his arrest, was ordered to surrender to U.S. marshals by May 21. He has never spoken publicly about the allegations. Given the chance to address the court Tuesday, Kline said he owed an apology to society in general and people he had met over the years.

"The problem is, I can't think of a way to say it to make any of it right," he said. "It would be a lifetime of apologies for what I did."

Appointed to the Orange County Superior Court bench in 1995, Kline enjoyed an impeccable reputation as a civil judge and was running unopposed for his second six-year term until he was arrested in November 2001 and charged with seven counts of possessing child pornography on his home and courthouse computers.

The investigation began after Bradley Willman, a Canadian hacker who saw himself as a computer cop, used a virus to gain access to Kline's home computer and download explicit diary excerpts about the judge's sexual desires and more than 1,500 pornographic photos of young boys.

Willman forwarded his findings to a Colorado-based Internet watchdog group, Pedowatch, which contacted Irvine police. Warrants were obtained months later that allowed searches of Kline's home and courthouse computers.

The case became a national spectacle and set the stage for one of Orange County's strangest elections. Talk radio hosts Ken and John of KFI-AM (640) set up a makeshift studio outside Kline's home, reading his diary entries in their daily broadcasts and urging voters to elect one of eleven write-in candidates challenging him for the judicial seat.

After the widespread publicity surrounding Kline's arrest, a former neighbor came forward with allegations that he was molested by Kline 25 years earlier. That case was dismissed in 2003 when the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated a California law that had waived statutory limits for old sex crimes.

That same year, the federal case also appeared to have collapsed amid a legal debate centered primarily on the credibility of the computer hacker and the timing of his "break-in."

Prosecutors argued that Willman played a limited role in their investigation and worked independently of any police agency. But defense attorneys equated Willman to a government agent and said his computer invasions were a "21st century wiretap" to secretly monitor, remove and deliver incriminating files to police.

In separate rulings, Marshall sided with the defense and suppressed the diary excerpts and photos found on his home and courthouse computers, concluding that the evidence was the fruit of the earlier illegal search of Kline's home computer by the hacker, who saw himself as working for police. And, she concluded, as an agent for the police, that hacker had needed a warrant to conduct the search legally.

DOJ_NMG_0134583

But prosecutors appealed her decision. And in October 2004, the case was resurrected by a three-judge panel of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. In an unpublished opinion, the justices ruled that the Canadian hacker was not working for the police when he accessed the judge's hard drives and therefore did not violate Kline's privacy rights. They found that even though there was ample evidence to support the contention that Willman was acting with the intent to assist law enforcement, there was no evidence that any police agency knew of his search beforehand.

In December 2005, months after the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear Kline's appeal, he pleaded guilty to four counts of possessing child pornography on his home computer and computer disks.

Owner Vows A Hassle In Escort-service Probe (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A California woman who is the target in an ongoing criminal probe into the operation of her District-based escort agency has told federal authorities she will "make life miserable" for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped, government attorneys say.

"I cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this case (civil and/or criminal) will set off, if permitted to advance for both sides," Deborah Jean Palfrey wrote in an e-mail to the U.S. Attorney's Office. "The press will have a field day at each of our expense."

Government attorneys referenced the e-mail in a recent motion to postpone civil forfeiture proceedings against Miss Palfrey pending the outcome of a criminal investigation. But an attorney for Miss Palfrey wants to move forward with the civil case, filing court papers last weekend detailing an attempt to depose former Clinton campaign adviser Dick Morris.

Mr. Morris, a news commentator who resigned from the Clinton campaign in 1996 amid a scandal involving escort services, is "the only customer of the service who has publicly admitted using the services for 'legal' sexual activity," Miss Palfrey's attorney wrote in court papers.

Attempts to reach Mr. Morris were not successful yesterday.

Miss Palfrey, of Vallejo, Calif., has been the target of a two-year investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Postal Service into whether she illegally earned money from prostitutes working as escorts for her business.

Miss Palfrey has not been charged criminally.

In October, federal agents seized more than $427,000 in cash and stocks from Miss Palfrey. In pleadings, authorities say the criminal investigation is ongoing.

Miss Palfrey's forfeiture attorney, Montgomery Blair Sibley, said yesterday he is seeking to depose Mr. Morris because the one-time presidential adviser already has admitted using escort services in the District in the mid-1990s, including, he said, Miss Palfrey's business, known as Pamela Martin & Associates.

"The only reason we mentioned Dick Morris is that he had publicly come out," Mr. Sibley said. "We are trying to keep the names of the other hundreds of clients private. ... Nobody wants a circus."

The U.S. Attorney's office declined to comment on the case yesterday.

In recent filings, Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. Cowden expressed concern about what he called Miss Palfrey's "recent threat to harass potential witnesses whose identities remain secret ... through calculated public disclosures of former customers' and former co-workers' identities."

Mr. Cowden also said authorities want to hold off on the pending civil seizure proceedings because it could affect the ongoing criminal investigation.

He said Miss Palfrey's attorney wants the government to turn over the names of cooperating witnesses. That could compromise the ability of criminal investigators to gather confidential information, he wrote.

"At this point, no good purpose would be served by facilitating claimant's apparent effort to expose and potentially embarrass former customers and co-workers of her 'full service' escort agency," Mr. Cowden wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0134584

Mr. Sibley declined to comment on the contents of Miss Palfrey's e-mail. But he disputed the idea Miss Palfrey might seek to "make life miserable" for clients and former employees.

"She's not looking to make life difficult for anyone," Mr. Sibley said.

According to Mr. Cowden's memo, Miss Palfrey's note to government attorneys also warned, "I can state with unequivocal certainty this situation will be a long and unpleasant one. ..."

Ex-ORNL Subcontractor Found Guilty In DOE Scheme (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 21, 2007

A lauded Oak Ridge businessman may soon be trading pinstripes for prison stripes.

A jury in U.S. District Court on Tuesday convicted Reginald Hall, 54, of conspiracy to commit money laundering for a scheme to plunder money from the U.S. Department of Energy via fake invoices submitted as a subcontractor for the Oak Ridge National Laboratory.

Jurors also found Hall guilty of money laundering and theft of government property. He was acquitted, however, of mail fraud and obstruction of justice.

The same jury returned a guilty verdict against Hall associate David Reeder for an act of money laundering but acquitted Reeder, who ran a subcontracting firm known as Biosphere, of conspiring with Hall to pull off a larger money laundering scheme.

Jurors, who heard days worth of testimony in a trial presided over by U.S. District Court Judge Tom Varlan, also found Hall's firm, Advanced Integrated Management Services Inc., guilty in the money laundering conspiracy.

Attorney Doug Trant, who represented Reeder, said his client plans to appeal.

So, too, does Hall, according to attorney Tom Dillard, who represented Hall along with attorney Wade Davies.

"Mr. Hall is disappointed in the verdicts on the convictions," Dillard said. "He maintains, as he always has, that no one was defrauded and that he always performed excellent work. He does plan to appeal and hopes ultimately to be vindicated."

Varlan has set a June 12 sentencing hearing.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Trey Hamilton and Greg Weddle prosecuted the case. Agents Randall Kizer and Rick Sample with DOE's Office of the Inspector General, Agent Bob Gibson of the FBI and Lt. Art Schettini of the Tennessee Valley Authority Police Criminal Investigation Division headed up the probe.

According to testimony, Hall once worked at ORNL but in 1995 formed AIMSI, a quality control consulting firm, and began winning a series of subcontracts with ORNL's prime contractors, including current management firm UT-Battelle.

Hamilton alleged that Hall began submitting invoices for work not performed and used associates like Reeder and Stanley W. Stevens, who pleaded guilty and testified against Hall, to help launder his ill-gotten gains.

UT-Battelle communications chief Billy Stair declined to comment on the verdict. When asked how the firm handled the aftermath of the probe, Stair said the "laboratory responded in two ways: We closely reviewed related contracts to make sure they were in order. We also stressed to our staff the need for heightened awareness of the checks and balances in our procurement system."

Hall and Reeder remain free on bond pending sentencing, as does Stevens.

Frank Munger contributed to this story. Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

Pr. George's Official Opened Fire Unprovoked, Deliveryman Says (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

A senior Prince George's County homeland security official who last month shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen opened fire without provocation after angrily ordering the men to leave his home, the surviving mover said in a statement provided last night to law enforcement authorities.

Keith A. Washington, who is also a county police officer, was combative almost from the moment the movers arrived at his Accokeek home, said Robert White, who worked for a contractor delivering for Marlo Furniture. "As we were leaving we reached the top of the steps, and the customer said, 'I know how to get you the [expletive] out of my house' and I heard gunshots," White said in the statement.

DOJ_NMG_0134585

Later, White said, he listened as he lay bleeding while Washington falsely reported that the men he shot had attacked him with a pipe. "I remember sitting there on the ground thinking to myself, I can't believe this is how it is going to be," said White, 36, who dictated the statement from his hospital bed to his attorney. His co-worker, Brandon Clark, 22, died of his wounds Feb. 2 without giving a statement.

Washington has not spoken publicly since the shooting. A source familiar with the investigation has told The Post that, in a brief report filed immediately after the incident, Washington alleged that the movers were in a part of the house where they were not supposed to be. Police have said that Washington told them he acted in self-defense.

Washington, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), did not respond yesterday to a call seeking comment. A police union attorney, Steven E. Sunday, also did not return a call.

Police initially said they would probably charge the movers with assault but have since backed off that comment, saying they would make no determination until their investigation is complete.

White's attorney, Michael J. Winkelman, has not allowed police to interview his client, whose criminal record includes a burglary conviction, in part because of the possibility that police might try to build an assault case against White. In addition, Winkelman said he is concerned that White's providing a statement before Washington does so might allow Washington to fabricate a story that blames the movers in the shooting.

Police have declined to say whether Washington has given a complete statement in the investigation, but sources said yesterday that a subpoena compelling him to appear before a grand jury has been issued. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Winkelman said he and White decided to give State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey the signed three-page statement, which Winkelman also provided to The Post, because he worries that Washington, now on paid administrative leave, might be permitted to return to work. "We didn't feel we could wait any longer," Winkelman said.

Johnson has said Washington should not continue as deputy director of homeland security -- a job Johnson gave him two years ago -- but should return to the police department, where he is a corporal. The case has attracted wide attention in part because of a pattern of previous complaints against Washington, 45.

In the statement, White said he waited in the movers' truck Jan. 24 while Clark met Washington in his home. He said Clark, 22, returned and said, "Man, this guy is looking for a fight."

White said Clark then telephoned a supervisor. Officials have confirmed that such a call took place, and Clark's girlfriend has said the supervisor instructed the deliverymen to give Washington whatever he wanted.

Washington directed the movers to an upstairs bedroom, White said, where they set down the new bedrails. White said Washington pushed Clark, who was then on his knees, and crudely ordered him to leave the house.

White said Washington grew angrier when Clark asked him why he had not disassembled the other bed, parts of which were to be taken away by the movers. Washington shoved him again, White said, and answered: "Man, now you are going to tell me what to do in my house? Get the [expletive] out of my house."

White said he and Clark headed for the stairs. Clark, walking backward and holding up his hands "in the surrender position," told Washington he did not want to fight, White said.

Washington opened fire. Clark was struck first, White said. White laid his injured co-worker down and began to search for a cellphone. "I then heard a few more shots and realized I had been shot," White said.

When Washington stepped back into the bedroom, White said, he tried again to locate the phone.

"The customer must have seen me move because he shot me in the knee and said, 'I told you not to move,' " White said.

Washington, his gun still pointed at the two men, then telephoned someone he appeared to know, White said. " 'These two dudes just broke up in my house, and I shot both of them and they are here bleeding all over my carpet,' " White quoted Washington as saying. " 'They beat me up real good. . . . Yeah, they hit me with a pipe.' "

County police have said Washington was injured seriously enough to require treatment at a hospital but have declined to describe his injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0134586

As they lay bleeding, White said, he and Clark pleaded with Washington, asking that he give them a phone or call for help. The first police officers to arrive appeared to believe the deliverymen were intruders, White wrote. One handcuffed Clark, White said, and the other told White, " 'Man, what are you doing in this house? You know you just broke into a cop's house?' "

It was only then, White said, that he realized Washington was a police officer. White said that the responding officer looked surprised when White said he and Clark were deliverymen and that the officer then ordered another officer to remove Clark's handcuffs.

Winkelman said White, who was shot in the chest, knee and abdomen, was readmitted to a hospital yesterday because of a possible infection.

Staff writer Candace Rondeaux contributed to this report.

Body Found In Plaza Rubble Believed To Be Gunman (WP)

By Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Frederick authorities yesterday recovered a body believed to be that of a man who they say shot at police and started a fire that gutted a shopping plaza Monday.

The body, which was found about 12:30 p.m. behind the locked front door in the rubble of a destroyed liquor store at the Frederick shopping center, has been sent to the chief medical examiner's office in Baltimore for identification.

Frederick police were still trying to piece together how James Douglas's visit to a liquor store ended up in an inferno that destroyed the Antietam Village Center.

Police say Douglas, 30, of Frederick, walked into Jim's Liquors at the shopping plaza on Oppossumtown Pike about 12:30 p.m. Monday, showed the owner a handgun and ordered him out of the store.

When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door, police said. "They were approaching the business and they heard two shots," said Lt. Thomas Chase, a spokesman for Frederick police. "One came through the window and they heard it go past."

About 1:45 p.m., smoke was spotted coming from the liquor store. Police said they think boxes of liquor were ignited to start the blaze, and the alcohol acted as an accelerant. The fire soon spread to the adjoining stores, destroying a bank, a coffee shop, a sandwich shop, a medical supply store, a hair salon and a dry cleaner. "It was quick and it was massive," said Chase, who witnessed the fire. "Once it went to the rafters, it was gone."

Police initially characterized the incident as an attempted armed robbery, based on the first calls for assistance to the liquor store, but they said they are unsure what actually happened.

"That's part of the investigation, to find out if it was a robbery or something else," Chase said. "It's much too early to draw any conclusions."

As of yesterday evening, no weapon had been found in the rubble. "We're still looking for the handgun," Chase said.

Yesterday afternoon, fire marshals, police detectives and construction workers moved through the blackened remains of the plaza. A yellow excavator picked out pieces of debris. Large red dumpsters had been set up in front of the liquor store to block the view of the recovery operation.

Shortly after the body was discovered, a group of Douglas's relatives stood on the sidewalk just outside a chain-link fence erected around the site, staring forlornly at the recovery operation. "Just let us grieve in peace," one woman in the group said. A police chaplain stood with them, offering words of consolation.

Jamie Ketterman, who said she is the mother of two of Douglas's children, stood across the street, huddled in a blanket, watching as authorities prepared to remove the body. She said Douglas had been with her and the children earlier Monday. "He disappeared and came here, and that's where he stayed." Ketterman began crying and could not speak further.

Friends of Douglas's, who lived in a nearby apartment complex, gathered at the scene yesterday and angrily disputed police accounts of the incident.

Talisha Easterling, who said she and Douglas had been friends since childhood, said that she spoke to him by cellphone during the standoff and that her friend said he was not going to harm anyone.

DOJ_NMG_0134587

"Tell them to leave me alone," she quoted Douglas as telling her. "I'm coming out as soon as I finish smoking a blunt."

Another friend, Britnie Bell, said she also doubted that Douglas would have shot at police and burned down the shopping center. "He always told me, 'There are two kinds of people in this world: fools and damn fools,' " Bell recalled. "He wasn't a damn fool."

Chase said police repeatedly encouraged Douglas to surrender peacefully while speaking to him via cellphone during the standoff.

Chase said police fired no shots. "When we're fired upon, our first response is to seek cover," he said. "We don't fire back indiscriminately."

Court records show that Douglas was found guilty of several criminal offenses in recent years, including possession of a deadly weapon and drinking in public.

But friends described him as a friendly and well-known neighborhood figure who helped residents dig out from the recent snow. He was also a proud father, they said. "He's got five kids; they're all boys," Bell said. "How's it going to be for them not to have a father figure?"

Staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Why I Oppose The Death Penalty (WP)

By Martin O'malley

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

In evaluating whether Maryland's criminal death penalty should be replaced with life without parole, one must be guided by the answers to two basic questions:

Â· Is the death penalty a just punishment for murder?

Â· Is the death penalty an effective deterrent to murder?

Most of us would point to the execution of John Thanos, here in our state, as an example of a "just" application of the death penalty. Thanos murdered three teenagers, at random, by shooting them point-blank. He expressed no remorse, even declaring in court that he wished he could bring his innocent victims back to life to kill them again. In the end, he demanded to be executed and was. Most Marylanders felt, basically, that "hanging was too good" for John Thanos.

Did this one relatively humane execution balance out a violent murder -- much less three violent murders? Can any execution really be said to "even the ledger" for the taking of another's unique life?

Contrast that with the case of Kirk Bloodsworth, also in Maryland, who was convicted and sentenced to death for rape and murder in 1985. Eight years later, DNA evidence proved his innocence and he was released. In Illinois, 12 people have been executed since 1977. But over that same time, 18 death-row inmates have been released after evidence proved they were innocent.

These examples prompt a deeper question. Notwithstanding the executions of the rightly convicted, can the death penalty ever be justified as public policy when it inherently necessitates the occasional taking of wrongly convicted, innocent life? In Maryland, since 1978, we have executed five people and set one convicted man free when his innocence was discovered. Are any of us willing to sacrifice a member of our own family -- wrongly convicted, sentenced and executed -- in order to secure the execution of five rightly convicted murders? And even if we were, could that public policy be called "just"? I do not believe it can.

But what about the deterrent value of the death penalty? Does the use of the death penalty -- while rarely, if ever, "just" -- save more innocent lives than it takes? The evidence indicates that it does not.

In 2005, the murder rate was 46 percent higher in states that had the death penalty than in states without it -- although they had been about the same in 1990. And while the murder rate has gone down across the board since 1990, it declined by 56 percent in states without the death penalty but only 38 percent in states that have it. It would appear that the death penalty is not a deterrent, but possibly an accelerant, to murder.

And what of the tremendous cost of pursuing capital punishment? In 2002, Judge Dale Cathell of the Maryland Court of Appeals wrote that, according to his research, processing and imprisoning a death penalty defendant "costs $400,000 over and above . . . a prisoner serving a life sentence." Given that 56 people have been sentenced to death in Maryland since 1978, our state has spent about $22.4 million more than the cost of life imprisonment. That's nearly $4.5 million "extra" for each of the five executions carried out. And so long as every American is presumed innocent until proven guilty, the cost of due process will not go down.

DOJ_NMG_0134588

If, however, we were to replace the death penalty with life without parole, that $22.4 million could pay for 500 additional police officers or provide drug treatment for 10,000 of our addicted neighbors. Unlike the death penalty, these are investments that save lives and prevent violent crime. If we knew we could spare a member of our family from becoming a victim of violent crime by making this policy change, would we do it?

And if the death penalty as applied is inherently unjust and lacks a deterrent value, we are left to ask whether the value to society of partial retribution outweighs the cost of maintaining capital punishment. While I am mindful of and sensitive to the closure (and in some cases the comfort) that the death penalty brings to the unfathomable pain of families that have lost loved ones to violent crime, I believe that it does not.

Human dignity is the concept that leads brave individuals to sacrifice their lives for the lives of strangers. Human dignity is the universal truth that is the basis of ethics. Human dignity is the fundamental belief on which the laws of this state and this republic are founded. And absent a deterrent value, the damage done to the concept of human dignity by our conscious communal use of the death penalty is greater than the benefit of even a justly drawn retribution.

The writer, a Democrat, is governor of Maryland.

Officer Charged With Molesting, Photographing Woman During Traffic Stop (WP)

By Raymond McCaffrey

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

An Anne Arundel County police officer was charged with a sex offense yesterday, accused of coercing a woman to bare her breasts during a traffic stop, then molesting and photographing her. He told her she could avoid jail if she exposed herself, police said.

Joseph Mossmiller, 22, who joined the department in May, was charged before a District Court commissioner with a fourth-degree sex offense, second-degree assault, false imprisonment and misconduct in office, police said.

Three other officers were suspended in connection with the incident. Police declined to identify them or disclose what the led to their suspensions with pay except to say that they were also rookies but had not been at the scene of the traffic stop Jan. 20.

According to charging documents filed in District Court, the 18-year-old woman was driving with a female passenger whom she had just picked up at a bar when she was pulled over by a marked police car in the Pasadena area.

According to the documents, Mossmiller "lectured her about the dangers of drinking and driving" before telling her to follow him as he drove toward her home. En route, Mossmiller pulled into a library parking lot, where he "told the girls to stay," returning about 10 minutes later, the documents say. The driver, "out of fear, chose to wait for the officer."

Police said Mossmiller then led the woman to the adjacent Community United Methodist Church parking lot, at 8680 Fort Smallwood Rd. in Pasadena, and asked her to step out of the car.

"He administered several field sobriety tests and then told her that if she and her friend showed him their breasts, then she would not go to jail," the documents say.

Although the passenger refused, the driver "began to lift her shirt," the documents say. Mossmiller "told her that was not good enough. He then placed his hand on her exposed breast and took a photograph utilizing the camera on his cellular telephone."

After the driver was told "that she was free to leave," she drove to a nearby police station to report the incident.

Mossmiller was released on his own recognizance yesterday after initially being sent to the county detention facility when he was unable to post a $250,000 bond, police said.

For Youths, A Grim Tour On Magazine Crews (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134589

Two days after graduating from high school last June, Jonathan Pope left his home in Miamisburg, Ohio, to join a traveling magazine sales crew, thinking he would get to "talk to people, party at night and see the country."

Over the next six months, he and about 20 other crew members crossed 10 states, peddling subscriptions door to door, 10 to 14 hours a day, six days a week. Sleeping three to a room in cheap motels, lowest seller on the floor, they survived some days on less than $10 in food money while their earnings were kept "on the books" for later payment.

By then, Mr. Pope said, he had seen several friends severely beaten by managers, he and several other crew members were regularly smoking methamphetamine with prostitutes living down the motel hallway, and there were warrants out for his arrest in five states for selling subscriptions without a permit.

"I knew I was either going to be dead, disappeared or I don't know what," Mr. Pope said.

After persuading his manager to let him leave, Mr. Pope was dropped off, without a ticket, $17 in his pocket, at a bus terminal near San Antonio, more than 1,000 miles from home.

More than two decades after a Senate investigation revealed widespread problems with these itinerant sellers, and despite several highly publicized fatal accidents and violent crimes involving the sales crews in recent years, the industry remains almost entirely unregulated. And while the industry says it has changed, advocates and law enforcement officials say the abuses persist.

In interviews over seven months, more than 50 current and former members from almost as many crews painted a similar picture of life on the road.

With striking uniformity, they told of violence, drug use, indebtedness and cheating of customers during their cross-country travels, often in unsafe vehicles and with drivers who lacked proper licenses.

"The stories about life on crew you hear from these kids are almost unbelievable," said Officer George Dahl of the Louisville, Ky., Metro Police Department, who estimated that his department had cited or arrested more than 70 sellers for assault, unlawful solicitation or drug possession in the last two years. "But you get them alone and start hearing the same sort of thing over and over from different crews and you start believing them."

In Collinsville, Ill., Daniel Burrus scrolled through digital photographs of bloodied faces as he described how, on a crew he helped manage for several years, men who missed their sales quota were forced to fight each other.

In Flagstaff, Ariz., Isaac James sat with his wife and newborn daughter as he told how he and others on his mag crew — as they are typically called — stole checkbooks, jewelry, medicine-cabinet drugs and even shoes from customers' homes.

Last October, Jonathan Gagney joined a mag crew to escape the "crack scene" back home in Marlborough, N.H. But one night last month, he called this reporter from a bus station in St. Petersburg, Fla., to say he had just sneaked away from his motel to run away from his crew.

"All I know is this guy got beaten and there was blood all over the motel wall," Mr. Gagney said, his voice shaking.

Earlene Williams, director of Parent Watch, an industry watchdog group, said her organization got about 10 e-mail messages or calls a day, double the number since 2003, seeking help from sellers, their families or lawyers.

"Publisher's Sweepstakes is a lot smaller than it used to be, and so the magazine industry is less able to get subscriptions that way now," Ms. Williams said, explaining why she was seeing an increase in problems with crews. "And the telemarketing no-call list has also pushed the publishers away from telemarketing and toward door-to-door crews."

Last year in response to a similar increase in calls, the National Runaway Switchboard began training its operators to handle the cases.

A Complex Industry

Dan Smith, a lawyer for the National Field Selling Association, which represents about 60 percent of the magazine sales industry, estimated that 2 percent to 3 percent of all magazine subscriptions, or at least $147 million worth in 2005, were sold by door-to-door salespeople, up from about 1 percent, or at least $69 million in 2000. But the Magazine Publishers Association disagreed with Ms. Williams and Mr. Smith. It does not believe that door-to-door magazine sales have grown, and estimated that they account for 1 percent of sales.

The industry consists of layers. While the bulk of subscriptions are sold directly by publishers and through direct mail, insert cards and the Internet, many magazine publishers also hire clearinghouses. These companies then subcontract with crew managers who hire door-to-door sellers. These layers of middlemen, and the small percentage of total subscription revenue involved, may help explain why publishers, who are always eager to increase readership, have been unwilling or unable to prevent mag crews from operating.

DOJ_NMG_0134590

Just who uses mag crews is in dispute. Crew members and the National Field Selling Association say many of the largest publishers use magazine crews or clearinghouses that rely on them. But of the five largest publishing companies — Time Inc., Condé Nast, Hearst, Meredith and Reader's Digest Association, which collectively make up nearly half the industry as measured by advertising revenue — four said they did not use mag crews or did so only sparingly.

A representative for Reader's Digest said, "A portion of our subscriptions come in through third-party agents, who may in turn subcontract to local vendors."

Dozens of magazines are listed on order forms offered by crews, including Reader's Digest, Rolling Stone and Redbook.

Rolling Stone declined to comment. A representative for the Hearst Corporation said that in recent years it had stopped hiring clearinghouses that use crews. But when subsequently asked why Redbook, a Hearst publication, appears among magazines sold by one crew, a Hearst representative e-mailed, "We constantly fight unauthorized agents," adding, "It's an ongoing battle."

Generally, the clearinghouses get about 40 percent of the subscription money and the publishers about 10 percent. The crew leaders get the other 50 percent, out of which they pay all expenses on the road, including the sellers' commissions.

"Nobody is forced or pushed to do anything," said Tim Peek, manager and recruiter for New Generation, a crew based in Vero Beach, Fla.

Drugs and violence are forbidden, and some sellers make $1,000 per week, which is kept in a savings account for them, Mr. Peek said, adding, "If they don't want to work, they don't make money."

John Wigman, the manager of Mr. Pope's crew, Periodical and Publications Connections, said, "I don't see why you don't tell about all the kids on drugs that we help out." Asked to elaborate, provide names or respond to Mr. Pope's accusations, Mr. Wigman refused and hung up.

Mr. Smith said he viewed most stories of drug use and physical abuse as exaggerations. "I don't put a lot of stock in them because, to be brutally frank with you, abuse is like beauty. It's in the eyes of the beholder," he said. "A loud voice, anything, can be called abuse."

While there may be a few shady operators, he said, the industry has cleaned itself up over the years, and his organization has helped through broad distribution of pamphlets on professional courtesy and ethics, yearly training seminars for members and one-on-one discussions with managers who have problems on their crews.

By pressuring members to perform background checks on new hires, the association has cut the number of crimes and cheating perpetrated by sellers, Mr. Smith said. No one is forced to stay on crew, he added, since the association pays for a bus ticket home for any crew member who wants to leave.

But labor and law enforcement officials said that since many sellers were runaways or high school dropouts or were from dysfunctional families or poor neighborhoods, they had fewer options and were reluctant to report mistreatment or leave.

Many former sellers also said they kept quiet about problems out of fear of violence against them or those they left behind.

Sellers reported having adopted fake names upon joining a crew, being beaten if they attracted police attention and receiving mail sent from home only after it was opened by the company's central office. "What happens on crew, stays on crew" was a common refrain.

An escape from small-town boredom or overbearing parents, working on a mag crew is a lifestyle more than a job, and it brings good times with the bad. Like gangs, crews become family, sellers said, and the camaraderie of shared experiences is a bond not easily broken.

"You're involved in bad stuff, you're seeing bad stuff and they tell you, 'No negativity,' " said Jennifer Steele, 23.

In September 2004, Ms. Steele said, she was drugged and raped by two men who were partying with crew members at a motel in Memphis, where her crew, Precision Sales, was staying. When her manager told her to go back to work the next day, she said she "threw a fit." But she did as she was told, and worked part of the day before filing a police report and having a rape kit performed. She stayed with the crew for another seven months before quitting.

DOJ_NMG_0134591

"I know it sounds crazy," Ms. Steele said. "But I believed my manager when he said he would never let that happen again, and I believed him when he said my mom had told him she didn't care about me."

In January 2006, Ms. Steele left her crew and was placed in the witness protection program during an investigation of her former managers, who were accused in the beating and kidnapping at gunpoint of her boyfriend from a city bus, an incident that was caught on videotape and led to the conviction of one person for kidnapping for ransom and assault with a deadly weapon.

"They're frustrating cases," said Sgt. Jeanine Lum of the Norwalk Sheriff's Station in Norwalk, Calif., near Los Angeles, who was involved in the investigation.

"The ones we arrest at the doors often just need to be sent home," Sergeant Lum added, "while the real culprits are back at the hotel or in some office somewhere."

Few Legal Protections

Regulating the industry has been difficult because the companies, many of them operating only out of post office boxes, are small and frequently change names.

"The local police can't keep up because the crews leave the state before they get alerted and the feds don't bother with them because they say it is a state's issue," said Connie Knutti, who investigated several crews before she retired in 2005 as manager of field enforcement for the Illinois Department of Labor.

The sellers have few labor protections because they are classified as independent contractors, which also insulates the companies from regulation, taxes and liability. Categorized as outdoor sellers, the door-to-door peddlers are also exempt from most federal and state minimum wage and overtime requirements.

A majority of former crew members said that while they occasionally made several hundred dollars a week, most of the time they received little more than the daily allowance of $15, while the rest of their earnings stayed on the books to cover expenses. Many also said that subscriptions for magazines were never actually fulfilled.

On any given day, said Mr. Smith, the association lawyer, there are probably about 2,500 people, typically ages 18 to 24, selling magazines door to door.

But when state and federal labor department officials held a conference in 1999 to discuss concerns about the industry, a panel concluded that the number of sellers was probably closer to 30,000, said Darlene Adkins, vice president of public policy for the National Consumers League's Child Labor Coalition. That organization ranks traveling magazine sales among the five worst jobs for teenagers.

Catherine Barbour said it was the constant traveling and working in dangerous areas that most worried her when her daughter, Tracy Jones, said she was joining a crew. "I told her no, absolutely not," Ms. Barbour said. "But she was 18, so what could I do?"

On Nov. 15, Ms. Jones disappeared while selling subscriptions at a Pilot Truck Stop in North Little Rock, Ark. Ms. Jones was found 11 days later, stabbed to death, in a ditch near Route 61 in southwestern Memphis.

Up at 7 a.m., typical crews start the day with a sales meeting where they rehearse their pitches. "We're selling magazines to earn points in a contest to win a trip abroad" is the standard and sometimes fictitious spiel. Around 9 a.m., the crews pile into vans to be dropped off at the day's territory. They switch neighborhoods every several hours and often work as late as 10 p.m.

"You work hard during the day, but you also party pretty hard at night," said Stephanie Blake, 23, who wrote an e-mail message in November to Earlene Williams at Parent Watch because she said she wanted to tell the positive side of the work.

While she and others used methamphetamine, Ms. Blake said it was mostly marijuana, alcohol and sex that filled the nights.

"But there is a lot more to crew than that," she said, recounting having made some of her best friends, including her fiancé, working on the crew. Coming from Evansville, Ind., Ms. Blake said she relished the chance to see the country. The expense-paid trips to Walt Disney World in Orlando, Fla., and a resort in Mexico were more fun than she had ever imagined having, she said. "I still miss it sometimes," she added.

About a half hour into the conversation, however, Ms. Blake's tone began to shift. "I have to admit, some things did get to me about crew life," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0134592

The 100 sit-ups and pushups for every number a seller was below her daily quota felt "cultish," she said. The beatings were also unsettling. But the most galling part, Ms. Blake said, was the unfulfilled promise of big money.

When she and her fiancé finally decided to leave their crew in December 2003, Ms. Blake said, they sneaked away late one night from the motel near Houston where they staying. Asked why she left without demanding to be paid what was still "on the books," she said, "These aren't the types who you just go up to and ask to settle up."

Michael Simpson is one reason.

For two years starting in February 2004, Mr. Simpson, a stocky former high school lacrosse player from Newburgh, N.Y., worked on several crews as an "enforcer." His job, he said, was to beat crew members upon a manager's request.

If sellers missed quota regularly or complained about the job, Mr. Simpson, 23, said he hit them while in their room or when they were alone in the van. On more than 30 occasions, he estimated, he and several other enforcers drew blood. In three instances, ambulances were called, he said. Dealing with the police was not a problem.

"You have one kid saying he was jumped and 20 others plus two managers saying he stole something or broke into a room and assaulted a girl," Mr. Simpson said. "Who do you think the cops are going to believe?"

Daivet McClinton, 23, an enforcer who worked with Mr. Simpson, said talking in front of others about wanting to quit invited the worst beatings.

Asked if they ever went overboard, both men recalled an incident in November 2005 involving an 18-year-old recruit from Dayton, Ohio, named Rudy. "All we were told was that Rudy had shoved and disrespected the manager," Mr. Simpson said.

For 10 uninterrupted minutes in a motel stairwell in San Francisco, Mr. Simpson, Mr. McClinton and four other enforcers beat Rudy unconscious, Mr. Simpson and Mr. McClinton said. One held his mouth shut. Two others pinned down his arms and legs. Tearing off his shirt, they pressed a flaming lighter into his back. Mr. Simpson kicked him in the face and body. "I stopped because I ran out of breath," Mr. Simpson said.

Rudy, they said, was taken away in an ambulance.

Darting a glance at his new girlfriend and his chin quivering momentarily, Mr. Simpson explained why he decided to leave last February. "I'd gone from being a kid who was afraid of hitting people in the face to someone who was using objects," he said.

Still, some current crew members said the work had helped them turn their lives around.

"I was in and out of juvenile facilities, and now I'm actually going somewhere," said Jordan Friedley, standing in a shopping mall in Oceanside, Calif., near San Diego, where, for two days, a reporter shadowed two crews, Magnificent Sales and Thoroughbreds, both from Alliance Service Company. "They keep things on the up and up, no drugs or none of that, and I bring in $700 a week."

Asked about incidents in the last five years involving the two crews, including two fatal drug overdoses and the deaths of two crew members in the crash of a crew van, Mr. Friedley fell silent.

Crystal Hall, who helps manage the crews, said: "We've cleaned things up. Everyone is drug-tested now. They show up dirty, they're gone. Those who stay have plenty of chance to make money."

The Money 'Flows Up'

Since pay is purely on commission, Mr. Smith, the association lawyer, said that only the best sellers survived and that about 20 percent of recruits left in less than a month.

Matt Ward, a former bookkeeper for several crews, said there were other reasons for the high attrition. "Money in this industry flows up," Mr. Ward said. "It doesn't trickle down."

For about two years starting in 1998, Mr. Ward did bookkeeping for several crews with American Community Services, a company with several hundred sellers that is based in Indiana. It is owned by two of Mr. Ward's brothers, LeVan and Albert Ellis, who declined to answer questions both over the telephone and sent by certified mail.

Mr. Ward said that while the company should be commended for sticking to its strict antiviolence policies, he left in 2000 after becoming uncomfortable with what he saw while he was keeping the books.

"The sales agents remain almost always in the red while the managers, car handlers and everyone else is in the black almost from the start," Mr. Ward said between shifts at a restaurant in downtown Washington, where he now waits tables.

DOJ_NMG_0134593

Of the more than 400 sales agents whose accounts Mr. Ward said he handled, he estimated that fewer than 40 left the company having made money. The rest spent their earnings on the road or, more often, to cover their daily deductions for room expenses, gas and meals.

This is not a new criticism. In 1987, during the Congressional investigation of the industry, the Senate committee reviewed the records of one company and found that of its 418 sellers, 413 had finished the year in debt to the company, even though the company itself had reported large annual profits.

Ms. Williams, from Parent Watch, said her organization advised customers not to buy from the sellers or to let them in the house, but to offer them a phone to call home or her organization's phone number to help anyone who might want to arrange a bus ticket home. She said her organization had lobbied for legislation to prevent sellers from being categorized as independent contractors and to provide them with minimum wage and safety and health protections.

"Leave these kids off radar as they are now," Ms. Williams said, "and the abuses will continue."

Teen 'Sport Killings' Of Homeless On The Rise (CNN)

By Ashley Fantz, Cnn

CNN, February 21, 2007

MILWAUKEE, Wisconsin (CNN) -- All Nathan Moore says he wanted to do was smoke pot and get drunk with his friends.

Killing Rex Baum was never part of the plan that day in 2004.

"It all started off as a game," Moore said.

The 15-year-old and his friends were taunting the homeless man -- throwing sticks and leaves -- after having a couple of beers with him.

No big deal, Moore says, but he's sorry for what came next.

It was a mistake, he said, a sudden primal surge that made him and his friends Luis Oyola, 16, and 17-year-old Andrew Ihrcke begin punching and kicking Baum.

"Luis says 'I'm gonna go hit him,' We're all laughing, thought he was joking around,'" but he wasn't, Moore concedes. "We just all started hitting him."

They hurled anything they could find -- rocks, bricks, even Baum's barbecue grill -- and pounded the 49-year-old with a pipe and with the baseball bat he kept at his campsite for protection.

Ihrcke smeared his own feces on Baum's face before cutting him with a knife "to see if he was alive," Moore said.

After destroying Baum's camp, the boys left the homeless man -- head wedged in his own grill -- under a piece of plastic where they hoped the "animals would eat" him.

Then, Moore says, they took off to grab a bite at McDonald's.

Baum's murder was indicative of a disturbing trend.

A National Coalition for the Homeless report says last year, there were 122 attacks and 20 murders against the homeless, the most attacks in nearly a decade. (Coalition report on 2006 homeless attacks)

Police found Baum's body two days after the teens attacked him.

They bragged about it around town. Police picked them up and they described what happened.

Ihrcke told police that killing "the bum" reminded him of playing a violent video game, a police report shows.

All three teens pleaded no contest to first degree reckless homicide charges and went to prison.

Moore recently turned 18 at Columbia Correctional Institution in Portage, Wisconsin, where he is serving a 15 year sentence.

"When [the beating] stops, you say, 'What did we just do?'" he told CNN. "There's no rational explanation." (Watch teen explain how "game" became tragedy)Teenage 'amusement'

"It's disturbing to know that young people would literally kick someone when they're already down on their luck," said Michael Stoops, the executive director of the Washington-based National Coalition for the Homeless. "We recognize that this isn't every teenager, but for some this passes as amusement."

DOJ_NMG_0134594

Criminologists call these wilding sprees "sport killing," -- largely middle-class teens, with no criminal records, assaulting the homeless with bats, golf clubs, paintball guns. (Watch how nights are cold, fearful for Milwaukee homeless)

Some teens have even taped themselves in the act. Others have said they were inspired by "Bumfights," a video series created in 2002 and sold on the Web that features homeless people pummeling each other for the promise of a few bucks.

A segment called "Bum Hunter," hosted by a Crocodile Hunter-like actor wearing a safari outfit, shows him "tagging" homeless people by pouncing on them and binding their wrists.

The distributors of "Bumfights" have claimed they've sold hundreds of thousands of copies.

But the company has had to deal with a couple of legal issues unrelated to the Baum case.

Last year, three former homeless stars of "Bumfights" won a civil suit against filmmakers. Santa Monica attorney Mark Quigley, who represented Rufus Hannah, known as "Rufus the Stunt Bum" to series' fans, said he is unable to disclose the amount of the settlement.

Also, in July 2006, a California judge ordered "Bumfights'" producers Ryan McPherson and Zachary Bubeck to spend 180 days in jail for failing to perform community service related to guilty pleas they previously entered to charges of staging illegal street fights.

"Bumfights" directors did not answer CNN's request for an interview. Attacks across the nation

Incidents of teen-on-homeless violence dotted the map last year. Florida racked up at least six such attacks in 2006. (Homeless attack across U.S.)

In Lauderhill, four teens were arrested after they allegedly videotaped themselves beating, dragging, and stealing from a homeless man.

The victim has not been found, but the four face one charge each of strong-armed robbery.

Earlier this month, teens in Corpus Christi, Texas, videotaped themselves attacking a homeless man.

Commander David Torres said police arrested a 15-year-old and are looking for at least one more teenager and a 22-year-old who described on tape what they were about to do before they jumped on the man. (Read full story)

On the other side of the nation, former Oregon State University student Joshua Grimes stands accused of shooting and injuring a homeless man from his perch in a fraternity house window.

He has not yet entered a plea, but, according to a police report, he cried to detectives after the October shooting, telling them, "I didn't mean to shoot him."

At least three homeless people in Kalamazoo, Michigan, reported being attacked by teens on bicycles during a 10-day span in October, according to the homeless coalition.

In Huntsville, Alabama, six teens -- one of them 13 -- beat a homeless man with golf clubs, the coalition reported. But perhaps the most shocking of these examples was 2006's first recorded case of teen-on-homeless violence.

On January 12 in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, a surveillance camera captured two teens beating a homeless man with bats.

Prosecutors say 17-year-old skateboarder Tom Daugherty, 18-year-old Brian Hooks, a popular hockey team captain, and a third unseen teen, Billy Ammons, a high school dropout, assaulted two more homeless men that night.

One of them was 45-year-old Norris Gaynor. A witness, Anthony Clarke, told police and CNN last year that he saw the three teens approach Gaynor as he slept on a park bench. Daugherty began whacking Gaynor with a bat, Clarke said. (Watch two teenagers beat a cowering homeless man with bats)

As Gaynor lay dying, Ammons shot him with yellow paintballs, later remarking that the beating felt like "teeing off," police said.

Gaynor was beaten so badly his own father didn't recognize him. Facing life in prison, the teens face trial for murder later this year. They have each pleaded not guilty to one count of first-degree murder and two counts of attempted murder. (Read full story)Lingering questions

Stoops and Brian Levin, a California State University hate crimes expert, say common themes run through teen-on-homeless violence. The attackers are almost always boys, peer pressure and mob mentality sweep away caution, and parents don't suspect their children could be capable of such actions.

Laura Simpson didn't. Her son, Justin Brumfield, is serving an 11-year prison stretch in California.

DOJ_NMG_0134595

In August 2005, Brumfield and William Orantes, both 19, beat 56-year-old Ernest Adams with bats. Adams emerged from a coma three weeks later with dents in his skull, permanent scars and no vision in one eye, the Los Angeles Times reported. Orantes is serving a three-year sentence.

Simpson, a sixth-grade teacher, says she is still tormented by her son's actions and wonders if her son's irritability was more than typical teenage moodiness.

She has other questions: Was her son, a natural follower, just succumbing to peer pressure? Was he that into "Bumfights"? Did he see the fear in Adams' eyes when he raised the bat to strike him?

In a sad irony, she had adopted him; his mother was a homeless drug addict, a revelation he had learned not long before the beating and which his attorney used to explain his rage.

Her son has told her he is sorry for what happened, but her questions remain unanswered.

"As a parent, of course you're going to question yourself," she said. "It was just hard to comprehend. The first thing was, 'Not Justin. There has to be a mistake,'" she said. "You think you know everything that's going on and you don't."

When the mob mentality takes over, even the perpetrators may not comprehend what's going on.

Back at the prison in Wisconsin, Nathan Moore seems baffled by his own actions. Killing Rex Baum now registers like a "blur" or "dream," he says.

Moore and his friends knew Baum from around town. Life had been painful for the homeless man from the start; alcohol eased it. As a kid growing up in Milwaukee, when his home life became too rocky, a neighboring family took him in. He drifted through school and a brief stint in the military, his friends say, a wanderer, a loner. (Audio Slide Show: Remembering Rex Baum)

Homeless for years, he defied Wisconsin winters by constantly walking around the city, bundled in a coat patched with duct tape. For a few dollars, he pumped gas, shoveled snow off driveways, and walked neighborhood dogs.

More than 100 people came to Baum's funeral. Someone sent a newspaper clip of the story to Moore in prison.

"Every day I wish I could take it back," he said. "I seen [the] repercussions among everyone. I didn't think about any of this when [the beating] was going on."

Half A Shield Is Better Than None (NYT)

By Geoffrey R. Stone

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

AS the new Democratic Congress moves ahead decisively on a panoply of issues, it should confront a particularly pressing one: freedom of the press. Congress should expeditiously enact a federal journalist-source privilege law, which would protect journalists from compelled disclosure of their sources' confidential communications in the same way psychiatrists and lawyers are protected. Importantly, neither Congress nor the press should be unwilling to compromise when the alternative is to forgo such a privilege altogether.

A strong and effective journalist-source privilege is essential to a robust and independent press and to a well-functioning democratic society. It is in society's interest to encourage those who possess information of significant public value to convey it to the public, but without a journalist-source privilege, such communication will often be chilled because sources fear retribution, embarrassment or just plain getting "involved."

As we have seen over the past several years, particularly with the federal investigation of the leak of the identity of former C.I.A. operative Valerie Plame, the absence of a journalist-source privilege leads to confusion, uncertainty and injustice. At the hands of unrestrained federal prosecutors, journalists have taken a serious battering.

There is nothing novel in the call for such a privilege. At present, 49 states and the District of Columbia recognize some version of it. The federal government is long overdue to enact such a privilege as well. This issue has often been before Congress, but Congress has consistently failed to act, in part because the press has stubbornly insisted that anything less than a perfect privilege is unacceptable. We must move forward. The press can no longer afford to let the perfect be the enemy of the good.

Of the jurisdictions that protect a journalist-source privilege, only 13 states and the District of Columbia do so absolutely, meaning that under no circumstances can the state override the journalist's right to withhold privileged information. The advantage of the absolute privilege is that it provides clarity and certainty to sources, journalists, lawyers and courts. The disadvantage is that in some situations, it could deprive law enforcement of critical information.

DOJ_NMG_0134596

In 36 other states, the journalist-source privilege is qualified, meaning that the government can require a journalist to reveal confidential information if the government can prove that it has exhausted alternative ways of obtaining the information and that the information is necessary to serve a compelling state interest.

So how would a qualified privilege work at the federal level? The issue most often arises over matters of national security. Suppose, for example, a journalist reports that she has been informed by a reliable source that an unidentified major building in New York City will be blown up by terrorists the following day. It would seem irresponsible, indeed insane, to allow the reporter to refuse to disclose the identity of the source. Certainly, the government has a compelling interest in forcing the reporter to reveal the name of the source so it can attempt to track him down and possibly prevent the attack.

The trouble is that even in this situation, the matter is not free from doubt. Without the protection of an absolute privilege, the source might not have been willing to disclose the information to the reporter in the first place. Public officials are certainly better off knowing that a threat exists, even if they do not know the identity of the source, than knowing nothing at all. Thus, breaching the privilege in even this seemingly compelling situation might in the long-run prove counterproductive to protecting national security.

Nonetheless, such situations are more hypothetical than real, and they should not determine the shape of the privilege we enact. If the press has to compromise by endorsing a law that would enable the government to pierce the privilege in order to address an imminent and grave threat to national security, it should do so. There is little gain in sacrificing the privilege altogether because of a struggle over an abstract principle that would govern situations that have never happened in American history and are unlikely to happen in the future. Politics is, as they say, the art of compromise.

A serious journalist-source privilege is imperative to the national interest. It should be high on the list of Congress's priorities for 2007. And it should be held hostage neither to hypothetical nightmare scenarios nor to the press's stubborn, if principled, insistence on more than it really needs.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Tosses $79.5 Million Verdict Against Cigarette Company (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court tossed out a $79.5 million award to a smoker's widow Tuesday in its first ever case testing punitive damages in a personal injury dispute.

The decision limits when jurors may consider the harm a company caused people who were not part of the case.

The 5-4 ruling is a victory for Philip Morris USA, which won another chance to challenge an Oregon jury's punitive damages award that was 97 times the actual damages for the death of Jesse Williams, a longtime Marlboro smoker.

IN-DEPTH: Court's opinion | On Deadline: Share your thoughts

The ruling follows a recent trend by the court to set criteria for awarding punitive damages, which are used to punish a defendant and deter wrongdoing. The justices found that jurors might have improperly considered the harm to numerous other Oregonians hooked on cigarettes.

William Ohlemeyer, vice president of Philip Morris USA, said the decision will ensure that companies are punished "only for harm caused to the plaintiff, and not to strangers."

Robert Peck, who represents Williams' widow, called the ruling "extremely narrow" and said juries generally were not trying to boost damages based on direct harm to third-parties.

The court did not rule on a second, more closely watched claim from Philip Morris that the award was "grossly excessive."

Tuesday's ruling could affect an array of cases that arise from an individual's injury, but have in the backdrop harm to other people, such as cases against automakers or drug companies.

DOJ_NMG_0134597

Williams successfully sued Philip Morris for negligence and deceit after her husband died of lung cancer in 1997. She claimed that the company engaged in a fraudulent campaign to minimize the dangers of smoking. The jury awarded $821,000 in actual damages and $79.5 million in punitive damages.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stephen Breyer said the trial judge's instructions may have unconstitutionally led the jury to punish Philip Morris directly for harm to other smokers. He said evidence of such harm may be used to show that the company's misconduct was particularly reprehensible — a factor that may be considered in the amount of punitive damages, but one that is restricted.

The case now returns to Oregon courts.

Dissenting were Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Supreme Court Voids $79.5 Million Award In A Tobacco Suit (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court on Tuesday further tightened limits on punitive damages, tossing out a $79.5 million judgment against tobacco giant Philip Morris because jurors had agreed to the award, in part, to punish the company for harming people other than the plaintiff.

The ruling is a significant victory for businesses and their advocates, who've complained that the court's old rules allowed lawyers to win class action-sized judgments in individual lawsuits.

"Plaintiffs won't be able to incite jurors to assess runaway awards based on purported injuries to others," said Lori Nugent, a lawyer with the Cozen O'Connor law firm who specializes in defending corporations in punitive-damages suits. "Juries will evaluate punitive damages based solely on the defendant's conduct toward the plaintiff. This is a significant swing of the pendulum toward returning fairness to courtrooms across the country, and will make a meaningful difference in numerous cases that are set for trial and on appeal right now."

The decision extends a line of high-court rulings that have placed constitutional limits on punitive damage, a novel and somewhat controversial approach that's drawn sharp criticism even from some of the justices.

Tuesday's 5-4 ruling, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, said awarding damages to punish a company for harming nonparties to a suit amounted to taking property without due process. Breyer added: "to permit punishment for injuring a nonparty victim would add a near standardless dimension to the punitive damages equation. How many such victims are there? How seriously were they injured? Under what circumstances did injury occur? The trial will not likely answer such questions as to nonparty victims."

Tuesday's ruling involved a judgment obtained by Mayola Williams after her husband, Jesse, a smoker for 47 years, died of lung cancer. Williams alleged that Philip Morris, now part of Altria Inc., misled her husband into thinking that smoking was safe.

The jury found that Jesse Williams and Philip Morris were equally responsible for his death, and awarded his widow $800,000 in compensatory damages. But it went further, finding the company liable for $79.5 million in punitive damages for a campaign of deceit that allegedly led to health problems for smokers throughout Oregon. None of those smokers was a plaintiff in Williams' suit, yet the judgment reflected their injuries.

The trial judge reduced Williams' award, but the Oregon Court of Appeals reinstated the larger amount and the Oregon Supreme Court upheld that judgment.

Breyer said that was unfair.

"A defendant threatened with punishment for injuring a nonparty victim has no opportunity to defend against the charge, by showing, for example in a case such as this, that the other victim was not entitled to damages because he or she knew that smoking was dangerous or did not rely upon the defendant's statements to the contrary," Breyer wrote.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy, David H. Souter and Samuel A. Alito Jr. agreed with Breyer.

Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Clarence Thomas dissented.

The court's split in the case defies the crude political categorizations of the justices, and as a result is a poignant example of the court's tendency to cleave along strictly judicial lines in many cases.

DOJ_NMG_0134598

Thomas and Scalia, for example, objected to Tuesday's ruling for the same reasons they've resisted all the court's decisions limiting punitive damages: They don't think that the Constitution addresses the issue.

That puts them at odds with Roberts, Alito and Kennedy, the remaining justices in the court's politically conservative wing. Kennedy long has agreed that the Constitution's due-process requirements prevent excessive punitive judgments. Roberts and Alito embraced that thinking for the first time on the high court in Tuesday's ruling.

Stevens' vote represents a departure for him on this issue; he penned the 1996 ruling that established constitutional limits for punitive damages, but said Tuesday's ruling went too far.

High Court Rejects $79.5 Million Award In Philip Morris Case (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court on Tuesday tossed out a $79.5 million punitive damage award won by a smoker's widow against Philip Morris, ruling that Oregon jurors improperly considered harm to other smokers in punishing the tobacco giant.

By a 5-4 vote, the Court said that a state violates the Constitution's due-process clause when it uses a punitive damage award to punish a defendant for injuries suffered by "strangers to the litigation," in the words of Justice Stephen Breyer, who wrote the majority opinion.

"A defendant threatened with punishment for injuring a nonparty victim has no opportunity to defend against the charge," Breyer wrote.

Business advocates applauded the ruling as a major body blow, grounded in the Constitution, against high punitive damage awards.

"This is a huge, huge win for corporate defendants," said Lori Nugent, chair of the enterprise risks practice of Cozen O'Connor in Chicago, and author of a state-by-state guide on punitive damages. "Lawyers who exhort jurors to send a message; that has to stop now. It rips the guts right out of a case."

But plaintiffs groups say the decision won't change much, especially since the Court on Tuesday also said that harm to others could still be considered by jurors in determining the defendant's level of "reprehensibility."

"Ultimately, I don't think this is going to be very significant. The Court was slaying dragons that don't exist," said Robert Peck, who argued the case on behalf of Mayola Williams, widow of longtime Oregon smoker Jesse Williams, whose estate won the case against Philip Morris. On remand to Oregon, Peck said, the case could still result in a significant punitive damage award.

The ruling also disappointed some business groups because it explicitly stopped short of setting numerical limits on excessive punitive damages -- a holy grail for critics of the tort system. The Court's sidestep caused some tobacco-company stocks to dip on Wall Street after the ruling.

The decision in Philip Morris USA v. Williams represented the first time Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. showed their stripes on an issue that scrambles the usual alliances on the Court. Both Roberts and Alito joined the Breyer majority, along with Justices Anthony Kennedy and David Souter. In dissent were Justices Clarence Thomas -- who sees no limit to punitive damages written in the Constitution -- and Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

It was also the first time that evidence of tobacco-company misconduct, dug up by years of discovery in litigation, was before the Court, albeit in the background. But Breyer's majority made scant mention of the evidence or of any particulars of Williams' case.

Commentators and dissenters questioned how the Court's ruling will be applied in real courtrooms. Breyer said judges will have to be vigilant in ensuring that jurors only consider harm to others in assessing reprehensibility, not in deciding the level of punitive damages. "State courts cannot authorize procedures that create an unreasonable and unnecessary risk of any such confusion occurring," Breyer said.

"It seems, then, that jurors can think about harm to others in deciding that the conduct was awful enough to merit punitive damages" in the first place, said Michael Krauss, torts professor at George Mason University School of Law. "But then they can't think about it anymore, because when they set the amount of the damage award, the Court is saying it has to reflect only the harm to the plaintiff. You'll have to wash your brain out" between steps.

DOJ_NMG_0134599

Krauss adds, "How you force the jury into this intellectual straightjacket isn't clear. What is clear is that this issue will be back before the Court."

Ginsburg in her dissent also predicted that the task of guiding jurors will be difficult. "A judge seeking to enlighten rather than confuse surely would resist delivering the requested charge."

She added that the majority should have shown greater respect to the Oregon Supreme Court and other state courts that have tried "diligently to adhere to our changing, less than crystalline precedent."

In another key business ruling from the Northwest on Tuesday, the Court ruled unanimously in favor of Weyerhaeuser, the timber company, in a dispute over "predatory bidding." Ross-Simmons, a sawmill company, claimed that Weyerhaeuser tried to drive it out of business by bidding up the price of red alder logs to a level that Weyerhaeuser could afford to pay, but Ross-Simmons could not.

In a ruling by Thomas, the Court agreed that the same standard used in antitrust "predatory pricing" cases should apply to bidding or buying cases -- a standard that is difficult for plaintiffs like Ross-Simmons to meet.

Supreme Court Puts New Rules On Damage Awards (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

An Oregon jury violated constitutional principles of fairness when it levied a $79.5 million punitive-damages award against the Philip Morris tobacco company in a single smoker lawsuit.

In a 5-to-4 decision announced Tuesday, the US Supreme Court struck down the verdict because it said the jury violated due-process protections when it sought to punish the tobacco company for injuries suffered by nonparties to the litigation.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stephen Breyer said the jury could consider Philip Morris's alleged deceptive conduct toward all smokers in Oregon in determining the reprehensibility of its conduct. But he said the jury could not then punish Philip Morris for that same conduct without violating the tobacco company's constitutional rights.

In reaching its decision, the court avoided addressing the most closely watched issue in the case: whether a nearly $80 million punitive-damages award for the widow of a smoker is constitutionally excessive.

"The Constitution imposes certain limits in respect both to procedures for awarding punitive damages and to amounts forbidden as 'grossly excessive,' " Justice Breyer writes. But he said the court would address only the procedural issue and leave it to the Oregon courts to address the issue of excessive punitive damages during any retrial.

The decision is important because it represents a move by the high court to impose constitutional limits on punitive-damage awards. But the decision also exposes sharp differences within the court on the issue.

Justices John Paul Stevens, Clarence Thomas, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg all filed dissents. Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Thomas joined Justice Ginsburg's dissent.

"While apparently recognizing the novelty of its holding, the majority relies on a distinction between taking third-party harm into account in order to assess the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct – which is permitted – from doing so in order to punish the defendant directly – which is forbidden," writes Justice Stevens in his dissent. "This nuance eludes me."

"A murderer who kills his victim by throwing a bomb that injures dozens of bystanders should be punished more severely than one who harms no one other than his intended victim," Stevens writes.

"There is no reason why the measure of the appropriate punishment for engaging in a campaign of deceit in distributing a poisonous and addictive substance to thousands of cigarette smokers statewide should not include consideration of the harm to those 'bystanders' as well as the harm to the individual plaintiff," Stevens writes.

The decision stems from an Oregon lawsuit filed in 1997 against Philip Morris by Mayola Williams after her husband, Jesse, died following a diagnosis of lung cancer. Mr. Williams had smoked three packs of cigarettes a day for 45 years.

Lawyers for Philip Morris told the jury that Williams accepted the risks of smoking despite government warnings about the dangers of cigarettes and tobacco.

Mrs. Williams's lawyers countered that Philip Morris perpetrated a massive fraud by pushing an addictive and dangerous product on unsuspecting consumers. Tobacco company officials adopted a strategy of casting doubt on government health warnings, the lawyers said. The firms offered just enough of a crutch to allow addicted smokers – like Mr. Williams – the justification and reassurance to go ahead and ignore the government's warnings and continue their smoking habit, the lawyers told the jury.

DOJ_NMG_0134600

Business and industry groups have been following the case, hoping the high court would use it to inject a higher level of predictability into American tort law. Business associations complain that in many states they face open-ended liability from jurors who view corporations as deep pockets capable of paying any penalty.

On the other side, trial lawyers, consumer groups, and health organizations were hoping the high court would back away from earlier efforts to limit what a majority of justices had viewed as excessive punitive damages. These groups see the threat of large punitive-damage awards as an effective deterrent against wrongdoing and as a positive force in society.

Justices Overturn Tobacco Award (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

$80 Million Penalty Is Called Excessive

The Supreme Court yesterday overturned a nearly $80 million verdict intended to punish the Philip Morris tobacco company for endangering the lives of smokers, and the justices set limits on how jurors can decide to make big business pay for wrongdoing.

The court's narrowly written 5 to 4 decision said an Oregon court had improperly let jurors calculate the harm done to many in deciding damages paid to an individual.

The court ruled that the Constitution's due-process clause forbids a state to use punitive damages to punish a company for injury it inflicts upon others who are "essentially, strangers to the litigation," according to the majority opinion, written by Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

The case was seen at the beginning of the term as one of the most important business decisions that the court would make under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., and it was clearly a victory for Philip Morris and other big companies. It continues the reasoning in the court's recent rulings that punitive damages -- aimed at punishing a company and deterring more wrongdoing -- must be proportionate to the wrong committed.

But in sending the case back to Oregon courts for further litigation, the justices sidestepped a decision that industry had most wanted: whether to set a solid cap on how much could be awarded for punitive damages, perhaps based on a specific ratio to the actual damages done to the individual who brought the suit.

Still, business advocates praised the decision.

"This is a really important case for the business community, and a big win," said Robin Conrad, senior vice president of the National Chamber Litigation Center of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. She said it would be valuable to insurance companies, automakers, pharmaceutical manufacturers and other firms that have been hit with huge punitive-damages awards in recent years.

But Robert S. Peck, the Washington lawyer who represented the Oregon smoker's widow who brought the suit, said the decision "slays a dragon that didn't exist." Peck contended that the jury calculated its large award not on the number of other victims but on the company's profitability, and he predicted that Oregon courts will "reaffirm" that they "did the right thing."

How the jury decided the amount to award is unclear, and confusion at the Supreme Court oral arguments foreshadowed the justices' ultimate decision. "Isn't perhaps the better course to send this back to them . . .?" suggested Justice David H. Souter, who voted with the majority to do just that.

The case involved Jesse Williams, a Portland janitor who smoked at least two packs of Marlboros every day for 45 years and died of lung cancer in 1996. Philip Morris, now owned by Altria Group, had denied during that time that its cigarettes were addictive, and at trial, lawyers for his estate told the jury to consider the damage done to other smokers in Oregon.

The attorney for his widow, Mayola Williams, told the jury to "think about how many other Jesse Williams in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been."

DOJ_NMG_0134601

The jury awarded Mayola Williams $821,000 in compensation and then tacked on the $79.5 million punitive award. (Not all states allow punitive awards; in Oregon, 60 percent of the award goes to the state, Peck said.) The nearly 100 to 1 ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages is far outside the "single-digit" ratio the Supreme Court suggested in previous cases, but a firm limit has never been set.

The majority opinion issued yesterday agreed with Williams that the jury could hear evidence of harm to others to show that a company's conduct was reprehensible, which could increase the punitive-damages award.

But Breyer wrote a "jury may go no further than this and use a punitive damages verdict to punish a defendant directly on account of harms it is alleged to have visited on nonparties."

Dissenting justices said they wondered how a judge could properly instruct a jury to consider what Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg called our "less than crystalline precedent."

The majority "relies on a distinction between taking third-party harm into account in order to assess the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct -- which is permitted -- from doing so in order to punish the defendant 'directly' -- which is forbidden," Justice John Paul Stevens wrote. "This nuance eludes me."

The court's split in recent decisions limiting punitive damages is far different from the ideological differences that are apparent in many decisions on social issues. Breyer was joined by Roberts and Justices Samuel A. Alito, Anthony Kennedy and David H. Souter.

Stevens, who in the past has supported limiting the amounts of punitive awards, joined Ginsburg and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

The case was sent back to the Oregon Supreme Court, which had upheld the large punitive award. Breyer wrote that the application of the court's standard may "lead to the need for a new trial, or a change in the level of the punitive damages award."

The case is Philip Morris USA v. Williams, case No. 05-1256. Also yesterday, the court ruled 5 to 4 that a Florida death row inmate could not challenge his conviction in the federal court system because he missed a one-year filing deadline.

High Court Denies Altria Damages, Sets No Formula (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Vanessa O'Connell

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court's move to throw out a $79.5 million award against Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA was another boon for corporate defendants. But it wasn't the knockout blow against punitive damages that business had sought.

The 5-4 ruling turned on the court's finding defendants can't be punished for harms suffered by consumers who aren't party to a lawsuit. But the justices refused to impose a formula, sought by business groups, that would limit punitive-damage awards.

• The News: The Supreme Court tosses out a $79.5 million punitive- damages award against Philip Morris.

• The Background: The court was asked to look at whether defendants could be punished for harm suffered by those who weren't party to the lawsuit.

• The Outlook: Judges likely will instruct jurors to avoid multiplying the harm of a single plaintiff to reach a punitive damage award, potentially reducing the size of such awards.

The ruling extended a string of recent decisions reining in the penalties juries can impose on corporate wrongdoers. Judges now will be more likely to instruct jurors to avoid simply multiplying the harm done to a single plaintiff to reach a punitive-damage award.

"If there are 10,000 widgets sold," a jury can't mechanically fix punitive damages by multiplying compensatory damages 10,000 times, said Sherman Joyce, president of the American Tort Reform Association, an industry group that filed a friend-of-the court brief siding with Philip Morris.

The original case turned on a jury award to Mayola Williams, who was awarded $821,000 in compensatory damages and nearly 100 times that amount in punitive damages in a lawsuit after the death of her husband, Jesse, in 1996. The state court jury in Oregon found his death was caused by cigarettes.

DOJ_NMG_0134602

Writing for the five-member majority, Justice Stephen Breyer found that punitive awards partly based on harm to nonparties "amount to a taking of 'property' from the defendant without due process."

At the same time, recognizing that punitive damages are intended to punish wrongdoing and deter its recurrence, the court observed "that conduct that risks harm to many is likely more reprehensible than conduct that risks harm only to a few," so juries may take such factors into account when awarding damages.

"This nuance eludes me," wrote dissenting Justice John Paul Stevens. He argued there was no practical difference between directly punishing the defendant for harming third parties and increasing the punishment because harm to a single plaintiff was more "reprehensible" given its potential harm to others.

An immediate beneficiary of the ruling could be Merck & Co., which now faces some 28,000 lawsuits over its painkiller Vioxx.

Trying each complaint separately, Merck has won eight liability trials to date and lost four. One verdict in Merck's favor later was tossed out by a state court judge, while two Los Angeles state court cases resulted in mistrials Jan. 18. In all four losses, meanwhile, juries awarded plaintiffs punitive damages ranging from $1 million to $229 million. Two of the damage awards were later automatically reduced under Texas state law.

Though the U.S. Constitution makes no mention of punitive damages, the court in recent years has found that some awards are so high as to violate due process.

In 1996, the justices threw out a $2 million punitive award won by a consumer who learned that his car salesman had concealed the fact that a new BMW had been damaged and repainted before sale. A 5-4 court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, found the amount "grossly excessive" after considering the actual damages the plaintiff suffered, civil penalties for similar misconduct and the defendant's "degree of reprehensibility."

In 2003, in a 6-3 opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the court rejected a 145-to-1 punitive-to-compensatory damage ratio. A Utah court had awarded the damages to a policyholder who contended State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. had misled her into believing it would cover her liability for a car accident. The court suggested that "single-digit multipliers are more likely to comport with due process" than larger ones.

Industry groups were hoping the court would follow that ruling with an ironclad rule against double- or triple-digit multipliers. But the court said it need not reach that issue.

Bob Peck, the lawyer who represented Mrs. Williams, suggested the impact of the ruling would be muted. Jurors rarely multiply the victims to reach punitive awards, he said. The $79.5 million award in his case, he said, could be understood as "precisely 2.5 weeks' profit" for Philip Morris.

At the Supreme Court, Philip Morris argued that the original Oregon trial judge failed to instruct the jury in the proper way to consider harm to third parties. The judge declined to issue the company's proposed jury instruction, which would have advised that "although you may consider the extent of harm suffered by others" in assessing a proper penalty for Mr. Williams's death, "you are not to punish the defendant for the impact of its alleged misconduct on other persons, who may bring lawsuits of their own...."

Justice Breyer found that this jury instruction would have set the proper balance. Imposing damages for harm to nonparties would violate the Constitution's Due Process Clause, because the defendant would have no chance to defend against the charges, he wrote. Moreover, permitting such factors "would add a near standardless factor to the punitive damages equation."

The decision was notable as well for the split it signaled between Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, who have held that the Constitution didn't contemplate any limits on punitive damages, and the court's two newest members, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

The chief justice and Justice Alito joined the majority along with Justices Anthony Kennedy and David Souter. Justices Scalia and Thomas joined the dissent by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who wrote that the Oregon jury had properly considered "the extent of harm suffered by others as a measure of reprehensibility."

The case returns to the Oregon Supreme Court, which could order a new trial or issue a new opinion comporting with yesterday's decision.

The decision is unlikely to have an impact on class-action litigation, because in such lawsuits mass numbers of plaintiffs are formally represented.

DOJ_NMG_0134603

Punitive damages are alleged in a majority of the pending cases against Philip Morris, which as of year end faced 196 pending suits brought by individual smokers, 10 class actions concerning smoking and health claims and 20 class-action lawsuits concerning its "light" cigarettes, among other litigation. In a number of states where antitobacco suits are pending, punitive damages don't exist, or are limited, tobacco lawyers note.

Justices Overturn $79.5 Million Tobacco Ruling (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — The Supreme Court on Tuesday overturned an Oregon jury's award of $79.5 million in punitive damages against Philip Morris on the ground that jurors might have improperly calculated the figure to punish the cigarette maker for the harm it caused to smokers other than the man whose widow brought the case.

Although of limited scope, the 5 to 4 decision was a victory for the cigarette industry and for other corporate defendants whose products or behavior have caused widespread injury and who are thus likely to face skeptical or hostile juries.

The court was tightly focused on a question of procedural fairness: the need, in the majority's view, to make sure that juries do not punish defendants for harm to others who are not parties to the lawsuit, or who even may have brought their own lawsuits previously and lost. "The due process clause prohibits a state's inflicting punishment for harm caused strangers to the litigation," Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote in the majority opinion.

The court thus steered clear of the issue that most animates the debate over punitive damages: whether a punitive damage award that is much greater than the compensatory damages awarded by the jury can be considered unconstitutionally excessive. In this case, the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages was nearly 100 to one, but the court did not address the issue despite Philip Morris having raised it.

What happens next in this lawsuit may provide an early indication of the practical significance of the court's ruling, as far as it went. The case now goes back to the Oregon Supreme Court, which has options ranging from reinstating the award to ordering a new trial. The original trial of the suit, brought by Mayola Williams, whose husband, Jesse, died of lung cancer after smoking two packs of Marlboros a day for 45 years, took place in 1999.

Mrs. Williams's lawyer asked the jury to "think about how many other Jesse Williams in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been." The trial judge rejected a request by Philip Morris for an instruction warning the jury that "you are not to punish the defendant for the impact of its alleged misconduct on other persons."

The Supreme Court on Tuesday did not require any particular wording in the form of a jury instruction. But Justice Breyer said that state judicial systems had a constitutional obligation to avoid "an unreasonable and unnecessary risk" that a jury would calculate the punitive damages based on harm to those not before the court.

The issue is complicated because, under the Supreme Court's precedents, the "reprehensibility" of a defendant's conduct is a factor that a jury is explicitly directed to consider in setting a punitive damages award. Justice Breyer acknowledged that harm to others can serve as a measure of reprehensibility, and that jurors will necessarily consider it. That was appropriate, he said, as long as courts "provide some form of protection" against jurors seeking "to punish the defendant for having caused injury to others."

Sheila L. Birnbaum, a punitive damages specialist with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York, said the court was requiring jurors to "unring the bell" in a way that might prove difficult. "It's very hard for jurors to disregard something they have heard," she said.

Ms. Birnbaum, who successfully argued the most recent punitive damages case heard by the court before this one, on behalf of the State Farm insurance company in 2003, added that the decision was nonetheless "a step in the right direction" for corporate defendants because it would require trial judges and appellate courts to be attentive to the guidance that jurors receive.

Justice Breyer's majority opinion, Philip Morris USA v. Williams, No. 05-1256, was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and by Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter and Samuel A. Alito Jr. The dissenters were Justices John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

DOJ_NMG_0134604

It is typical for the court's punitive damages rulings to cut across the usual ideological lines. In fact, the only real surprise was the vote by Justice Stevens, who had previously voted with the court's majority to support limits on punitive damages.

In his dissenting opinion, Justice Stevens said he was "firmly convinced" that those earlier decisions were correct. But he said that "in my view the Oregon Supreme Court faithfully applied the reasoning in those opinions to the egregious facts disclosed by this record." He said that "no procedural error even arguably justifying reversal occurred at the trial in this case."

The court's two new members, Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, succeeded justices who supported limits on punitive damages, as they themselves did on Tuesday. But the narrowness of the court's opinion and its avoidance of the excessiveness issue raised the question of whether, beneath the surface stability, the court's polarity may have shifted.

In the State Farm case that Ms. Birnbaum argued four years ago, the court overturned a punitive damage award that was 145 times greater than the compensatory award. "Few awards exceeding a single-digit ratio" would meet the test of due process, Justice Kennedy wrote then for a 6-to-3 majority, a strong statement that made the court's failure on Tuesday to address the 97 to one ratio in the Philip Morris case all the more curious. (The Oregon jury awarded Mrs. Williams $821,000 in compensatory damages.)

To hold that a damage award is unconstitutionally excessive requires the court to accept the argument that the due process clause contains a substantive component as well as a procedural one. It is on this basis that Justices Scalia and Thomas, who do not accept the modern doctrine of "substantive due process," have dissented from the leading punitive damages decisions.

It is not implausible that Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito might share that view. Whether they do might become apparent if the Oregon Supreme Court reinstates the punitive damages verdict and Philip Morris comes back before the justices with a new appeal based on excessiveness.

The dissenters tweaked the majority for what they characterized as judicial activism and refusal to give state courts proper respect. "I would accord more respectful treatment to the proceedings and disposition of state courts that sought diligently to adhere to our changing, less than crystalline precedent," Justice Ginsburg said in an opinion that Justices Scalia and Thomas also signed.

In a prepared statement, William S. Ohlemeyer, vice president and associate general counsel of Philip Morris, a unit of Altria, said the decision would give the company "an opportunity to fully and fairly defend itself in this and other cases."

Market analysts generally viewed the decision as positive for industry. "Despite a more narrow opinion than we had hoped for, we view the ruling as a positive as it effectively limits the size of punitive damages in future cases," said Christopher R. Growe, an analyst at A. G. Edwards & Sons, in a note to investors.

In recent months, investors have pushed Altria's stock to record highs, in part because they believe the litigation environment against tobacco companies has significantly improved. On Tuesday, Altria's stock closed at $85.95, down 25 cents.

Reward To Smoker's Widow Nixed By Top Court (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court yesterday took away almost $80 million awarded to the widow of a longtime smoker and threw into doubt the prospects of future high-dollar jury awards against businesses.

A divided Supreme Court ruled 5-4 in favor of Altria Group, the parent of Richmond company Philip Morris USA and Kraft Foods, which contested an Oregon Supreme Court's upholding of an earlier verdict that forced the maker of the popular Marlboro cigarette to pay $79.5 million in damages.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, writing for the majority, said a punitive-damages award based on a jury's desire to punish a defendant for harming those who are not parties to the lawsuit amounted to taking property from the defendant, which would be a violation of the constitutional right of due process. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Samuel A. Alito Jr., Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter made up the rest of the majority.

However, the court refused a request from the tobacco giant that it set a clear limit on the size of punitive damages awarded in tobacco cases.

DOJ_NMG_0134605

"This decision is a big deal because it will have a tremendous impact on other industries facing similar litigation," said Robin Conrad, senior vice president of the National Chamber Litigation Center at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "The court's decision now provides businesses with additional protection against juries' arbitrary awards of punitive damages."

Jonathan S. Franklin, a D.C. lawyer, agreed, saying the ruling that juries can't consider the harm to others "limits the ability of plaintiffs to argue for enormous damage awards."

"This is not just a victory for the tobacco companies," he told the Associated Press, but it's good for any company that might be subject to product liability suits in which punitive awards might be involved.

But Justice Clarence Thomas, in his dissent, said the ruling leaves the court with no clear stance on punitive damages.

"Today's opinion proves once again that this court's punitive damages jurisprudence is 'insusceptible of principled interpretation.' "

The court's decision leaves U.S. juries to ponder punitive damages under this rule: The jury may consider actual or potential harm to others in deciding how reprehensible a company's conduct was, but may not punish the company for the harm caused to others.

"The court took a big wooden spoon and stirred up the swamp, making the view muddier than ever," said Steve Emmert, chairman of the appellate practice subcommittee for the Virginia state bar's litigation section. "I am convinced that this ruling will lead to confused juries looking to confused judges for guidance."

States will have some flexibility to determine the rules that will help minimize jury confusion over the standard set yesterday.

The justices did not split down party lines, further bolstering reaction from lawyers that yesterday's decision leaves punitive damage law on murky ground. The court last placed limits on such awards in 2003.

Mr. Emmert said the decision is likely to result in smaller dollar amounts awarded to defendants but will not slow the number of cases brought to courts around the country.

Just over one-fifth of U.S. adults smoked cigarettes in 2005, down from one-quarter of the country's adults a decade ago.

Mayola Williams sued Philip Morris for fraud on behalf of her husband, a two-pack-a-day smoker for 45 years, who died of lung cancer nine years ago. She argued the jury award was appropriate because it punishes Philip Morris' misconduct for a decades-long "massive market-directed fraud" that misled smokers into thinking cigarettes were not dangerous or addictive.

Philip Morris argued that the jury should have been told explicitly that other smokers must prove their own cases.

"We believe that this decision will provide Philip Morris USA with an opportunity to fully and fairly defend itself in this and other cases," said William S. Ohlemeyer, Philip Morris USA vice president and associate general counsel.

"There are clearly constitutional limits to the imposition of punitive damages, and today's decision makes clear that state courts must properly instruct juries on those limits to ensure that they are punishing only for harm caused to the plaintiff, and not to strangers."

But the day was not a total success for cigarette makers, as the high court turned down the industry's bid to eliminate a 75-cent-per-pack fee on Minnesota residents that the state imposed to help pay for rising health care costs.

Reynolds American Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco, Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco and Philip Morris said the fee unconstitutionally requires the companies to pay beyond the 1998 $200 billion settlement agreement the industry reached with states.

"This decision doesn't leave us anywhere to go," said David Howard, a spokesman for R.J. Reynolds. "It could give other states the opportunity to look at a similar tax. We think it is double dipping and would oppose it as a violation of the master agreement [1998 settlement]."

Shielding The Powerful (NYT)

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court's decision yesterday overturning a nearly $80 million punitive damage award against Philip Morris is a win for corporate wrongdoers. It stretches the Constitution's guarantee of due process in a way that will make it easier for companies that act reprehensibly to sidestep serious punishments.

DOJ_NMG_0134606

It also provides unsettling new evidence that the court is more concerned about — and more willing to protect — the powerful than the powerless.

An Oregon jury awarded Mayola Williams, the widow of a cigarette smoker, about $821,000 in compensatory damages and $79.5 million in punitive damages. Ms. Williams argued that Philip Morris had spent 40 years denying the connection between smoking and cancer, even though it knew cigarettes were deadly. The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the punitive damages award, saying that Philip Morris's actions had been "extraordinarily reprehensible." By keeping Oregonians smoking longer than they otherwise would have, the court said, the company's actions would, "naturally and inevitably, lead to significant injury or death."

By a 5-to-4 vote that did not follow the usual ideological lines, the court ruled that the award was improper because it punished Philip Morris for harm done to people who were not part of the lawsuit. There is nothing unusual, or wrong, about courts considering the broader impact of a wrongdoer's misdeeds. As Justice John Paul Stevens noted in dissent, "A murderer who kills his victim by throwing a bomb that injures dozens of bystanders should be punished more severely than one who harms no one other than his intended victim." The fact that Philip Morris hurt so many other smokers along with Jesse Williams is surely relevant to its punishment.

The court in recent years has become increasingly activist when it comes to defending the rights of corporations by striking down punitive damage awards. And yesterday's ruling continues that trend. It expands the notion of due process. And it overturns the decisions of a jury and a state supreme court.

Unfortunately, the court has been far less activist when ordinary people seek protection or challenge their punishments. The ruling stands in particular contrast with the court's 2003 decision that the Eighth Amendment's ban on "cruel and unusual punishments" did not bar California, under its "three strikes" law, from sentencing a man to 50 years in prison for stealing $153.53 worth of videotapes. Yesterday's decision is another disturbing sign that — as the current court reads the Constitution — powerful parties have more rights than regular people.

Class Actions In Drag (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court dealt another blow against runaway tort damages yesterday in a long-running case between Philip Morris and the late Jesse Williams, a heavy smoker whose Marlboro habit killed him. Maybe next time the Justices will go even further and provide some clearer guidance to lower courts.

The question before the High Court was how far a jury could go in awarding "punitive" damages, especially where the behavior being punished was deemed "reprehensible." In the original lawsuit, the jury awarded Mr. Williams's widow $79.5 million in punitive damages on top of $821,000 in compensatory damages, a tidy ratio of 97-1.

The opinion of the 5-4 majority, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, never addressed whether this ratio was "excessive," as the court has done in other recent cases. Instead the majority, which included Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Samuel Alito, Anthony Kennedy and David Souter, ruled that Philip Morris had been punished not only for harm to Williams, the deceased, but to other smokers in the state -- a back-door class action, in effect.

This seems a sound impulse on a number of grounds. Our courts are already riddled with enough class actions without turning single-plaintiff cases into more of the same through the punitive-damages process. And awarding damages based on harm to what Justice Breyer calls "strangers to the case" risks seeing businesses dunned many times over when multiple plaintiffs sue over the same harm. The majority opinion concluded that harm to others could be taken into account in determining how "reprehensible" a tort was, but could not be figured into the punitive-damages award "directly."

Ruth Bader Ginsburg was joined in dissent by Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and John Paul Stevens. She argued, with some cause, that Justice Breyer's opinion was trying to maintain a distinction without much difference. And it is true that the Court offered little in the way of objective standards -- such as a firm ratio between compensatory and punitive damages -- to determine when a defendant was likely being punished for harm to others. But in affirming that procedural safeguards against excessive damages were necessary, at least the Court took another step in the direction of reining in huge punitive awards.

DOJ_NMG_0134607

It is noteworthy, too, that the Court's two newest members joined the majority here. Justices Thomas and Scalia have long been skeptics of limitations on punitive damages and of the "substantive due process" arguments that lie behind yesterday's ruling. But in joining the majority, the Court's newest Justices demonstrated their awareness that, when punitive-damage awards grow large enough, real issues of justice and fairness (and thus due process) are implicated.

The Court currently has a petition before it to hear another punitive-damages case, this one involving a rollover in a Ford Explorer SUV. The case would give the Justices another opening to address what safeguards are necessary to ensure that the rights of defendants and plaintiffs alike are respected when it comes to the evidence and arguments that can be presented to ring up huge damage awards. In the long run, it may be that procedural safeguards on how these cases are argued and how juries are told to weigh the evidence could make judicial limits on outsize punitive damages less important, but yesterday's ruling in Philip Morris v. Williams is unlikely to be the final word.

Yesterday's ruling looks to be one more example of what Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III has astutely called the High Court's recent tendency toward "split the difference" jurisprudence. Rather than rooting decisions in the Constitution or statutory text, such reasoning tends to "relax constraints on judicial discretion" and thus augment the power of judges over the other branches, as Judge Wilkinson put it last year in the Stanford Law Review. We'd add that this habit is a specialty of Justices Breyer and Kennedy, both of whom love to play the role of King Solomon.

In any case, inflicting gigantic damages in civil cases without standards to guide either judges or juries are a real problem, despite what Justices Thomas and Scalia seem to believe. And in ruling that standards have to be applied in how these cases are argued -- and not only in the number that is finally arrived at -- the Court may have hit upon an important area for reform. But thanks to the Court's willingness to split too many differences, Philip Morris can't exhale just yet.

Surgeon, Chiropractors Charged In $6 Million Fraud Schemes (ATLBIZ)

Atlanta Business Chronicle, February 21, 2007

A federal grand jury handed down two separate health-care fraud indictments today, charging a total of five health-care providers with fraudulently billing approximately $6 million, principally for a back pain procedure.

According to the U.S. Attorney's office, Howard Berkowitz, 59, of Atlanta; Arthur Hargraves, 66, of Douglasville; and Daniel Puffenberger, 51, of Kissimmee, Fla., were each charged with five counts of health care fraud that they allegedly committed as owners of the Associated Spinal Care Network in Douglasville. The indictment alleges that Berkowitz was an orthopedic surgeon and the medical director of Associated Spinal Care, while the two other defendants were chiropractors. The indictment alleges that Associated Spinal Care, at the direction of the three, billed Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Georgia for over $3 million relating to the procedure from 2001 through 2005.

In another indictment, William Stearns, 45, of Marietta, Georgia, and Steven Levine, 50, of Roswell, were charged with health-care fraud and other violations that they allegedly committed as owners of the Comprehensive Care Medical Group in Marietta. Comprehensive Care, at the direction of Stearns and Levine, allegedly billed Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Georgia for approximately $1.8 million for the procedures in 2003 and 2004.

Separately, Stearns also allegedly submitted fraudulent bills to Blue Cross relating to a procedure in which an electrical stimulation machine was attached to the surface of a patient's body. The indictment alleges that Comprehensive Care fraudulently submitted over $1.5 million in bills for that procedure.

The cases are being investigated by the FBI.

Nine Doctors Indicted For Billing Fraud (OCR)

By Blythe Bernhard, The Orange County Register

Orange County Register, February 15, 2007

Total of 18 are accused of scheme to bilk Medicare.

Santa Ana federal grand jury indicted nine doctors and nine others Wednesday on charges of performing unnecessary treatments on mentally ill and elderly adults, and for fraudulently billing Medicare for more than $12 million.

DOJ_NMG_0134608

Physicians Paul Lessler, 68, of Corona Del Mar, Xinming Fu, 45, of Irvine, Michael Wayne Chapman, 53, of Cypress and David Todd Asher, 39, of Fullerton were among those charged with various counts of health care fraud, money laundering and conspiracy.

An attorney for Lessler said he hadn't yet read the indictment and declined to comment further.

According to the indictment, from 2001 to 2004 the doctors allegedly paid recruiters to find patients for respiratory therapy, regardless of their need for treatment. The recruiters would target boarding facilities for the elderly and physically or mentally disabled, including Royal Healthcare, a 66-bed facility in Anaheim.

A woman who answered the phone at Royal Healthcare declined to comment.

Administrators at the facilities were typically paid $100 per resident they referred to the recruiter, federal prosecutors said. Residents were lured to the near-daily treatments with soda, candy and doughnuts.

The treatments on dozens of patients included inhaled medications and chest manipulations. In some cases the treatments weren't performed, prosecutors said. Other times a respiratory therapist would perform the treatments without a physician's supervision, which is not allowed under Medicare rules.

"These people are being touched and given medications based on the payment of a kickback as opposed to medical necessity," said Assistant United States Attorney Jeannie M. Joseph. "I think it's egregious."

The doctors billed Medicare more than $12 million for the treatments, including some that were allegedly performed while the doctors were out of state. Treatments also were falsely billed as having taken place in the doctors' offices or mobile medical vehicles. Medicare prohibits the respiratory treatments from being performed at board-and-care facilities.

The other doctors named in the indictment include Alexander Zinovy Rivkin, 38, Gershon Walter Hepner, 68, and Ramin Sarshad, 38, of Los Angeles; Truc Huy Dao, of Rowland Heights and Aginah M. DeBerry, 54, of Colorado Springs, Colo.

Other Orange County residents indicted in the scheme include recruiter Glen Madrid, 42, of Yorba Linda and boarding care facility administrators Barbara Thrash, 56, of Garden Grove and Shahnaz Chadorbaf-Arastoo, 51, of Irvine.

All 18 defendants are expected to be arraigned March 19 in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. The defendants face a maximum 10-year federal prison sentence for each health care fraud count, 20 years for each money laundering count and five years for each conspiracy count.

The investigation was conducted by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the IRS.

Contact the writer: 714-796-6880 or bbernhard@ocregister.com

CIVIL RIGHTS:

AG Gonzales Touts Better Protection From Religious Discrimination (AP)

By Rose French

AP, February 21, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Southern Baptists on Tuesday the Department of Justice is launching a new program to protect Americans from religious discrimination.

Gonzales said the First Freedom Project would increase education about religious discrimination by holding a series of training seminars throughout the country over coming months.

He also plans to create a Religious Freedom Task Force, which will review policies and religious discrimination cases. He said he doesn't yet know how much the program will cost.

"One of our most cherished freedoms ... is our religious freedom," he told leaders of the Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant denomination, in Nashville. "It is a fundamental part of our nation's history."

The first training seminar will be held in Kansas City, Mo., in March, followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., in April and Seattle, Wash., in May. Other dates and locations will be announced later.

As part of the new program, the Justice Department is also launching a Web site http://www.firstfreedom.gov, with information on enforcement and how to file a religious discrimination complaint.

DOJ_NMG_0134609

On Tuesday the Justice Department also released its report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom, which highlights the number of religious discrimination cases reviewed or investigated by the Department of Justice for fiscal years 2001-06 compared to 1995-2000.

Gonzales said the report shows the Department of Justice has looked into more religious discrimination cases under the Bush administration.

The report details religious discrimination cases involving education, employment, housing, credit, public accommodations and public facilities, zoning and discrimination and bias crime.

For example, he noted cases of religious discrimination in education increased from one case reviewed and no investigations to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations.

Housing- and credit-related cases grew from four investigations and one lawsuit to 18 investigations and six lawsuits while religion-related appellate friend-of-the-court briefs rose from one to 16.

The Department of Justice also reviewed 118 cases and 26 investigations related to land use issues, since the enactment in 2000 of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, which aimed to protect property rights of religious institutions.

Earlier this month, the Southern Baptists, who have long been among the most vocal Christian groups supporting the Bush administration, gave the president an award for advocating religious freedom.

The president has also spoken by video link to the Southern Baptist national convention three times.

Gonzales Says Religious Freedoms A Priority (TENN)

By Anita Wadhwani, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, February 21, 2007

Attorney general tells Baptists of new federal effort

Saying the government has not always paid enough attention to religious discrimination, the country's top law enforcement official picked a gathering of Southern Baptist leaders in Nashville on Tuesday to announce a renewed push to protect religious freedoms.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the establishment of a new Religious Freedom Task Force and stepped up enforcement efforts.

"One of our most cherished freedoms … is our religious liberties," Gonzales told the gathering of about 100 Southern Baptists at the denomination's national headquarters in downtown Nashville. "Nothing defines us more as Americans."

But, he said, religious discrimination is "an area of law that has not always been given sufficient attention by our government."

The Department of Justice's "First Freedom Project" will review religious discrimination complaints, hold seminars to educate religious leaders about how to file complaints and launch a Web site with information on religious liberty laws, Gonzales said.

Local civil libertarians greeted the announcement with skepticism. If the First Freedom Project was meant to protect the religious freedoms of all Americans, why was it announced only to a room full of Southern Baptists, asked Hedy Weinberg, executive director of the Tennessee branch of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Why was just one particular religious community there?" she said. "Religious freedom is a right all of us hold dear ... You'd think you'd want the rainbow of religious beliefs represented."

Gonzales told reporters that he chose a meeting of the nation's largest Protestant denomination because, "this is a group that's very interested in religious freedom."

The gathering is a "receptive audience that would appreciate" his message, he said.

Report compares cases

Gonzales also unveiled a 43-page Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom that highlights enforcement of religious discrimination laws under the Bush administration.

DOJ_NMG_0134610

The report compared cases from 1995-2000 during the Clinton administration to 2001-2006 during the Bush administration. Some examples:

• In the area of religious discrimination cases in education, there were 82 cases reviewed and 40 cases investigated under Bush, compared with one case reviewed and no investigations.

• In the area of religious discrimination in employment, there were 31 investigations referred by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under Bush, compared to 26 under Clinton, the report said.

• In housing, there were 18 investigations opened under the Fair Housing Act in cases involving religious discrimination under Bush, compared to four under Clinton.

• In the area of religious discrimination in public accommodations and public facilities from 2001-2006, there were two investigations. There was none from 1995-2000.

• The number of prosecutions of religious-based attacks rose to six from four.

However, prosecutions of arson, threatened arson and vandalism against houses of worship declined from 75 between 1995-2000 under the Clinton administration to 26 in the next five years, which the report attributed to a rash of church arsons in the mid-1990s that have since ebbed.

Judge Sets Hearing On Kidnapping Charges In 1964 Killings Of 2 Black Men In Miss. (BSH)

By Jack Elliott Jr.

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 21, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal judge will hear arguments Thursday in reputed Ku Klux Klansman James Ford Seale's motion to dismiss kidnapping charges against him in the 1964 slayings of two black men.

U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate scheduled the hearing for 8:30 a.m. at the federal courthouse in Jackson.

Seale, 71, was arrested Jan. 24 at his home in the southwest Mississippi town of Roxie and pleaded not guilty the next day to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. Seale is being held without bond in the Madison County jail outside Jackson.

Seale could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the case tied to the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee.

Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

In a motion to dismiss the charges last month, Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester said the government needed to charge Seale under the law that was in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, in a response filed earlier this month, said Seale's attorneys were misreading the law. Lampton said while the U.S. Supreme Court in 1968 may have eliminated the death penalty for kidnapping, the court did not remove the designation of kidnapping as a capital crime under federal law.

Federal Public Defender S. Dennis Joiner, in a reply to the government's position, said once the death penalty was removed as a penalty for kidnapping, kidnapping became a non-capital offense.

Seale and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards were arrested in 1964. But the FBI - consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared from Neshoba County that summer - turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The Justice Department in 2000 reopened the investigation into the slayings of Moore and Dee.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Two Chino Prison Officers (RPE)

By Paige Austin, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, February 21, 2007

A federal grand jury indicted two officers at the men's prison in Chino on Tuesday on accusations they hurled two shackled inmates to the ground and filed a false report to cover up the incident almost five years ago.

Officer Robert McGowan, 37, of Apple Valley, and Sgt. Thomas Ramos, 50, of Montclair, were named in a three-count indictment stemming from a May 2002 incident that left two inmates with minor injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0134611

Attorneys for the Department of Justice allege McGowan pulled two shackled inmates from a van and allowed them to fall to the ground after an altercation between the inmates and officers. Because of the shackles, the inmates were unable to protect themselves from the fall.

Two weeks later, according to the attorneys, Ramos filed a false report to his boss. He claimed one of the inmates merely slipped even though he had been told that McGowan assaulted the shackled prisoner, charged the U.S. attorneys.

Neither guard could be reached for comment Tuesday.

McGowan faces 20 years in prison on two counts of deprivation of rights under color of law, and Ramos faces 10 years on one count of obstruction of justice if convicted.

Though nearly five years passed before Tuesday's indictment, the incident created a legislative stir in 2003 amid concerns of prisoner abuse, coverups by guards and dysfunction in the department's internal affairs investigative system.

The California Inspector General ordered the corrections department to hand over its files on the case to the Justice Department, said Bill Sessa, a spokesman for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

He declined to comment on the case, adding that the trial will "bear out the facts."

Both McGowan and Ramos were reassigned to posts where they won't work directly with inmates Tuesday after the indictment, said Lt. Mark Hargrove, the prison's spokesman. Ramos has been with the department for 19 years and McGowan has been at the prison for nine years, Hargrove said.

The corrections department referred its investigation to the San Bernardino County district attorney's office years ago, but the district attorney declined to pursue assault charges against the officers, Sessa said.

Officials with the district attorney's office said they could find no record of the case late Tuesday and declined to comment pending further investigation.

McGowan and Ramos are scheduled for arraignment in March, said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office.

These kinds of cases are rare because it's necessary to prove the officer intended to violate the inmate's civil rights, Mrozek said.

"The constitutionally protected rights of every citizen is something we take very seriously," said Mrozek. "You have the right to be free from assault -- even in prison."

Fighting For Access (APP)

By Carol Gorga Williams, COASTAL MONMOUTH BUREAU

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, February 21, 2007

Man seeks better entry points to city's beaches for handicapped, seniors

LONG BRANCH — Long Branch is waiting to hear from the state Department of Environmental Protection on its boardwalk improvement project.

A senior citizen from Ocean Boulevard is appealing to the U.S. Department of Justice to enforce requirements of the Americans with Disabilities Act in connection with oceanfront beach access.

Austin Gelzer, 80, had come before the City Council Jan. 23 to ask for help with beach access, and although officials said they would study the issue, they made no promises.

So Gelzer returned Feb. 13, determined to go to the Justice Department after having completed a complaint form that will go before the Civil Rights Division.

Gelzer is filing the complaint, he said, "in the name of the disabled residents of Long Branch who have been denied access to the beach and public restrooms, and to some degree, sufficient parking facilities."

Gelzer said the city was required, beginning in January 1995, to provide such accommodations.

"The city is now 12 years late," he said.

On July 28, 2005, Gelzer met with City Business Administrator Howard Woolley Jr. and presented him with a petition signed by 150 people, protesting the lack of beach access.

Woolley said then the city could not afford to make improvements without the infusion of some $12 million promised by K. Hovnanian, the proposed developer of Beachfront South.

"A year and a half later, nothing has changed," said Gelzer, noting there is currently $145,000 unexpended in the Beachfront South trust account.

"But funding or lack of funding is an irrelevant issue," said Gelzer. "The ADA law requires action now, and the federal government will provide advice and support to the city so that the disabled and elderly will be able to enjoy the beach starting this 2007 Memorial Day Weekend."

Gelzer said he was concerned about a lack of beach access from Pier Village south to Brighton Avenue. The area consists of boardwalk with steep staircases down to the beach.

Mayor Adam Schneiderhas said the city will improve the steep access staircase, which is an annual necessity, but noted a sweeping boardwalk rebuilding program is set to begin within the next 12 months.

The new boardwalk, partially paid for by K. Hovnanian, would extend from the Pier Village redevelopment area to Brighton Avenue in West End. The boardwalk design is now before the state Department of Environmental Protection where it awaits final approval.

Plans are to replace the boardwalk underpinning and install a 16- to 20-foot-wide walk with new comfort stations, restrooms, wheelchair ramps at Bath and Brighton avenues and aluminum railing. Benches bearing memorial plaques would be relocated.

Schneider has said that, in the meantime, to go ahead with Gelzer's request to fund, design and engineer a ramp, then submit it for approval to the DEP, would duplicate efforts already under way.

"We've already got boardwalk plans submitted, with two new handicapped accesses," Schneider said. "We're already in the process of building new handicapped access and getting it paid for. This has been in the works for the last several years. I'm sorry it has taken so long, but that is how long these things take."

Schneider said even if the Justice Department ruled in Gelzer's favor, the city still would not be able to design and engineer a new ramp, get it approved by the DEP, and installed by Memorial Day.

Gelzer has said all he is seeking is an inexpensive, simple aluminum ramp, which could be done immediately.

Schneider said the city has been working with handicapped advocates for years on the design of the new boardwalk.

"We're going to build it as soon as we can," Schneider said. "It is no longer a money issue. It is not even a location issue. Let's get it through CAFRA (the state's Coastal Area Facility Review Act), which is happening as we speak, and we'll build it.

"I don't think there is any way to get it done quicker," Schneider said. "I wish there were."

Dallas Jail Settles Mistreatment Lawsuit (AP)

By Matt Curry, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

County officials approved a nearly $1 million settlement Tuesday with the families of three mentally ill inmates who were denied medication while in the country's seventh-largest detention complex.

Just over half of the award went to James Mims, a Dallas County jail inmate whose psychiatric medications were withheld for two months in 2004, his attorney David Finn said. Mims also nearly died when water was shut off in his cell for two weeks.

"They could just not afford to have this case go before a jury," Finn said.

Commissioners approved the $950,000 agreement without discussion.

The federal civil rights lawsuit was filed in December 2004 on behalf of inmates Mims, Kennedy Nickerson and Clarence Lee Grant Jr., who died in custody.

Grant, who had paranoid schizophrenia, was found dead in his cell after not receiving medicine for five days in 2003, according to court records. An autopsy showed he died from complications of diabetes, pneumonia and other ailments.

Nickerson, who also has paranoid schizophrenia, was released from jail in 2003 without medication. A few days later he was found on the street dehydrated, suffering from fever and seizures, court records show.

DOJ_NMG_0134613

The U.S. Department of Justice told the county in December that the jail violates inmates' rights by failing to provide adequate medical and mental health care, and warned that a lawsuit could be filed if the problems weren't fixed.

State Inmate Transfer Ruled Illegal (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

SACRAMENTO -- A Superior Court judge ruled today that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger acted illegally by declaring an emergency in California's overcrowded prisons and transferring inmates to other states.

The ruling by Judge Gail Ohanesian says the governor violated the Emergency Services Act and the state constitution, and that contracts sending prisoners to lockups in Tennessee and Arizona are illegal.

The judge's order is stayed for 10 days, giving the state time to file an appeal.

Ohanesian's ruling is a major setback for Schwarzenegger as he grapples with an escalating crisis in the state's jam-packed prisons.

Corrections officials say they will be have no room for new inmates by this summer, raising the prospect that counties -- many of which face severe crowding in their jails -- will have nowhere to send convicted felons.

A federal judge, meanwhile, has said that he will move toward placing a cap on the inmate population -- now at 172,000 -- if the state does not relieve the crowding by June.

The transfer program, launched in November, was Schwarzenegger's effort to buy time while his $10.9-billion proposal to build 78,000 new jail and prison beds moves through the Legislature.

So far, the state has transferred 460 inmates -- all volunteers -- to private lockups in Arizona and Tennessee. Officials expanded the program last week to include mandatory moves.

The first inmates targeted for compulsory transfers are illegal immigrants likely to face deportation upon release. Those prisoners are now being screened, a spokesman said.

Schwarzenegger called the judge's ruling "a threat to public safety."

"The transfer of prisoners is imperative to relieve the pressure on our overburdened prison system," he said in a statement. The governor added that moving inmates "is a prudent alternative to the risk of court-ordered early release of felons."

The transfers were authorized as part of Schwarzenegger's Oct. 4 declaration of an emergency in 29 of the state's 33 prisons. In his decree, the governor said teeming cellblocks had created a health risk and "conditions of extreme peril" for officers, inmates and the public.

Two labor unions representing correctional officers and other prison employees sued to block the transfers, saying Schwarzenegger had improperly invoked the Emergency Services Act.

"We're a nation of laws, and this is an end-run around the Legislature," said Gregg Adam, a lawyer for the California Correctional Peace Officers Assn., after a court hearing last week.

Adam also argued that the state Constitution forbid the government from contracting out jobs normally performed by state employees. Ignoring such civil service protections, he said, would amount to "the first steps toward privatization" of the prison system, which employees about 58,000 guards and other workers.

In court, the lawyer for Schwarzenegger disputed those claims, saying the governor "absolutely" acted legally in applying the Emergency Services Act to the prison crisis.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Vickie Whitney also said the Legislature was given three opportunities to act on the crisis and failed to do so.

"The governor was left with a situation where staff, inmates and the public are in grave danger," so he had to declare an emergency and authorize the transfers, she said.

In her four-page ruling, Ohanesian rejected those arguments.

Chuck Alexander, vice president of the correctional officers' union, hailed the ruling.

"This was an illegal action, and we're glad the court agreed with us," he said. "We hope the administration will now be more inclined to sit down with parties and talk about the entire systemic problem, rather than taking this piecemeal approach."

DOJ_NMG_0134614

In addition to the lawsuits challenging the voluntary transfers, two inmates have filed papers seeking to block the state from moving forward with mandatory moves. A hearing in that case, in the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, is scheduled this week.

es | Boodle.com for Grocery Coupons

Racism: What Do We Tell The Kids? (USAT)

By Bruce Kluger

USA Today, February 21, 2007

Forty-five years ago this spring, my brothers and I (ages 5, 6, 7 and 9) went to a Saturday afternoon showing of Pinocchio at the Uptown Theater in suburban Baltimore. Our mom had errands to run, so she sent us with our babysitter, Elizabeth.

Outside the theater, we noticed that Elizabeth was engaged in a hushed conversation with the woman in the box office. Apparently, she was having trouble buying our tickets. "But I'm the babysitter," Elizabeth said coolly. "I have to stay with them."

After a bit more whispering, we were admitted to the theater and seated as a group in the glassed-in balcony. My brothers and I had never sat up high before, and we were delighted by it all. What we didn't know was that we had no choice. Elizabeth was black and not permitted in the lower seats.

When I tell my daughters (Audrey, 8, and Bridgette, 11) this story, they look at me wide-eyed, as if I'm concocting some wild fiction. To them, skin color has always been a non-issue, as inconsequential in their personal relationships as hair color, eye color or even the color of a blouse.

Audrey's first "boyfriend" in pre-school was a handsome little man named Mekahel, a black child with an infectious smile and boundless energy. The only time Audrey and Mekahel ever discussed color was over crayons.

Bridgette's godfather Guy, meanwhile, also is black, a trait she finds far less interesting than his computer wizardry or the fact that he was the first person she ever "danced" with — at a wedding, when she was just 4 weeks old.

To my daughters and their friends, the days of America's apartheid are sepia-tinted, blurry, a giant chapter of our national story that, once shouted from pulpits in Birmingham and Memphis, has now been compacted for easy listening. Sure, they're taught about Martin Luther King and Rosa Parks maybe once a year in school; and perhaps they'll casually glimpse some boring documentary their parents are watching in the den.

But kids of any generation tend to see the past as the past — and, besides, a new episode of American Idol is on tonight.

So as we celebrate Black History Month, I wonder: What kind of responsibility do we parents have in educating our children about the sad legacy of racism that has run through our nation's life like a persistent electrical current? Do we bequeath that shame to our kids out of a sense of obligation, charging them with the task of carrying the long, hard fight of our troubled heritage into a new era? Or do we quietly give thanks for their blissful naiveté — their lucky late-century birth — and hope that the deeper sense of fairness that is already evident in their new generation may take root in America's future? Do we leave well enough alone?

To be sure, our country is experiencing a transformation that would have been unimaginable half a century ago.

Our last two secretaries of State have been African-American (likewise, both 2007 Super Bowl head coaches); our most talked-about presidential candidate is black; people of color populate executive suites and statehouses across the country in increasing numbers. And the only conversation about race that seems to interest Major League Baseball anymore is the one about the pennant.

Yet just because America's more notorious racial injustices are thankfully behind us — the segregated lunch counters, the unconscionable lynchings, the ignominious Jim Crow laws — thick capillaries of discrimination continue to pulse beneath our national skin. These lingering vestiges of that old-time racism are, in many ways, just as insidious as those we thought we'd thrown off with the great civil rights acts of the '60s, if only because they are more cleverly cloaked from view.

Blacks continue to be shut out of polling places because of dubious technicalities. Families of color continue to carry a disproportionate share of our country's worst afflictions — from poverty and unemployment to teen pregnancy — at national rates that have consistently remained two to three times that of whites for the past 20 years. Minority youth continue to be isolated, not embraced, by our education system, despite the efforts of No Child Left Behind. And in November, another unarmed black man was killed in a hail of police bullets, just a subway ride from where my daughters go to school. It was a flashback to the bad old days.

DOJ_NMG_0134615

This, to me, is what Black History Month is really about — a time to step back and measure our growth as a nation against the work that remains to be done. Certainly, I appreciate honoring noteworthy figures who somehow never made it into my childhood classroom texts (black scientist Charles Henry Turner; 1867-1923; the first to prove that insects can hear). But our children also need to know that America's complicated relationship with race is an unfinished story, and it will one day be up to them to write its ending. That's why, as a parent, I'd rather spend this month — not to mention the 11 around it — making sure that my kids understand that black history is their history, too.

Just like their dad at that movie theater nearly 50 years ago, Bridgette and Audrey live in a country that still struggles to do the right thing. But unlike their father, they were born in a time of progress, a time of hope. We haven't yet reached Martin Luther King's mountaintop in America. But I have to believe that our children may one day take us there.

Bruce Kluger, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, is also a contributing editor for Parenting magazine and writes for National Public Radio.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Dept. Orders Sale Of Baltimore Steel Mill (WP)

By Anita Huslin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Decision to Divest Sparrows Point Was Condition of European Firms' $33 Billion Merger

The Justice Department yesterday ordered international steel conglomerate Arcelor Mittal to sell off the venerable Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore, to preserve competition in the eastern U.S. tin mill market.

The divestiture of the 116-year-old plant, which in its heyday was the world's largest steelmaker, is not expected to have an immediate impact on its workforce or operations, union officials said. The plant once employed 30,000 people at the mill and nearby shipyards, and produced millions of tons of steel for guns, airplanes and warships during World War II.

Justice Department officials ordered the divestiture of Sparrows Point as a condition of Mittal Steel Co.'s $33 billion acquisition of Arcelor SA. The department had originally called for the Dutch company to spin off a Canadian subsidiary that makes tin mill products. But after that deal proved impossible for legal reasons, the Justice Department said Mittal would have to sell one of its other mills -- Sparrows Point or its plant in Weirton, W.Va.

Yesterday, the department decided it should be Sparrows Point, which manufactures rolled steel sheets primarily used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products. Unlike Weirton, Sparrows Point produces the steel slabs used to manufacture tin mill products and would not have to develop new supply sources for the material if Mittal sold it, Justice Department officials said.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Mittal officials did not return calls for comment about the order.

Bill Barry, director of labor studies for the Community College of Baltimore County, said that the decision was not unexpected and that the community is hoping the new owner will invest in the plant for the future.

Bethlehem Steel owned Sparrows Point from the early 1900s until it declared bankruptcy and was bought in 2003 by International Steel Group, which merged it with LTV Steel to create the largest steel producer in the United States. In 2004, Indian billionaire Lakshmi N. Mittal bought ISG for about $4.5 billion, merging it with his Rotterdam-based Ispat International NV and LNM Holdings NV. The new company, based in the Netherlands, exceeded Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA as the world's largest steelmaker.

"The old Bethlehem Steel was reluctant to spend money for capital improvements, and this is one reason that there are 2,000 workers instead of 31,000 at The Point," Barry said in an e-mail. "The frantic development of the global steel industry requires equally consistent capital investments."

DOJ_NMG_0134616

David R. McCall, chairman of United Steelworkers' Mittal Steel committee, said the Justice Department's order will erode Mittal's market dominance.

"It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be, and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," McCall said in a statement. "We will ask for a review and will assure our members who are employed at Sparrows Point that we will make a dedicated and strong effort to reverse the decision."

The USW represents 2,106 production workers at Sparrows Point; about 275 salaried nonunion employees also work there. In the mid-1950s, Sparrows Point's furnaces poured hundreds of thousands of tons of hot metal a day and was Baltimore's primary employer.

The order highlights the continued volatility of an industry that in recent years has been marked by myriad mergers and acquisitions, as U.S. and European manufacturers consolidate to compete in a growing global steel market, particularly to meet demands in India and China.

Before Mittal bought Arcelor, Mittal and U.S. Steel sold nearly 75 percent of all tin mill products in the eastern United States. An Ontario subsidiary of Arcelor provided competition in that market. But that rivalry would have been eroded by the merger, according to the Justice Department.

Analysts said there is likely to be interest in Sparrows Point from several other steel conglomerates, such as Brazilian steelmaker CSN, which had previously explored buying Sparrows Point from Bethlehem Steel; or Russia's Severstal, which had bid for Arcelor and has been aggressively seeking steelmaking assets in North America.

Sparrows Point offers international companies a deep-water port for easy import of steel-making materials and access to land-based transportation, analysts said.

Feds Order Mittal To Sell Mill To Settle Antitrust Issues (AP)

By David Dishneau

AP, February 21, 2007

HAGERSTOWN, Md. - The U.S. Justice Department on Tuesday ordered global steel giant Mittal Steel Co. to sell its Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues raised by the Dutch company's recent merger with Arcelor SA.

The proposed consent decree would allow Chicago-based Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, used primarily for food and aerosol cans.

Sparrows Point, with about 2,400 workers and one of the largest blast furnaces in North America, faces the prospect of its fourth owner in as many years.

Chicago Heights, Ill.-based Esmark Inc. said it might consider a joint venture to buy Sparrows Point if the Weirton mill is unavailable, and industry experts said a number of German, Indian and Russian companies are shopping for North American steel mills.

"There are companies outside the U.S. that have said they want to make acquisitions in the U.S.," said analyst Charles Bradford of Soleil Securities Corp. in New York.

Mittal didn't immediately respond to telephone calls and e-mailed queries about the federal order. Mittal's shares fell 30 cents to close at $50.65 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 production workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal.

"The decision is unfortunate. It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee, said in a statement.

The Justice Department said in a statement that a sale of the profitable Sparrows Point plant, with its deep-water port access, diversified equipment and production capacity of 500,000 tons of tin-plated products annually, would "most reliably remedy the anticompetitive effects" of Mittal's merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division.

DOJ_NMG_0134617

Sparrows Point produces the raw steel slabs used in tin mill products, "and unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply" for that material, Barnett said.

Justice officials initially ordered Mittal to try to sell another mill, Dofasco Inc. of Canada. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany. That left either Sparrows Point or the former Weirton Steel Corp. in Weirton, W.Va., Mittal's two U.S. tin-plated steel mills.

Before the Arcelor Mittal merger, Mittal and another steelmaker accounted for more than 74 percent of all tin sales in the eastern United States. Without a divestiture, "the acquisition likely would have resulted in price increases of tin mill products to can manufacturers and other customers," the Justice Department said.

Mark Reutter, who chronicled Sparrows Point in the 1988 book "Making Steel" and continues to study the U.S. steel industry, said the decision means the government has heard manufacturers' complaints about too much steel consolidation.

"The sort of unspoken aspect here is that someone in Washington is signaling displeasure over the last two years and wants more competition in the industry," Reutter said. "I think that pressure has been growing from fabricators - car manufacturers to Whirlpool to the thousands of middle men who do various processing. There's a lot of unhappiness that there's been too much consolidation."

Sparrows Point was operated for years by Bethlehem Steel Corp., which went bankrupt and sold its assets to International Steel Group, backed by investor Wilbur Ross, in 2003. Ross sold the mill to Mittal in 2005.

Baltimore County Executive James T. Smith Jr., who had a meeting with Mittal planned for Tuesday afternoon, said a sale of Sparrows Point would be good news.

"I think it's helpful that the Justice Department points out that we are the only steelmaking plant with deep-water coast access in the Eastern United States and one of the most modern cold-rolled mills in the world," he said.

At the West Virginia mill, where Independent Steelworkers Union President Mark Glyptis had volunteered to have Weirton divested because the union believes the mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, the initial reaction was disappointment. But the 1,250-member union said there was nothing to prevent Mittal from selling Weirton.

"There's obviously keen interest in Weirton," said ISU spokesman Dave Gossett. "We're just not sure who will own it going forward."

Esmark President Craig Bouchard in Chicago Heights, Ill., said his company would prefer to buy Weirton but he wouldn't rule out the possibility of acquiring Sparrows Point.

"If we were to do Sparrows Point, it would probably be in a partnership because it doesn't exactly fit our strategy," he said. "But certain pieces of it could."

U.S. Orders Sale Of Sparrows Point (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 21, 2007

Antitrust decision puts Md. steel plant on market

For the third time in as many years, Sparrows Point is up for sale. And this time it's a rush job.

The Justice Department wants the sprawling Baltimore County steel plant to be under new ownership within 90 days to make sure that its current boss, Mittal Steel Co. NV, does not have too much control over the market for tin plate used to make cans for foods, aerosol sprays, paints and other products.

Netherlands-based Mittal, which is merging with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA in a $33 billion deal to create the world's largest steelmaker, had wanted to sell its Weirton W.Va., plant instead.

Selling Sparrows Point, an integrated manufacturer that can make steel from scratch, rather than the Weirton plant "most reliably" addresses antitrust concerns, Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said Tuesday in a statement announcing the order.

"Sparrows Point is a profitable and diversified facility" and "unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply for this critical input upon its separation from Mittal Steel," the Justice Department said.

Mittal cannot appeal the order but could be granted up to 60 more days to find a buyer, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. The Justice Department would have to sign off on any deal.

Officials at Mittal declined to comment Tuesday. Mittal has a previously planned conference call scheduled with analysts Wednesday. An official at the United Steelworkers union pledged to fight the ruling.

What a sale would mean for the future of Sparrows Point -- the second-largest private employer in Baltimore County with about 2,400 workers -- is unclear, but some have raised the possibility that a new owner might invest more in the complex. Mittal, a relentless cost-cutter, pits its plants against one another, shifting production to the most efficient.

David S. Iannucci, Baltimore County's economic development director, called the Justice Department decision "a vote of confidence in the long-term viability of Sparrows Point steel-making."

"It'll be the fourth owner of this property in about a five-year period, and inherently that's going to lead to some uncertainty. But at the end of the day," Iannucci said, "I think this is a very positive development for steel-making in Baltimore County."

Owned by the now-defunct Bethlehem Steel Corp. for 87 years, Sparrows Point was taken over by International Steel Group in 2003. ISG sold out to Mittal in 2005.

A United Steelworkers official, however, said the Justice Department's ruling is bad news.

"The decision is unfortunate," David R. McCall, head of the union's international Mittal Steel committee in Columbus, Ohio, said in a statement. "It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future. We will ask for a review and will assure our members who are employed at Sparrows Point that we will make a dedicated and strong effort to reverse the decision."

John Cirri, president of United Steelworkers Local 9477, which represents production and maintenance workers at Sparrows Point, said Tuesday that it would support the international committee's challenge.

Analysts expect a number of foreign steelmakers to show interest in the plant. Illinois-based Esmark Inc., which has a preliminary deal with Mittal to buy the Weirton facility if the Justice Department approves, said it is eager to buy the Baltimore County plant as well.

James P. Bouchard, Esmark's chairman and chief executive, said he told Mittal Tuesday that his company still wants the Weirton plant and would buy Sparrows Point if given the chance.

"We want to proceed," he said.

Tuesday's decision arose as the result of an antitrust suit the Justice Department filed in August to block the Mittal-Arcelor merger. A proposed consent degree required Mittal to sell a Canadian subsidiary owned by Arcelor, or, if that proved impossible, Weirton or Sparrows Point, with the Justice Department having final say. Mittal agreed to sell the subsidiary, Dofasco Inc., to German steelmaker ThyssenKrupp AG, but was unable to win approval from the Dutch trust that controlled it, paving the way for the Justice Department to choose between Sparrows Point and Weirton.

While an order to sell Sparrows Point was always a possibility, the decision appeared to have caught many off guard.

Esmark's Bouchard said he was in Weirton Tuesday meeting with union officials when they got word.

"I think it took the wind out of everybody," Bouchard said.

But he said he didn't dwell on it long. He told Mittal officials that Esmark, a steel distributor that recently won control of West Virginia's Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp., wants to continue negotiations over Weirton and make a bid for Sparrows Point.

The two plants are vastly different. Sparrows Point produces steel slabs and galvanized sheet for appliance manufacturers and the construction industry. It can produce nearly 4 million tons of raw steel a year and a half-million tons of tin mill products. Weirton is a niche manufacturer of tin plate for the food industry.

Despite its age, the 118-year-old Baltimore County steel complex has undergone many upgrades over the decades. Longtime owner Bethlehem Steel Corp. invested hundreds of millions of dollars before it filed for bankruptcy in 2001, building a new cold mill and relining the blast furnace, the largest and most efficient in North America.

Those investments, and a stable and growing market for tin plate, make Sparrows Point attractive, said steel analyst Charles Bradford of New York-based Bradford Research Inc. In addition, Sparrows Point is the only U.S. integrated steelmaker with direct ocean access, making it attractive to foreign companies.

"That makes it very feasible to bring in ore from other places," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134619

Russia's OAO Severstal, which failed to outbid Mittal for Arcelor, and Luxembourg-based Evraz Group SA, which recently purchased Oregon Steel Mills in Portland, could make a play for Sparrows Point, Bradford said. Several Chinese companies are interested in expanding in the United States, and they have cash. And CSN Brazil, which has expressed interest in Sparrows Point in the past, might be in the running after losing out on Wheeling-Pitt to Esmark. CSN has a plentiful supply of iron ore that it could ship to Baltimore, he said.

Officials from ThyssenKrupp toured Sparrows Point last May, but spokesman Klaus Pepperhoff said Tuesday that the company, which has announced plans to build a steel complex in the South at a cost of $2.9 billion, is not interested in buying it. He declined to comment further.

As for Esmark, Sparrows Point would make strategic sense, Bouchard said. Sparrows Point's new cold mill is particularly attractive to Esmark, which is one of the largest buyers of cold rolled product in the United States, he said. And Wheeling-Pitt consumes 1.3 million tons of steel slab a year, which Sparrows Point could supply.

He said his company has the financial backing to buy both Weirton and Sparrows Point, and plans to pursue both.

"We don't give up easily," Bouchard said.

Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents 1,250 workers at Weirton, said he was disappointed by the government's decision. Glyptis had hoped that Mittal would sell Weirton to a buyer who would restart the blast furnace it shut down shortly after buying it in 2005 and bring back the more than 800 workers let go last year.

"We wanted to be divested; Sparrows Point did not," he said.

allison.connolly@baltsun.com

Sun reporters Jamie Smith Hopkins, Stacey Hirsh and Hanah Cho contributed to this article.

US DoJ Orders Arcelor Mittal To Divest Big Steel Mill (AFP)

AFP, February 21, 2007

The US Justice Department said that it would require European steel giant Arcelor Mittal to divest a large US steel mill located near Baltimore, Maryland, to resolve concerns about its recent merger.

Mittal Steel acquired European steelmaker Arcelor last summer in a 32.5-billion-dollar deal. The deal forged a vast new global group, Areclor Mittal, which is headed by Indian businessman Lakshmi Mittal.

"The Department of Justice today announced that it will require Mittal Steel Company N.V. to divest its Sparrows Point facility located near Baltimore, Maryland, to remedy the competitive harm arising from Mittal's recent 33 billion acquisition of Arcelor S.A," the Justice Department said in a statement.

It said "the acquisition, as originally proposed, would have substantially lessened competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States."

The US government last August had approved Mittal's acquisition of Arcelor on the basis that Arcelor divested a Canadian company it owned called Dofasco Inc.

However, Arcelor was unable to divest the Canadian group due to ownership hurdles, and the Justice Department has now opted to require Arcelor to divest the Baltimore steel mill instead to satisfy US merger concerns.

The Sparrows Point plant in Baltimore is a profitable and diversified facility, according to the Justice Department, which said it has the annual capacity to produce over 500,000 tons of tin mill products.

The plant makes steel slabs used in the manufacture of tin mill products.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Thomas Barnett, a senior Justice official who runs the department's antitrust division.

Mittal Mill Expected To Draw Interest (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Mittal Steel Co., ordered by the Justice Department to sell a plant in Maryland, is expected to draw bids from major companies in China, Russia and India as the number of plants for sale is dwindling.

DOJ_NMG_0134620

The Sparrows Point plant, near Baltimore, is more accessible than inland operations for imports of raw materials and exports of steel. It can produce about 3.9 billion tons of steel a year, including 500,000 tons of tin plate used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products, and it could fetch upwards of $1 billion.

Sparrows Point "has not been consistently profitable," says New York-based steel analyst Chuck Bradford of Bradford Research/Soleil. "But at least it is on the water, so it can bring in raw materials at a reasonable price."

The Justice Department yesterday ordered Mittal Steel to sell Sparrows Point to settle antitrust issues raised by its recent merger with Arcelor SA.

Bidders could include JSW Steel Ltd. or Ispat Industries Ltd., both based in India, or Russia's Evraz Group or OAO Severstal Group, both of which already own U.S. operations. China's Wuhan Steel Corp. and Anshan Iron & Steel Group Corp. also have a good deal of cash and are considering expanding.

Other potential bidders are Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG, which was unsuccessful in buying Canada's Dofasco Inc., and Brazil's Cia. Siderurgica Nacional, which failed in its attempt to buy Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp.

Lakshmi Mittal, chief executive of the Netherlands' Mittal Steel, acquired Sparrows Point when he bought International Steel Group in 2004. His purchase of Arcelor, of Luxembourg, which has holdings in Canada, raised antitrust concerns and led to the Justice Department decision on which of the U.S. plants needed to be sold, Sparrows Point or Weirton, W.Va. Mitch Hecht, who runs a New York-based private hedge fund called Hampshire Steel Investments, had been interested in Weirton. He said he would still be interested in buying it and possibly bidding on Sparrows Point if the United Steelworkers union wanted him to take a look. "I'm a big believer that U.S. steel assets should be owned by American-based operators, whose priorities are to make a strong, sustainable and efficient facility" in the U.S., he said.

Mittal had agreed to sell Weirton to Esmark Inc., a closely held distributor in Chicago Heights, Ill., if the Justice Department decided that mill should be sold.

Write to Paul Glader at paul.glader@wsj.com1

Weirton Mill's Fate Unclear (WHEELINT)

By Shelley Hanson

Wheeling Intelligencer, February 21, 2007

WEIRTON — Mark Glyptis is keeping a positive attitude despite a big letdown Tuesday for his Independent Steelworkers.

The Department of Justice ruled Mittal must sell its Sparrows Point facility in Maryland instead of its Weirton tin mill. To settle antitrust issues, Mittal was being forced, by the Justice Department, to sell one of the two assets because of its merger with Arcelor SA.

Glyptis, president of the union which represents workers at Mittal's Weirton facility, said his union members are disappointed the Justice Department did not choose Weirton to be sold, as the tin mill has not benefited from being owned by Mittal Steel.

"We're disappointed by the decision ... but we're not totally surprised," Glyptis said.

However, Mittal may still decide to sell Weirton, he noted.

"We need to meet with senior officials with Mittal Steel to determine what that means to us and to Weirton," Glyptis said of Mittal selling Sparrows Point.

Chicago-based Esmark Steel already has a nonbinding agreement with Mittal to purchase Weirton. However, before any deal is finalized, Esmark must have the ISU's blessing to purchase the Weirton mill. A former International Steel Group executive, Mitchell Hecht, also wants to purchase Weirton.

Glyptis declined to comment about whom the ISU favors to purchase Weirton.

Meanwhile, according to the Associated Press, Esmark said it may consider a joint venture to buy Sparrow's Point if the Weirton Mill is unavailable.

Esmark President Craig Bouchard said his company would prefer to buy Weirton, but he wouldn't rule out the possibility of acquiring Sparrows Point.

DOJ_NMG_0134621

"If we were to do Sparrows Point, it would probably be in a partnership because it doesn't exactly fit our strategy," he said. "But certain pieces of it could."

He has said the purchase of Mittal's Weirton plant would fit the company's strategy of "building the Ohio Valley."

Bouchard also is president of the Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. If Esmark could successfully purchase both Weirton and Wheeling-Pitt, it could possibly control 25 percent of the domestic tin-plate market.

"We were disappointed to hear the news. After making excellent progress with each of Mittal, the United Steel Workers and the ISU, we were hoping to close the Weirton acquisition over the next 60 days. We felt this was the best solution for all parties involved, including the DOJ," said Bouchard. "We still hope to close the Weirton transaction. Mittal must now decide whether they want to sell both companies. We have a great respect for Mittal, and they are an important supplier and partner of Esmark. Whichever strategic path they follow, we will support their decision."

After years of deep financial losses, Weirton Steel filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in May 2003 and was sold twice in 18 months, first to International Steel Group, then to Mittal. Almost immediately, Mittal shut down the blast furnace, stopping the production of raw steel and cutting more than 800 jobs.

Last month, Mittal announced it had a memorandum of understanding to sell Weirton to Esmark, pending approval of federal regulators and the union.

Bouchard said it's too soon to know whether that deal is still valid.

"It's in Mittal's court," he noted. "We've told them we'd still like to close on the Weirton transaction ... but whatever their strategy is in North America, this will change it a bit."

Esmark executives met with the ISU again Tuesday, discussing the particulars of a deal with Glyptis and other elected leaders.

"We've found them to be smart guys, very conscious of doing something good for the company and the town," Bouchard said.

Under Esmark, Weirton wouldn't return to producing raw steel, so there would be little hope of restoring the jobs that were cut when the blast furnace was shut down. Instead, Esmark would run and expand the finishing operations, adding capacity to coat and galvanize steel.

Esmark has already seized control of nearby Wheeling-Pitt, and Esmark Chief Executive Officer James Bouchard sees the two companies as a logical fit. While Wheeling-Pitt's best assets are its electric arc furnace, reheat furnaces and strip mill, he calls Weirton's cold mill, tin mill and other finishing operations "outstanding."

Fate Of Weirton Mittal Steel Plant In Limbo (PTR)

By C.M. Mortimer, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 21, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice on Tuesday said Mittal Steel must sell its Sparrows Point tin mill plant near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues over its pending merger with Arcelor SA.

The decision clouds the fate of the former Weirton Steel Corp., owned by Mittal, the world's biggest steel company. Steelworkers at the Weirton, W.Va., plant in November said they would rather be sold to another company than remain part of Arcelor-Mittal.

"We are obviously disappointed. But we will remain part of the Arcelor Mittal Steel Corp. and will remain focused on the business of steel," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents 1,250 members at Weirton.

Glyptis said he will meet with senior Mittal Steel exectives soon, and said he would try to ascertain their plans for Weirton. "I don't know what their plans are," he said. "They can still divest Weirton."

Mittal Steel officials could not be reached for comment.

Glyptis said he volunteered to have Weirton sold because the mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's stewardship. "We wanted to be sold because we feel our assets could be utilized at a higher rate," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134622

The Justice Department said the divestiture of Sparrows Point would remedy the anticompetitive effects of combining Luxembourg-based Arcelor and Mittal, headquartered in the Netherlands.

The Justice Department said Sparrows Point has the capacity to produce more than 500,000 tons of tin product annually.

Sparrows Point produces the steel slabs used in the manufacture of tin mill products, and, unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply upon its separation from Mittal Steel, the Justice Department said.

The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal.

"The decision is unfortunate. It makes Mittal not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee, said in a statement.

Last month, Esmark Inc., a Chicago-based steel services company, signed a letter-of-intent with Arcelor Mittal to buy parts of Weirton Steel, particularly its finishing facilities. Esmark already is moving forward with separate plans to merge with Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel.

James P. Bouchard, CEO of Esmark, said he was "disappointed" in the Justice Department's decision, but said he's going forward with plans to buy part of Weirton as well as the Sparrows Point mill.

"Our first pick is Weirton, but we would buy them both. We feel Weirton is a superior tin facility, and our offer stays on the table for Weirton," Bouchard said.

Glyptis said he has met with Esmark leadership, and continues to talk to Mitchell Hecht, a former International Steel Group executive, who wants to restart at least one blast furnace at Weirton Steel and rehire several hundred workers to produce pig iron and other products.

Hecht also said he was "disappointed" in the government's ruling.

"We continue to have interest in restarting Weirton's blast furnace, which can be done cost-efficiently," said Hecht, who operates Hampshire Steel Investments, a private, New York-based hedge fund that focuses on trading in steel properties.

Mittal wanted to sell Canada's Dofasco Inc. as part of its merger with Arcelor, but an independent Dutch trust controlling Dofasco has refused to allow its sale.

Mittal was forced to sell either Dofasco or one of its two tin mills in Weirton or Sparrows Point after the Justice Department said in May that the Arcelor-Mittal merger would hurt competition in tin-mill products in the eastern United States.

C.M. Mortimer can be reached at cmortimer@tribweb.com or (724) 836-5252.

Justice Department Ruling Sparing Weirton Disappoints Union (PPG)

By Len Boselovic, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 21, 2007

In a decision that disappointed the union representing 1,250 Weirton Steel workers, the government yesterday ordered Arcelor Mittal to sell a mill near Baltimore -- and not the West Virginia steel plant.

Union officials at Weirton had been hoping that the U.S. Department of Justice would force the sale of their plant, which has attracted interest from two bidders, including Esmark, the steel processor and distributor pursuing a merger with nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp.

Despite the decision, which seeks to alleviate antitrust concerns raised by the merger of Arcelor and Mittal, the world's two largest steel producers, Esmark Chairman and Chief Executive Officer James P. Bouchard said he remains interested in purchasing some of Weirton's operations as well as the Sparrows Point, Md., plant that Arcelor Mittal was ordered to sell.

Mr. Bouchard was meeting at Weirton with representatives of that plant's Independent Steelworkers Union and the United Steelworkers union, which represents Wheeling-Pitt workers, when they learned of the decision.

The talks were aimed at getting the ISU to merge with the USW as part of Esmark's proposed acquisition of Weirton, Mr. Bouchard said. The Justice Department order " kind of sucked the wind out of everybody at the table," he said.

Mittal's acquisition of No. 2 Arcelor has raised concerns about a tightly controlled market for tin-coated sheet steel used in food cans and other contains. Even before the merger, Mittal and another steelmaker accounted for more than 74 percent of tin mill product sales in the eastern United States, Justice Department officials said. The other producer is U.S. Steel.

Sparrows Point, formerly operated by Bethlehem Steel, can produce more than 500,000 tons of tin product annually.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, head of the department's Antitrust Division.

ISU President Mark Glyptis declined to comment on discussions with the USW and Esmark. While he is disappointed with the Justice Department ruling, he said it could generate more work for Weirton.

Mitch Hecht of Hampshire Steel Investments, the other investor interested in Weirton, declined comment until he met with ISU officials, who had preferred his bid to Esmark's.

Possible buyers for Sparrows Point include foreign steelmakers seeking to establish a foothold in the North American market. Overseas buyers in recent years include Mittal, which in 2005 acquired International Steel Group, the owner of Bethlehem, Weirton and other formerly bankrupt mills.

Russian producer OAO Severstal acquired Rouge Steel of Dearborn, Mich., in 2004 and is Wheeling-Pitt's partner in a Follansbee, W.Va., coke plant. Last month, Russia's Evraz Group acquired Oregon Steel Mills for $2.3 billion.

(Len Boselovic can be reached at lboselovic@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1941.)

Feds Add Twist To Chicago Steel Firm's Plans (CHIT)

By James P. Miller, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

A ruling Justice Department antitrust authorities disclosed today promises to complicate Chicago-based Esmark Inc.'s expansion effort.

The fast-growing steel-distribution company has been expanding into steel production and it is currently in the process of acquiring a West Virginia steel maker known as Wheeling-Pitttsburgh Corp., through a "reverse merger" that will turn closely held Esmark into a publicly traded company.

In addition to Wheeling-Pitt, Esmark has been making overtures to acquire Weirton Steel, based in Weirton, West Virginia.

Weirton has been thought to be potentially available because of Justice Department concerns linked to the pending mega-merger between the world's two biggest steel makers, Arcelor S.A. of Belgium and Netherlands-based Mittal Steel.

In August, the Justice Department -- which routinely reviews corporate mergers to see if they would damage marketplace competition -- agreed that it sign off on the Arcelor-Mittal combination if Mittal agreed to divest a steel mill that supplied certain products to the eastern U.S.

Under that so-called "consent decree," the Justice Department had the right to select for divestiture either Mittal's Weirton mill or Mittal's Sparrow's Point plant near Baltimore.

Most observers had figured that Weirton would be the plant to be jettisoned; that's why Esmark had been publicly expressing interest and holding talks with the plant's union management.

Today, however, the department's antitrust division unexpectedly said Mittal must shed the Sparrow's Point, Md. operation.

Esmark spokesman Bill Keegan said the company founded by brothers Craig and James Bouchard, "remains interested in acquiring Weirton, if Mittal is so inclined."

Jpmiller@tribune.com

Sirius-XM's Fate Hinges On Definitions (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

If Satellite Radio Is Part Of a Broader Market, Deal May Pass Muster

WASHINGTON -- Federal approval of the proposed $11.4 billion merger of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. will hinge on how regulators define the companies' market.

If Justice Department antitrust enforcers find a distinct market for satellite radio, the deal could be dead, because it would create a monopoly. But if the market instead includes the traditional radio industry, iPods and Internet radio, as the companies argue, the deal could win approval, though not without conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0134624

In a preview of the battle that will play out in Washington in months to come, consumer advocates and some lawmakers said yesterday that the deal will stifle competition and should be stopped. Sirius and XM countered that they need the deal to compete with other forms of audio entertainment. They say they face stiff competition from AM and FM radio, with 280 million listeners, as well as the hot new digital-music market, with more than 100 million iPods already sold. They even cite rising competition from music-enabled mobile phones and Internet radio.

History doesn't offer much encouragement for this argument. A similar merger between two satellite-television companies -- Hughes Electronics Corp. and EchoStar Communications Corp. -- was shot down in 2002. At the time, the TV companies argued that the $18 billion deal was needed to combine efforts to fight off strong competition from cable companies. But the Federal Communications Commission rejected the deal even before the Justice Department could act, saying it raised the risk of "immediate and substantial" harm to consumers through higher prices and less competition, particularly in rural areas that aren't served by cable companies.

In contrast, XM and Sirius are arguing, satellite radio competes with all forms of audio entertainment. In meetings with the regulators and on Capitol Hill, the companies will press this sweeping market definition. The broader the market, the more likely a deal will be approved: When Coca-Cola Co. sought to buy Dr Pepper in the mid-1980s, its experts argued in court that their market should include not just soft drinks but all potable liquids sold in North America, including water. The approach was dubbed the "Lake Erie defense." (The deal was opposed by regulators and eventually scotched.)

Sirius and XM are getting support for their view of the market from an unlikely source. The radio industry has loudly opposed the deal since it was announced, and broadcasters cite satellite-radio operators as major competitors in securities filings. That's confirmation that these market segments compete, the companies say. Sirius and XM also insist they couldn't increase rates substantially and still keep growing -- citing as one example the low retention rate of drivers who end up paying for a subscription to the service when their cars come equipped with satellite radio.

"The issue here is taking two competitive companies and making them into one. Historically, the government has looked skeptically at endorsing a monopoly," said Dennis Wharton, a spokesman for the National Association of Broadcasters.

Sirius and XM are also counting on the more relaxed merger-review standards that have emerged in the Bush administration. Regulators have challenged few deals and blessed such once-unthinkable deals as a reuniting of AT&T with its former Bell offspring, and the merger of Whirlpool Corp. and Maytag. In the wake of those deals, an anything-goes view is emerging among some practitioners in the antitrust bar.

Even without an easing of merger-review standards, enforcers have long been reluctant to meddle in emerging markets, where technology and competition are still developing -- and where the real economic rivalry could be another technology in another market.

The companies hope to close the deal by year's end, but even that could be optimistic. Justice Department investigators, led by antitrust chief Thomas Barnett, will work under a formal timetable to review the deal, but that framework is often cast aside in big or controversial deals. The government is likely to ask for more information -- cartons of data and scores of interviews -- then strike a deal with the companies to push off any closing while it conducts its review.

Across town, the FCC -- a fractious, five-member commission -- could easily take more than six months to complete its review. Its chairman, Kevin Martin, has already said the deal faces a "high bar" to overcome in order to be found in the public interest, the standard under FCC rules. The agency also could seek the eventual return of some of the FCC-awarded radio spectrum held by the companies, which would require extensive negotiations and may be a possible deal killer.

XM and Sirius will also need to address what might be called the Howard Stern problem: The foul-mouthed radio host is among several edgy radio personalities that decamped to satellite radio, where regulators have no jurisdiction to enforce federal indecency rules. The FCC can only enforce indecency rules on free over-the-air broadcasts.

Requiring XM-Sirius to voluntarily abide by federal indecency standards could be one condition that is placed on the deal. The companies appear to be trying to address that issue by allowing consumers great flexibility in programming. That might include allowing consumers to purchase a tier of service that didn't include Mr. Stern and other radio personalities whose shows might be considered inappropriate for children.

DOJ_NMG_0134625

"Anytime you go from two competitors in a market to one, a big red flag goes up," says Gene Kimmelman, vice president for federal affairs at Consumers Union, which plans to lobby for consumer protections to be included in the deal, including channel set-asides for noncommercial stations and pricing flexibility for consumers.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com13

XM-Sirius Merger Hinges On FCC Ownership Rule (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Climate Still Competitive, Satellite Radio Firms Say

Winning approval for a proposed merger of the nation's two satellite-radio companies turns on whether regulators buy their argument that iPods, Internet radio and other new technologies have expanded so dramatically that a monopoly would not harm consumers' choices or purses.

It may be a difficult argument to win, but XM Satellite Holdings and Sirius Satellite Radio's officers say it's worth the gamble and have assembled an expensive and experienced team of lobbyists to aid them in the fight. Alone, the companies have suffered heavy losses and spent heavily on recruiting personalities such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey and on marketing to compete against each other.

Now, New York-based Sirius and XM of the District are lining up some of the best-known and highest-paid lawyers and lobbyists, while competitors and consumer groups vow to fight back. The biggest potential roadblock for the merger is a 1997 Federal Communications Commission declaration that a single owner may not control the subscriber-only satellite radio business.

But the advance of technologies such as iPods and other MP3 players, music-playing cellphones and land-based radio stations with digital broadcasts offer so much music, news and talk that the competitive climate is radically different and the FCC should waive the 1997 rule, Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin said in a conference call yesterday. "Consumers today have a significantly broader range of audio entertainment options from which to choose," he said.

All those new devices, however, are not directly analogous to satellite radio, and Karmazin's plea is a tough sell, said Chad Bartley, an analyst for Pacific Crest Securities. XM and Sirius provide "the only paid-radio service out there," he said, and regulators may be loath to turn them into a monopoly. He rated the chances for merger approval at "less than 50-50."

"The regulatory process will be quite onerous," said William Kidd, an analyst for Wedbush Morgan, an investment firm in Los Angeles. Regulators will be reluctant to create a single satellite-radio company, particularly because they have recruited a total of 14 million paying customers in five years as separate companies, he said.

The challenges do not end there. XM and Sirius said they hope the deal will close by the end of the year, but some analysts say the costly lobbying battle might stretch into next year. Meanwhile, the two companies must continue to deliver multiple channels of music, talk and sports to their customers, and right the business models that have never generated a sustained profit nor impressed investors in recent years.

The companies assured customers by e-mail yesterday that services will not change during the merger proceedings.

Karmazin said a merger would lead to savings by eliminating duplications in programming and operations. But it would impose new costs as well. Karmazin said the companies plan to design equipment to let customers receive signals from both companies, which use different satellite technologies. They also hope to sell more advertising, he said, even though the promise of largely commercial-free broadcasts has traditionally been a key appeal of satellite radio.

The National Association of Broadcasters and groups such as the Consumer Federation of America and Common Cause plan to oppose the merger. They want to make sure that consumers are not stuck with outdated equipment and contracts that are not honored. The groups also will probably seek to have the merged entity provide nonprofit, public channels.

"We will take the position that this merger is suspect," said Mark N. Cooper, research director of the Consumer Federation of America. "We will insist that if the government determines to let the merger go forward, it needs to condition it." Several analysts agreed that accepting conditions -- such as limits on increasing the cost of subscriptions, now $12.95 a month for both companies -- might be XM's and Sirius's best hope for approval from the FCC and the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0134626

Both companies have a potent roster of contract-lobbying companies at their disposal. XM has worked with the Palmetto Group, Patton Boggs, Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates and Monument Policy Group. Sirius has Wiley Rein, the Paul Laxalt Group and Ricchetti Inc., according to lobbying disclosure records.

XM shares rose $1.43, to $15.41 yesterday. Sirius shares rose 22 cents, to $3.92.

Sirius And XM Woo Regulators (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio yesterday portrayed themselves as two small players in an expanding and highly competitive consumer audio market as they sought to win over regulators for their planned merger.

In a conference call with investors, executives from the companies argued that technology had created an array of new competitors for their services beyond traditional free radio, including portable music devices, mobile phones capable of playing music, internet radio services, personal computers and others.

"Competition in this market is robust, and we're seeing new entrants on a regular basis as disruptive technologies continue to emerge," said Gary Parsons, chairman of XM, adding that satellite radio was still "a small player by comparison".

Antitrust concerns have shaped up as the biggest hurdle to an $11.4bn deal, not including debt, that would unite the two companies. When they were awarded broadcast licences a decade ago, the Federal Communications Commission mandated that neither company could own both satellite licences.

Following the deal's announcement on Monday, Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, reminded the companies that the hurdle for approval would be "high" given that provision. Sirius shares rose 5 per cent and XM's 10 per cent.

Mel Karmazin, the Sirius chief executive, pledged to investors that the companies had studied the regulatory issue, and predicted that the deal would close before the end of the year. Mr Karmazin said: "We believe there is a solid basis for approval, and are committed to working with the regulatory agencies to ensure approval."

David Bank, who covers the companies at RBC Capital Markets, said he still believed that the chances were better than even that the deal would be approved, but saw shortcomings in the companies' presentation.

Lawyers reviewing the case said it was difficult to find a precedent because of the strict mandate contained in the companies licences as well as the rapid technological change in the media industry since those documents were drawn up.

"Frankly, it's hard to handicap because there are so many different ways to look at it," said Leo Asaro, a partner in the antitrust practice at Bryan Cave.

Tough Antitrust Hurdles Seen For XM, Sirius Deal (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder & David B. Wilkerson, Marketwatch

Market Watch, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- A month ago, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said a tie-up between satellite radio companies XM and Sirius wouldn't get past his agency. On Monday, the chiefs of those companies decided to challenge that vow.

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. said Monday they were taking their proposed marriage to stockholders and regulators to get an OK for a combination worth $13 billion and the ears of 14 million paid subscribers. See full story.

It's a bold challenge: On Jan. 17, FCC chief Kevin Martin had said agency rules would prohibit "one entity owning both of those [satellite] licenses." See archived story.

After the merger was announced, Martin issued a strongly worded statement reiterating his concerns.

"The hurdle here ... would be high as the commission originally prohibited one company from holding the only two satellite radio licenses," he said. "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

DOJ_NMG_0134627

The Sirius-XM combination would follow directly on the heels of the hotly debated merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth. The five-member commission of the FCC wrangled for nine months over whether to approve that deal, suggesting a similar combination of two big firms would have to endure the same withering scrutiny.

In AT&T's case, though, the company had the support of Martin, a Republican close to the White House. Sirius and XM not only face skepticism from the FCC chairman but probably from the panel's two Democrats, each of whom has been critical of media consolidation. The Democratic takeover of Congress probably doesn't help the cause of the satellite merger partners.

Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin - who would also be CEO of the combined company - and XM Chairman Gary Parsons aim to persuade Washington that a merger is the best way to position satellite radio for battle with such technologies as podcasting.

Parsons and XM's CEO, Hugh Panero, said the new company "will be better positioned to compete effectively with the continually expanding array of entertainment alternatives that consumers have embraced since the Federal Communications Commission first granted our satellite radio licenses a decade ago."

If the companies pass FCC and Justice Department muster, they're expecting the deal to be completed by the end of this year.

Opposition emerged quickly from the companies' broadcasting rivals.

The National Association of Broadcasters slammed the proposal in a statement late Monday, saying it would be "shocked" if it went through.

"When the FCC authorized satellite radio, it specifically found that the public would be served best by two competitive nationwide systems," said NAB Executive Vice President Dennis Wharton, according to a statement from the trade group. "We're hopeful that this anti-consumer proposal will be rejected," Wharton said.

Meanwhile, at least one analyst appears to see hope for a deal.

Last week, Bear Stearns' Robert Peck told clients that both companies thought a merger could receive approval from regulators.

"We believe any public progress of making a deal has been slowed by the economics of the exact split in a [merged company]," Peck wrote in a research note. To overcome this apparent hurdle, Peck said investors were likely to push the companies to "avoid quibbling over a few share points, to capture the much larger value of overall potential synergies."

FAQ: Serious Challenges For Sirius-XM Merger (CNET)

By Elinor Mills, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 21, 2007

Regulatory hurdles are huge for deal some worry could lead to a satellite radio monopoly. But the biggest impact would be on customers.

Executives at Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio seem to think they have a better chance at turning a profit as one giant company than as bare-knuckled competitors.

The companies, struggling to reach profitability, announced Monday that they agreed to an all-stock "merger of equals," with shareholders of each company owning 50 percent of the combined company. XM shareholders would receive 4.6 shares of Sirius for each of their XM shares, setting the value of XM at about $5 billion. Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons would both retain their titles, but for the combined company.

But getting federal regulators to sign off on the merger won't be easy, and perhaps in an effort to make walking away from the deal easier, the companies have not said what the name of the combined entity would be or where it would be located. The companies expect the transaction to be completed by the end of this year. There are plenty of questions about how this will play out in the coming months:

Why do Sirius and XM want to merge?

Both companies have been losing money, with combined losses in 2005 of $1.5 billion. While they have yet to turn a profit, the companies have been engaged in a talent acquisition war to attract listeners. Sirius signed a five-year contract worth $500 million, plus bonuses, to broadcast a morning show with popular shock-jock radio personality Howard Stern in 2004. Not long after, XM signed an 11-year, $650 million contract to broadcast Major League Baseball. The company also has a three-year, $55 million deal with television talk show host Oprah Winfrey. By combining efforts, the companies hope to stem their losses and help the market grow.

DOJ_NMG_0134628

How would a merger affect consumers?

It's too early to predict how the merger would affect prices for the service. Each company now charges just under $13 per month for its satellite radio service. Sirius and XM said that with the merger they could offer more programming and greater choice to consumers, including the ability to pick and choose channels and content on an "a la carte" basis. Some channels would likely be cut to reduce overlap. The companies also said they would "improve on products, such as real-time traffic and rear-seat video, and introduce new ones, such as advanced data services including enhanced traffic, weather and infotainment offerings."

Will their hardware work together?

Radio devices from Sirius and XM currently on the market do not receive signals from each other's services, so a combined company would have to develop a new radio, and consumers would have to upgrade. At first glance, it doesn't seem that existing hardware can be modified to receive a new signal.

XM radio spokesman Nathaniel Brown said it's too early in the process to provide engineering details, but "XM will fully support its current subscribers, who will not need to purchase new radios and will continue to receive the XM signal. We will work toward a radio that receives both signals."

Sirius CEO Karmazin said in a conference call on Tuesday that the combined company would "be able to speed the introduction of radios offering content from both our services today, something that has been commercially challenging as separate companies. Our radios will be smaller, lighter, simpler, and cooler than what each company has today."

In a joint statement announcing the deal on Monday, the companies said that the merger would allow them to develop and introduce "a wider range of lower-cost, easy-to-use and multifunctional devices through efficiencies in chipset and radio design and procurement." The companies also plan to work together on improving the scope and quality of the combined service. "Over time, we will work to combine our satellite and terrestrial transmission infrastructure to deliver the broadest range of content and the highest level of service quality," Karmazin said.

What regulatory hurdles does the deal face?

The U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission must grant approval, posing a significant challenge. Because Sirius and XM are the only two satellite radio providers operating in the country, their merger would effectively create a monopoly. Federal legislation bars both satellite radio licenses from being owned by the same company to guard against high prices and other negative effects on consumers. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement that the hurdle for approval would be high. "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," Martin said. Given historic opposition to media consolidation by Democrats, who control Congress, the companies will have some hard lobbying to do.

The National Association of Broadcasters is asking regulators to bar the merger, noting that regulators rejected a similar merger proposal from the country's only two satellite television companies, DirecTV and DISH Network. Two years ago, the NAB opposed XM's proposed $198 million acquisition of WCS Wireless before the deal fell through.

How will the companies defend their merger?

The defense will likely hinge on the definition of "competition in the digital audio marketplace." In announcing their merger plans, Sirius and XM said they faced competition from free "over-the-air" AM and FM radio, as well as from iPods and mobile-phone streaming, HD radio, Internet radio and next-generation wireless technologies. Complicating the defense could be the lawsuit record labels have filed against XM alleging that devices that allow people to capture music from XM's broadcasts and turn them into MP3 files for storing and replaying, like the Pioneer Inno, infringe on copyright.

How big would the combined company be?

The combined value of the company would be about $13 billion, which includes net debt of about $1.6 billion. Combined 2006 revenue was about $1.5 billion based on analyst consensus estimates. There would be about 14 million subscribers of a combined company.

DOJ_NMG_0134629

What are each company's strengths?

New York City-based Sirius saw its subscriber base rise by more than 80 percent over the last year to about 6 million. The company has more than 130 channels, with 69 commercial-free music channels and 65 channels of sports, news, talk, entertainment, traffic, weather and other data. The company is the official satellite radio partner of the NFL, Nascar, NBA and NHL. Sirius also offers an Internet radio service that broadcasts more than 75 channels online. Sirius radios are sold in more than 25,000 retail locations, for use in cars, homes, RVs and boats. The company has a market capitalization of about $5.5 billion.

Washington, D.C.-based XM has about 7.6 million subscribers and more than 170 channels and broadcasts live from studios in Toronto, Montreal, Washington, D.C., New York, Chicago and the Country Music Hall of Fame in Nashville. XM also has signed deals with automakers to have its radios preinstalled in 140 different vehicle models this year. The company's market capitalization is about $4.2 billion.

Will Howard Stern get richer?

It's too early to say whether the companies' contracts with celebrities will be renewed. But with only one satellite radio provider operating, future deals would likely be less lucrative for such personalities.

FCC Hurdles Loom For XM, Sirius Merger (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

When the Federal Communications Commission auctioned off two exclusive licenses to create the satellite radio industry 10 years ago, it did not mince words on whether the competing providers could merge.

The agency said that one licensee will "not be permitted to acquire control" of the other. The clause was inserted to ensure "sufficient continuing competition" in the new business, it said.

But when dealing with the FCC, one should never say never.

"The FCC can undo anything it does," said Andrew Schwartzman, president and CEO of the Media Access Project, a public interest law firm in Washington. "However, when you change course, you need a good reason to do it."

On Monday, Washington D.C.-based XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and New York City-based Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. announced a deal valued at $4.84 billion at the close of trading on Wall Street Tuesday.

The companies will have to gain approval from the Justice Department as well as the FCC. Justice typically goes first in satellite mergers. If it blocks the deal, it's game over. But Schwartzman said that is unlikely to happen.

"My guess is this Justice Department will be willing to accept any plausible argument that is presented to it," he said. "The FCC is a much tougher case."

The Justice Department looks at how mergers affect competition. The companies will argue that since the industry was created in 1997, times have changed, and so has the market. It's no longer radio, it's "audio entertainment," which includes terrestrial radio, digital "high-definition" radio that offers better sound and more stations, Internet stations and even Apple iPods.

The FCC's review is different. The airwaves are owned by the public. Therefore the law requires that any transfers of control of licenses be done only if it serves the "public interest, convenience and necessity."

The exact meaning of those words has been debated since they first appeared in the Radio Act of 1927 and later in the Communications Act of 1934.

The companies' argument to the FCC, previewed Monday, will be that a combined satellite provider will offer a wider range of programming choices for listeners.

As for the ban on combining two licensees, if the companies can convince the Justice Department that there is competition from the nonsatellite radio market, it will help their case with the FCC.

"If they do that, I don't see how it's a problem for the FCC to say, 'We no longer need this rule,'" said Blair Levin, a telecommunications analyst with Stifel Nicolaus and the agency's former chief of staff under former FCC Chairman Reed Hundt.

The FCC also considers financial viability when deciding on license transfers. For two companies to be prevented from combining and then go out of business, for example, would not be deemed in the public interest.

DOJ_NMG_0134630

Sirius and XM are not using that reasoning for the merger, but to date, they have built up considerable debt, have yet to turn a profit and watched their stocks decline more than 40 percent last year.

Levin doubts the companies would use that argument because they are not in danger of failing.

Public-interest groups so far are skeptical, says Schwartzman, but they have not come out against the merger. They will argue in favor of some safeguards on diversity and competition.

How these would work is yet to be determined, but it may include a requirement that the combined company provide space on its system for noncommercial, public interest programming.

The satellite radio industry was not saddled with public-interest obligations when it was created because it was a brand-new business. But that may change.

"If you can revisit the question about whether there should be one satellite radio service rather than two you can certainly revisit the question of whether there should be public service obligations," Schwartzman said.

New Climate May Benefit Radio Deal (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Radio">Sirius Satellite Radio, made a lot of phone calls seeking advice before he entered into a merger deal with Radio">XM Satellite Radio on Monday.

Maybe he should have called Charles W. Ergen, the founder and chairman of EchoStar Communications.

Mr. Ergen could have given Mr. Karmazin an earful about his failed effort to merge EchoStar with DirecTV four years ago, a deal that seems eerily similar to the one Sirius and XM have proposed.

Will the government see things differently this time?

Michael K. Powell, the former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission who blocked the EchoStar-DirecTV deal, is not so sure.

“I do think it could get through, but I don’t think it’s going to be an easy one,” he said. “It’s going to be incumbent on the companies to demonstrate that the analysis in EchoStar-DirecTV is different.”

In opposing that deal, regulators — both from the F.C.C. and the Justice Department — argued the merger would create a monopoly. EchoStar and DirecTV, on the other hand, argued that the market should be defined more broadly than simply satellite television and should encompass cable television operators and telephone companies providing video over phone lines.

When Sirius and XM announced their merger on Monday, they made a similar argument — that their market is much bigger than just satellite radio.

“In addition to existing competition from free ‘over-the-air’ AM and FM radio as well as iPods and mobile phone streaming, satellite radio will face new challenges from the rapid growth of HD Radio, Internet radio and next generation wireless technologies,” the companies said.

There is no question that times have clearly changed: a decade ago, the argument for a Sirius-XM merger would have never had a chance.

Joel I. Klein, then the acting assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, gave a speech to the radio industry 10 years ago this week, suggesting that merging terrestrial radio stations in the same market was “no different from a situation where all soft drink manufacturers would seek to merge and control 100 percent of that market. We wouldn’t walk away from such a merger — and if you like soft drinks I should think you wouldn’t want us to walk away — merely because there are lots of other beverages out there, such as milk, juice, beer, wine, et cetera.”

But the regulatory tone in Washington has changed. Inside Sirius and XM, executives are bullish on government approval.

In a conference call with analysts yesterday, Mr. Karmazin said that “I would not have gone to our board,” if he “didn’t think there was greater than a 50-50 chance of approval.” In fact, the deal’s timing was driven in part by a feeling that the current administration was more likely to let the deal through and that it needed to be done before that window closed.

DOJ_NMG_0134631

The Justice Department's surprising approval of Whirlpool's acquisition of Maytag — a deal that created the nation's largest manufacturer of appliances with more than 50 percent market share — has encouraged others to proceed with deals that might have seemed to pose regulatory problems.

But Sirius and XM should not necessarily take solace in the shifting attitude in Washington and the Whirlpool decision, some antitrust experts suggest, because the deal's fate may be decided by the F.C.C., which issued two sets of satellite spectrum to Sirius and XM in order to create competition.

At the time, the F.C.C. defined free-to-air radio as a separate market from satellite because free-to-air radio, which included local programming like weather and traffic, was tightly regulated while satellite's content would be unfettered.

"Howard Stern couldn't do his current broadcast on radio," said Mr. Powell, who had fined Mr. Stern several times for some of his lewd talk on terrestrial radio before his program moved to Sirius.

Mr. Powell said that in the end, the deal's fate would lie in the evidence that both companies produce during the government's review. He said that while EchoStar and DirecTV publicly talked up an assortment of competitors like cable and telephone, when the government got its hands on the companies' documents about the way they internally defined their rivals, "it seemed that the only competitors who mattered were each other."

Of course, perhaps the largest factor in their decision will be the precedent regulators want to set. "If the Federal Communications Commission grants a green light for this transaction, the brakes will be off for similar telecommunications industry hookups," Carmi Levy, senior research analyst with Info-Tech Research Group, wrote to clients. If so, perhaps Mr. Ergen will get a second chance.

What Would A Satellite Radio Merger Mean? (USAT)

USA Today, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK — Wall Street sure likes the signals that Sirius and XM Satellite Radio are beaming about their merger plans.

XM shares soared 10.2% to $15.41 and Sirius was up about 6% to $3.92 on Tuesday, the first day of trading after the companies announced their deal to create a single — and still unnamed — satellite radio power to be run by Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin.

Despite the boost, the prices reflect some wariness among investors about whether the merger will actually take place. The deal must be approved by each company's shareholders, as well as by antitrust officials. And the Federal Communications Commission will have to agree to change a merger ban that is part of the original agreement when the companies were formed.

But a more important question is harder to quantify: How will consumers respond to all the changes? Will they be reluctant to sign up for either service?

While the companies can't answer many questions at this early stage in the process, media reporters David Lieberman and Laura Petrecca sort through some of the potential consumer concerns:

Q: I want to subscribe to satellite radio. Should I wait to see what happens with the merger?

A: It depends on how long you want to wait. The companies expect the deal to close at the end of 2007, and that might be optimistic if opponents including the National Association of Broadcasters take the fight to Congress. Until the transaction is complete, the companies are supposed to operate independently. But in the next few months, if merger talk makes potential subscribers wary, the companies might have a reason to sweeten their promotions.

Q: Isn't there a chance that my radio won't work or that either XM or Sirius will be weakened after the deal closes as they move to offer a single service?

A: XM Chairman Gary Parsons says the companies "may have 15 or more years" left to keep offering programming packages similar to the current ones. They can't risk alienating the more than 13 million people who buy Sirius or XM — and who now have radios that can only receive one service, not both.

Q: Does that mean, once the deal closes, there'll still be no change in the existing services for the foreseeable future?

A: Not necessarily. Executives say that after a merger they might share popular programming — although it's unclear whether that might include Sirius' shock jock Howard Stern or XM's Major League Baseball. A lot depends on the terms of their contracts, and when they're up for renewal.

DOJ_NMG_0134632

The two also might share new services in the works, including programming for seat-back TVs in automobiles and real-time traffic, weather and other data.

Q: What other changes may be coming?

A: Executives say they may give consumers more latitude to mix and match the channels they receive, similar to an a la carte deal. And years from now, when they can eliminate duplicative services — such as similar oldies channels — they say they'll offer more programming narrowly targeted to different ethnic groups.

Q: Wouldn't a monopoly have more power to raise prices? Should I sign a long-term deal now to lock in current rates?

A: Antitrust officials and the FCC will be looking closely at pricing. They could kill the deal if they conclude the merged companies might gouge consumers.

Sirius and XM say that they have a strong incentive to keep prices low: The 90% of radio listeners who don't subscribe to satellite tune in to traditional broadcasters that offer ad-supported shows for free. Sirius and XM also face growing competition from Internet radio and podcasts, wireless phone-based services and iPods.

But Morgan Joseph analyst David Kestenbaum notes that XM raised prices 30% two years ago and still picked up lots of new subscribers.

Q: Will the merged company boost revenue by selling more ads in its programs?

A: Hard to say. Ad-free programming is a big selling point for satellite radio. But Wall Street is tired of satellite radio's red ink. Karmazin told analysts on Tuesday that one advantage to having a merged company is that it would be more attractive to national advertisers.

Q: The companies are talking about selling radios capable of receiving both services. When can I buy one?

A: It may be awhile. The companies say they'll begin to push hard toward developing a unified receiver once the merger is complete. Karmazin says he expects the next-generation receivers to be "smaller, lighter, simpler and cooler."

Q: Aren't the two already working on a unified radio?

A: Under pressure from the FCC, they agreed in 2000 to design chipsets and other technology that could receive signals from Sirius and XM. A firm that they've supported has developed a unified radio unit, but it hasn't been approved by the FCC.

Meanwhile, it hasn't made commercial sense to develop a dual radio with two chipsets: It would cost more than the existing ones that receive just one service, and most subscribers pick either Sirius or XM, not both.

Bank of America analyst Jonathan Jacoby estimates that even after a unified or dual radio is available, both systems would have to run independently for at least another three years until customers can be switched over to a combined platform, perhaps with a subsidized radio exchange program.

Automakers also would need to switch over to installing the new, integrated units into their vehicles, a process that normally requires two to three years, Jacoby says.

Q: Why are the companies going through all of the trouble to merge?

A: Although Sirius and XM are still young companies, they are unprofitable, and investors are concerned about the slowdown in the growth rate of new subscriptions.

For example, they point out that 60 million cars have outlets on their stereos to plug in iPods. And conventional free radio stations are investing in HD Radio, which can provide many additional channels of clear, digital signals.

By merging, Sirius and XM say they can cut costs by as much as $7 billion a year. In addition to dropping duplicative channels, they could cut marketing expenses. And programming costs might level off once they stop bidding against each other for talent.

Contributing: The Associated Press

In The Same Orbit, But On Different Planets (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

In the radio industry, Sirius Satellite Radio chief executive Mel Karmazin is like Bono or Prince or Charo: One name is sufficient. Say "Mel," and everyone knows who you're talking about.

The same cannot be said of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Chairman Gary M. Parsons. That's why some say, if the proposed merger between the two satellite companies is approved by regulators, the two executives may work well together.

Under the proposed merger, Karmazin would be the chief executive of the combined company, with Parsons chairing the board. There is no role in the new company for current XM chief executive Hugh Panero, whose duties have diminished since the XM board appointed director Nate Davis as president and chief operating officer in July.

Karmazin and Parsons are opposite in temperament and style, said Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio, an industry trade paper. Karmazin can be electric; Parsons is more laid-back.

Case in point: The rambunctious Karmazin has been tossing merger speculation to the New York media and Wall Street analysts for the past several months. The more reserved Parsons has been just as interested in a merger, he said yesterday, but kept it to himself.

"He was looking at it," Parsons said of a merger, "and we were looking at it -- just less publicly."

Complementary traits between the pair could be key because the last time Karmazin was part of a power duo, things didn't go so well. He left his job as chief operating officer of Viacom for Sirius in 2004 after clashing with Sumner Redstone, the equally strong-willed leader of Viacom.

Before coming to Sirius, Karmazin spent more than three decades in the terrestrial radio business, most of it running Infinity Broadcasting's radio stations and then CBS Radio, when it bought Infinity and eventually became Viacom.

Mel stories are plentiful, and they consistently paint Karmazin as a sleeves-up radio man devoted to making money for shareholders.

Taylor recalls a story of Karmazin helping set up chairs in a meeting room before the start of an investors' conference. Karmazin has near-total recall, Taylor said, which has come back to haunt station managers who worked under Karmazin and failed to produce a promised ratings number.

If there's one thing to know about Karmazin, it's that he's always about the sale. There's a reason "Mel" rhymes with "sell."

"He's one of radio's best-ever sales guys," Taylor said. "He knows how to sell radio advertising."

In 1985, Karmazin sold CBS on hiring Howard Stern (after he'd been fired by New York's WNBC) and built him into a national radio superstar, often defending his antics to corporate brass. In an interview years later, Karmazin was asked what he saw in Stern that made him take a chance on him.

"Revenue," was his reply.

Karmazin is also the man who helped sell Stern on jumping to Sirius in 2004, though the $500 million contract plus performance bonuses probably helped.

Parsons, by contrast, is a veteran of the telecommunications and satellite industries who spent time as a radio deejay in his youth. He has been on XM's board since 1997. He ran XM until he brought in Panero in 1998. Prior to XM, Parsons spent six years at MCI Communications in a number of executive jobs and started several tech companies.

"The general book on me is that I'm extremely collaborative," Parsons said, noting that he has worked well with Panero, something of an outsized personality himself.

Parsons said the proposed merger became inevitable over the past few months, as both companies saw their stock price and market capitalization slide. Wall Street analysts speculated that the synergies created by a merger would be as much as $5 billion -- almost as much as the value of either company on its own.

The odd man out in the proposed merger is Panero, XM's chief executive.

Panero and head XM music programmer Lee Abrams have been with XM since nearly day one, when the company was housed in a basement apartment near Dupont Circle and the only sign of a radio company in the making was a whiteboard with dozens of format ideas scribbled on it.

Panero is a "Star Trek" fan. XM's broadcast operations center at the company's headquarters in Northeast D.C. is a dazzling spectacle of display monitors and lighted control boards sometimes referred to by employees as the bridge of the starship Enterprise.

In the middle of the room is a swiveling chair Panero had modeled after Capt. James T. Kirk's command seat on the Enterprise. Panero sat in the chair and pushed the button that launched XM's service in September 2001.

DOJ_NMG_0134634

Panero is a music junkie who religiously listens to XM's channels and is credited with the vision that cultivated the business through its early years, negotiating the deals that got XM installed in new cars and acquiring talent.

However, XM's board soured on Panero's performance last year after the company missed its earnings guidance for several consecutive quarters. The company got bogged down in legal battles with the music industry and terrestrial broadcasters over technology issues and has allowed the cases to drag on, rather than settle with the groups, as Sirius has. And when Sirius started paying hundreds of millions of dollars for content -- such as the NFL and Howard Stern -- the XM board thought Panero failed to respond effectively and could no longer clearly define XM's vision, said a source familiar with the situation who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the issue.

Panero said if he could have changed anything about his time as chief executive, he would have put off having to pay so much to acquire programming early in XM's life, before it began to stabilize its losses.

Yesterday, Panero said he was proud of the business he helped build and will remain XM's chief executive until the merger is approved and perhaps beyond, if it is not.

He said he would be a little sad to give up the helm of a merged company, "but there can only be one CEO and one chairman."

US Radio Consolidation (FT)

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Howard Stern, the shock jock, may be the self-styled King of all Media, but his employer, Sirius, was certainly not talking world domination in its proposed merger with XM. For the satellite radio deal, which will create a company with a $13bn enterprise value, hinges more than most on regulatory approval. Expect a lot of emphasis on underserved communities and consumer choice and the vast array of alternatives for listeners. There cannot be many media deals that generate a presentation that includes a slide highlighting how many US vehicle registrations there are.

The companies have a point. Competition from AM/FM radio as well as new services, from iPods to streaming music for mobile phones, are real challenges for satellite radio. But Sirius and XM do not just have to make the pure antitrust case, they also have to convince the Federal Communications Commission that the public interest is best served by changing the rules governing their operating licences. It is a gamble, but US business has pulled off far greater ones.

Having said that, this will be a lobbying bunfight. The broadcasters have already weighed in and the market is taking a cautious view: XM's shares traded up strongly, but not as high as would be implied by the sweet 22 per cent premium tacked on to the terms of what was presented as a merger of equals.

If the market could gain extra comfort on the regulatory side, there should be more celebrating to come. For the synergies on offer should be considerable for such a business whose fixed costs are so heavy, from programming to technology.

The companies gave little detail yesterday, bar a range of values for the synergies that, at its higher level, would represent more than the market capitalisations of either company. That looks punchy given the time it may take to realise the benefits. But the economic rationale for merging is still compelling. If only Mr Stern's gift of the gab could be brought to bear in persuading the FCC into thinking the same.

Making Radio Waves (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

As the Federal Communications Commission ponders the merits of allowing satellite radio companies Sirius and XM to combine, let's hope the ghost of another proposed merger haunts the proceedings.

In 2002 the FCC blocked satellite television rivals EchoStar and DirecTV from joining forces on the grounds that allowing the merger would decrease competition and lead to higher prices. Michael Powell, the FCC chairman at the time, said the deal would create a satellite monopoly.

In the event, regulatory intervention, based on an overly narrow definition of the market, has only led to unfulfilled promise in satellite broadband. Five years later, the cable and phone companies are by and large eating satellite's lunch in attracting subscribers. Rupert Murdoch is in the process of selling his stake in DirecTV. And consumers who want one provider for television, Internet and phone service have fewer options than they might otherwise if the regulators had stayed out of the way.

DOJ_NMG_0134635

Which brings us to the proposed merger of XM and Sirius. On news of the deal, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin remarked that the regulatory hurdles "would be high." If so, the agency might want to write more up-to-date regulations. The current "digital audio radio service" rules date to the late 1980s, before high definition radio, iPods, Pandora.com, music file-sharing and other options existed. The media landscape has changed a bit since The Police split up.

Beltway critics of the deal see a media monopolist around every corner, scheming to limit the public's access to content. And it's true that the merger would create a lone satellite radio company. But a pure monopoly is one that exists in a market where there are no close substitutes. By contrast, a combined Sirius-XM would have to compete not only with free broadcast radio but also with MP3 players, online radio and even music channels offered by cable providers.

Heaven only knows what the cellular companies will bring to the party. They're already gearing up to provide more video options, but there's nothing stopping Verizon or Cingular from coming up with a device that includes a couple of dozen radio stations to compete with satellite.

Which is why the real danger here isn't the creation of a "monopoly," unless you define the market in a way that has no resemblance to the real world. The bigger concern is that regulators will repeat the satellite television mistake and in the process reduce consumer choice. "The reason for this merger is not to exclude others from the market," says Adam Thierer, who follows telecom issues at the Progress & Freedom Foundation. "It's to make sure they can compete in the broader market against the various players they face -- serious competitors that have satellite radio providers scrambling for their lives."

The most vocal opponents will be traditional radio broadcasters, who will want the deal scotched outright, or at least conditioned on satellite operators being prohibited from offering local services -- news, weather, traffic -- that would compete with their own offerings. Legislation to this effect has been floating around for the last couple of Congresses, courtesy of Republican Representative Charles Pickering of Mississippi.

We hope Mr. Martin will resist any push for industrial protectionism. If this deal, or subscription-based satellite radio in general, turns out to be a bust, the marketplace will let us know in due time.

Supreme Court Overturns $79 Million Award Against Weyerhaeuser (AP)

By Curt Woodward, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, February 21, 2007

SEATTLE -- The U.S. Supreme Court threw out a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser Co. on Tuesday, but the forest products giant could face a new trial on antitrust claims from a defunct sawmill.

Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. of Vancouver, Wash. - which went out of business in 2001 - convinced an Oregon jury that Weyerhaeuser paid too much for alder logs it didn't need, with the goal of driving competitors out of business.

Under federal antitrust law, the jury's award was tripled to $79 million.

Supreme Court justices overturned that 2003 judgment in a 9-0 ruling Tuesday, saying Ross-Simmons must meet a stricter legal standard than the trial court originally allowed.

Writing for the court, Justice Clarence Thomas said Ross-Simmons should have been required to prove that its competitor had a dangerous probability of recouping the losses it incurred in bidding up prices.

The failure to satisfy that standard "cannot support the jury's verdict," Thomas wrote.

Federal Way-based Weyerhaeuser applauded Tuesday's decision.

"The Court's unanimous ruling sets a clear standard that permits companies to bid competitively for raw materials without risk of violating antitrust laws," Weyerhaeuser Vice President Sandy D. McDade said in a statement.

But Mike Haglund, a Portland, Ore.-based lawyer for Ross-Simmons, said he expects to prevail again if the case eventually returns to U.S. District Court for a new trial.

"We're going to have to go back and retry it under that new standard," Haglund said. "I don't think the result will change - we'll still win. But it is a tougher standard."

Shares of Weyerhaeuser closed down 20 cents, or 0.24 percent, at $82.83 in Tuesday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0134636

Weyerhaeuser appealed the jury award to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, which affirmed that Ross-Simmons needed only to convince a jury that Weyerhaeuser had bought more logs than it needed at a higher price than necessary to gain a monopoly.

The Bush administration asked the Supreme Court to take the case, arguing that the San Francisco-based appellate court erred by setting a low and confusing standard that threatened to "chill pro-competitive conduct by companies that bid aggressively."

From 1998 to 2001, 27 alder sawmills closed in the Pacific Northwest. Alder, the Northwest's leading hardwood lumber, is used in furniture and specialty products such as picture frames and musical instruments.

High Court Limits Antitrust Suits In Weyerhaeuser Win (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, February 21, 2007

Feb. 20 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court overturned a $79 million antitrust award against lumber producer Weyerhaeuser Co. in a ruling that will help shield companies from claims that they illegally tried to drive a competitor out of business.

The justices today unanimously said a jury used the wrong standard in concluding that Weyerhaeuser monopolized the Pacific Northwest market for finished alder, a hardwood used in furniture. A now-defunct rival accused Weyerhaeuser, the world's biggest forest products company, of overbidding for scarce logs.

The ruling is a victory for large U.S. companies, giving them more room to bid aggressively for raw materials and other supplies without the risk of violating federal antitrust laws. Dow Chemical Co., Verizon Communications Inc., Coca-Cola Co. and Microsoft Corp. were among the companies that supported Weyerhaeuser at the Supreme Court.

``There are myriad legitimate reasons -- ranging from benign to affirmatively procompetitive -- why a buyer might bid up input prices," Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the 9-0 court.

The case centered on a judge's instruction to jurors that they could award damages if Weyerhaeuser bought ``more logs than it needed" and prevented Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. from acquiring logs at a ``fair price."

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the instruction, rejecting Weyerhaeuser's contention that it was too vague to provide meaningful guidance.

Predatory-Pricing Standard

The Supreme Court said the 9th Circuit should have applied a legal standard similar to the one the Supreme Court used in a 1993 predatory-pricing case. That case required proof that an antitrust defendant sold its product below cost and was likely to recoup those losses after competition had been driven out.

Ross-Simmons said the 1993 ruling wasn't applicable because the Weyerhaeuser case involved overpayments for raw materials, not predatory price cuts. The company said courts set an especially high bar for predatory pricing cases because lower prices directly benefit consumers.

Ross-Simmons acknowledged at an argument session in November that it hadn't met the standard from the 1993 case.

Ross-Simmons, which went out of business in 2001, was based in Longview, Washington. The company accused Weyerhaeuser of paying higher-than-market prices for alder wood, buying more than it needed, entering into exclusive agreements with suppliers and illegally buying logs from state forests.

Weyerhaeuser Cases

A Portland, Oregon, jury in 2003 said Ross-Simmons was entitled to compensation of more than $26 million, an amount that was tripled under federal antitrust rules.

The award would have been the largest so far in a set of suits against Weyerhaeuser over its finished alder business. The company, which is based outside Seattle, has paid $62 million to resolve some of those claims and put $95 million in reserve, according to regulatory filings.

In addition, Weyerhaeuser is fighting a $16 million award to rival Washington Alder LLC and a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of purchasers of finished alder. Both cases are on hold during the Supreme Court appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0134637

Weyerhaeuser shares fell 20 cents to $82.83 at 4:04 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

The case is Weyerhaeuser v. Ross-Simmons, 05-381.

Weyerhaeuser Wins Supreme Court Appeal On 'Predatory Buying' (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Weyerhaeuser Co. (WY) Tuesday won a U.S. Supreme Court appeal in a predatory buying lawsuit brought against it by a smaller lumber company. The unanimous ruling reconciled antitrust standards for predatory buying and selling.

The outcome, which was expected by legal analysts, overturns a jury award against Weyerhaeuser of $26.26 million in damages, which was tripled to $78.77 million under the relevant laws. That award was thrown out and the case was remanded to lower courts.

In an opinion by Justice Clarence Thomas, the high court said lawsuits alleging predatory buying must meet the same strict standards as predatory selling allegations to survive in federal court.

The decision rejected a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco, that had allowed the lawsuit against Weyerhaeuser to proceed under a broader standard.

"Predatory pricing and predatory bidding claims are analytically similar," Justice Thomas wrote, saying the legal theory advanced in lower courts "cannot support the jury's verdict."

The case before the court involves allegations by Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., a defunct Longview, Wash., sawmill, that Weyerhaeuser, one of the nation's largest wood-products companies, engaged in predatory buying in the Pacific Northwest alder sawlog market.

Ross-Simmons sued Weyerhaeuser after it went out of business in 2001, accusing the lumber giant of illegally dominating the purchase of alder logs.

Weyerhaeuser, in its Supreme Court appeal, argued the courts applied an overly broad antitrust standard to the dispute. Instead, the company said, federal courts should apply to predatory buying the existing Supreme Court precedent on predatory selling. That legal reasoning was adopted by the Supreme Court.

The high court, in a 1993 case, ruled that antitrust-selling allegations must prove that selling took place at a loss and that the seller had a "dangerous probability" of recouping its losses with the impact of the anticompetitive selling.

The case is Weyerhaeuser Co. v. Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber, 05-381.

Warner Is Closer To EMI Deal (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick In London And Ethan Smith In Los Angeles

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Pact With Independents Removes Large Hurdle; Formal Bid Is Awaited

Warner Music Group Corp. Chief Executive Edgar Bronfman Jr. has taken a step closer to realizing his long-held ambition to buy EMI Group PLC, persuading a small but well-organized group of independent record labels to end their opposition to such a purchase.

Warner, the fourth-largest music company by revenue, yesterday said it approached EMI about buying the company a month ago, in what would be the fourth attempt in seven years to combine the music companies. EMI, the third-largest music company, confirmed the approach and said it was waiting for a formal offer.

The two companies have felt pressed to combine to cut costs in the face of flagging sales and to achieve sufficient scale to compete with their two much-larger rivals, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG. (See related Breakingviews column, page C14.)

Value Is Unclear

It isn't clear how a Warner bid would be valued. EMI, whose stock has fallen recently after back-to-back profit warnings, has a market capitalization of £1.92 billion ($3.75 billion). Warner's market capitalization is $2.86 billion.

DOJ_NMG_0134638

Crucially, Warner has reached an agreement with Impala, a trade group for independent European record labels, to end its opposition to a merger. Legal action by Impala derailed merger negotiations between Warner and EMI last year and threatened to disrupt a potential deal again. While it would be up to the European Commission to rule whether an EMI-Warner merger is anticompetitive, Impala's support makes approval more likely. U.S. antitrust authorities aren't expected to object because EMI doesn't have a strong position in the U.S.

Other hurdles to a deal also appear to be clearing. An antitrust decision on a related case -- the reconsideration of the 2004 merger of Sony's and Bertelsmann's music operations -- is due by summer. If approved, that will also remove one of the last impediments to an EMI takeover.

The departures last month of the head of EMI's recorded-music division, Alain Levy, and his deputy, David Munns, also might help by reducing potential rivalry among executives for the top jobs at a combined company.

Mr. Bronfman now is expected to begin takeover negotiations with EMI's new chairman, John Gildersleeve. Warner, based in New York, said in a news release there was "compelling strategic, commercial and financial logic in a combination of the two companies."

EMI, based in London, in a statement, said it would take into account the price offered and the "regulatory and operational risk profile" of any bid. EMI shares rose 8.4% to 240 pence ($4.68) in London; Warner shares rose 4.9% to $19.15 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

One shareholder, Hugh Hendry, who owns four million EMI shares through his fund, Eclectica Asset Management, said he was receptive to Warner's approach. "I have lost confidence in the role of EMI management," he said. An EMI spokeswoman didn't return a call.

Talks Gather Speed

Mr. Bronfman has been negotiating with Brussels-based trade group Impala for almost a year, trying to come up with an agreement that would allow Warner to buy EMI, a person familiar with the situation said. The talks gathered pace in the past two months, the person said. To get Impala on board, Mr. Bronfman agreed to make several concessions, including selling parts of a combined EMI-Warner -- at least some of them to Impala's members -- and providing funding to a new licensing agency for independent labels. It isn't clear which businesses he might sell. If Warner doesn't buy EMI, Impala members don't get anything.

Warner's approach to EMI was earlier reported in Britain's Mail newspaper on Sunday. A merger of the companies would create a group as large as the industry's dominant players, Universal Music and Sony BMG.

"At the moment, there are two very powerful majors and two weak majors," said Martin Mills, chairman of Impala. "We think this [agreement with Warner] will create an industry with three powerful majors and a powerful independent sector."

Write to Aaron O. Patrick at aaron.patrick@wsj.com6 and Ethan Smith at ethan.smith@wsj.com7

Warner Truce Clears Way For EMI Bid (FT)

By Andrew Edgecliffe-johnson,media Editor

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Warner Music has struck a truce with independent record labels that could clear the way for the US-listed group to make a $6bn (£3bn) bid for EMI and reset the balance of power in the music industry's negotiations with Apple and other digital distributors.

Warner has secured the support of the music companies' fiercest critic to revive merger talks with EMI, the British company behind Norah Jones and The Beatles.

No formal bid has been made and the terms of any offer are unclear but Warner said Impala, which represents independent music publishers and labels, had agreed to provide full and complete support for a Warner-EMI merger in front of regulators.

Patrick Zelnick, vice-chairman of Impala, said his group had decided it was better to have "three strong majors [Universal, Sony BMG and Warner-EMI] and a strong independent sector" than to let the industry lose more power to the likes of Apple. "I find it sad that the content industry is so weak in front of the big technology companies," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134639

Warner has agreed to fund a digital rights licensing platform for independent music labels; to divest certain recorded music assets "to reinforce the market power of the independent sector"; and to make other, unspecified commitments.

A two-year campaign by Impala led to last year's decision by the European Union's Court of First Instance to refer the 2004 clearance of the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses back to the European Commission. With the Commission expected to an-nounce a second stage to its Sony BMG review within two weeks, Impala said it would not drop its opposition to the Sony BMG deal, or to Universal Music's purchase of BMG Music Publishing.

Brussels' willingness to re-authorise the Sony BMG merger, which cut the number of big recorded-music groups from five to four, is still unclear, as is any likelihood that it would permit the industry to shrink from four to three majors.

The deal between Impala and Warner surprised antitrust officials and lawyers in Brussels. Several lawyers said it was rare - if not unique - for a company to agree to concessions with rivals before winning either the support of the prospective merger partner or notifying a deal to Brussels.

A spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, said: "The Commission examines all notified mergers and takeovers diligently with a view to assessing whether there would be a negative impact on effective competition - irrespective of whether there are any active complainants."

Warner's approach to EMI was made on January 24, before the UK group's second profits warning of the year. But it was disclosed only after press speculation. EMI rejected Warner's last approach, which valued the group at 320p a share.

A Fair Price Would Put Nicoli On The Spot (FT)

By Andrew Hill

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

It is not too late for love between EMI and Warner Music and, however preliminary and imprecise their latest approach, the Americans have sweetened it with a silky skill worthy of Norah Jones herself.

Warner has sought to soothe worries about regulatory approval - still the biggest uncertainty overhanging any deal between the two music groups - by ensuring the support of independent record companies and music publishers that were the deal's biggest opponents. Combined with worsening conditions in the recorded music industry, that should make the European Commission more sympathetic towards a deal this time round.

The timing looks good, too: Warner contacted the British company on January 24, before the second of EMI's two profit warnings, but, by uncanny coincidence, the approach has only now come to light with the shares battered down to levels last seen in the final quarter of 2005.

The recent history of disappointments at EMI makes it difficult to see Warner returning with a bid near 320p - the price on last year's abortive offer, abandoned following a European court decision that threw the Sony BMG deal back into Brussels' merger review process. EMI has also cut costs further since last summer presenting Warner with fewer possible savings. But if the US group is sensible, a bid that splits the difference with yesterday's closing share price and last year's offer would put Eric Nicoli, EMI's embattled chief executive, in an awkward position.

If he were to grab such an offer and the European antitrust authorities later decided to block a merger, then he would have used up his final shred of credibility with investors. On the other hand, if he spurned Warner's advances on the grounds that the regulatory risk remained too high, he might scotch shareholders' best hope of realising decent value from their investment.

Biomet Buyout Gets Antitrust Approval (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

Biomet's $10.9B Buyout by Private Investment Groups Receives Antitrust Approval

WARSAW, Ind. (AP) -- Orthopedics maker Biomet Inc. on Tuesday said it received antitrust approval from federal regulators for its proposed $10.9 billion acquisition by a group of private investment firms.

Biomet said the Federal Trade Commission granted early termination of the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act.

Blackstone Group, Goldman, Sachs & Co., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group agreed to buy Biomet in December for $44 per share.

DOJ_NMG_0134640

The deal, which is expected to close by the end of October, still needs the approval of Biomet's shareholders.

Shares of Biomet added 13 cents to $42.49 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market. The company's stock will be delisted when the acquisition closes.

Lift Manufacturers Face Brussels Rap (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

ThyssenKrupp, Schindler, Kone and Otis - the world's biggest lift manufacturers - will today be punished and fined by the European Commission for operating a price-fixing cartel.

The European Union antitrust watchdog issued formal charges against the four groups in October2005, and according to several people familiar with the case will hand down its final ruling at a meeting in Brussels tomorrow.

Together, the groups control about two-thirds of the world market for elevators and escalators, with Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, the market leader.

They are accused of operating a cartel in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg between 1998 and 2004. Tobias Buck, Brussels

EU Clears Freeport-McMoRan To Buy Phelps (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

EU Antitrust Regulators Clear Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold to Acquire Phelps Dodge

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday cleared Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. to buy Phelps Dodge Corp., a deal that would create the world's largest publicly traded copper company -- and the largest metals and mining company based in North America.

The European Commission said that combining the two U.S.-based companies would not significantly impede competition in Europe, identifying only limited overlaps between the two that would not cause antitrust problems for rivals, suppliers or customers.

The companies announced in November that Freeport-McMoRan would acquire Phelps Dodge for US$25.9 billion (euro20.17 billion) in cash and stock.

The cash portion of the transaction totals US$18 billion (euro14.02 billion), and Freeport-McMoRan said it would issue 137 million shares to Phelps Dodge shareholders. That would give them about 38 percent of the combined company on a fully diluted basis. Freeport-McMoRan's board will also be expanded to include three independent Phelps Dodge directors.

The merged companies will operate under the Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold banner, though businesses operating as Phelps Dodge will continue to do so.

The world's largest copper company in terms of production is Codelco, or Nacional del Cobre de Chile, owned by the country of Chile.

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold: http://www.fcx.com/

Phelps Dodge Corporation: http://www.phelpsdodge.com/

Korea Fines 9 Petrochemical Firms For Price Fixing (WSJ)

By In-soo Nam

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea's Fair Trade Commission fined nine domestic petrochemical companies a combined 105.1 billion won ($112.2 million) for colluding to fix the prices of petrochemical products for more than 10 years.

A total of 10 companies, including the country's largest refiner, colluded to coordinate the prices of polypropylene and high-density polyethylene between April 1994 and April 2005, the antitrust agency said in a statement.

"The collusion has resulted in 1.56 trillion won in damages to consumers," the commission said.

The commission said Honam Petrochemical Corp., one of the companies involved in the price collusion, wasn't penalized because of its contribution to the commission investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0134641

The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against SK Corp., LG Chem Ltd., Korea Petrochemical Industrial Co., Daelim Industrial Co. and Hyosung Corp.

"We hoped the commission [would] take into account the widespread industry practices at the time," said an LG Chem spokesman. "The penalty is a bit burdensome for petrochemical companies."

The commission said it might adjust the total penalty amount of 105.1 billion won for individual companies.

"We're still waiting for the Fair Trade Commission's final decision," an SK Corp. spokeswoman said.

SK Corp., the largest refiner in the country by capacity, was fined 23.8 billion won, while Korea Petrochemical was fined 21.2 billion won and LG Chem 13.1 billion won.

The 10 petrochemical companies account for more than 85% of the country's synthetic resins market, the commission said.

ENVIRONMENT:

Nuclear Plant Safety Is Called Into Question (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

AMARILLO, Texas -- Electrical failures have shut down the plant. The roof has leaked. Decrepit machinery dates back more than 40 years. Safety lapses led inspectors to levy fines twice within two years. And employees, under deadline pressure, complain they often are worked past the point of exhaustion.

If this factory were producing medical devices or refining gasoline, the conditions would be serious enough. But this is where they work on nuclear bombs.

Pantex is the Energy Department's main nuclear weapons factory, a linchpin of the nation's defense for a half century. The nation no longer makes nuclear weapons, so the plant's chief roles are servicing them or dismantling them to meet the terms of disarmament pacts.

On a 25-square-mile swath of the Texas Panhandle, a series of massive white concrete domes mark the places where live nuclear weapons are opened up.

The rituals and procedures inside those cells are supposed to be as strict as any operating room, part of a safety culture that reduces any chance of an accidental nuclear explosion to one in 100 million.

But lately, outside experts are questioning whether those safety margins are eroding. Federal investigators are trying to assess the overall safety of the plant, which employs 3,300, amid troubling safety snafus and what employees call an atmosphere of intimidation.

Energy Department officials acknowledge that the plant has fallen behind schedule on reliability testing of weapons. Long delays have occurred in decommissioning thousands of surplus warheads to satisfy disarmament pacts. They also concede the plant has maintenance problems and has violated safety procedures. But they insist there is no danger of a conventional or nuclear explosion.

"Pantex is safe, no doubt," said Marty Schoenbauer, the acting chief of the Energy Department's nuclear weapons program.

Safety has improved in recent years, he said, thanks to better procedures. But outside experts, union officials and watchdog groups say the opposite is true -- that safety has regressed since 2000 as the most knowledgeable senior safety experts of the Cold War era retire and the plant's condition deteriorates. Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman is investigating safety conditions at Pantex.

"You can't run a plant on glittering platitudes and generalities and call that a safety program," said Bob Alvarez, a former deputy assistant secretary of Energy and now a senior scholar at the Institute for Policy Studies, a Washington think tank. "A nuclear detonation accident is a low probability, but it is not incredible."

The backdrop to problems at Pantex is a growing concern that the Energy Department has mismanaged the nuclear weapons program. Last year, the Defense Department bluntly said that it had lost confidence in the Energy Department, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman has acknowledged.

DOJ_NMG_0134642

"We have constraints," Bodman said in an interview, conceding the department hasn't met all of its commitments to the Pentagon. Last month, he fired the head of the nuclear weapons administration.

Conditions at Pantex began deteriorating at the end of the Cold War in 1989, when federal managers started starving the plant of funds. Billions of dollars instead were funneled into nuclear weapons laboratories, giving scientists new supercomputer centers, powerful lasers and physics instruments.

By about 2000, the leaks in Pantex's roof were so bad that workers had to cover bombs with plastic when it rained. In summer 2004, a power overload tripped transformers, causing a plant wide blackout. In July, another electrical failure occurred when rats gnawed through wiring, according to weekly safety reports. And in August, a storm swept over the plant that left standing puddles in nuclear production areas.

While such conditions don't necessarily lead to accidents, the Energy Department has levied fines totaling nearly $234,000 against the contractor that operates Pantex, BWX Technologies Inc., for safety violations.

In one case, involving the disassembly of a missile warhead, technicians improperly used red vinyl tape to secure a crack in the high explosives surrounding the plutonium sphere of the hydrogen bomb. The use of the tape itself was not faulted, but technicians misread engineering instructions and caused an even bigger crack.

Federal safety inspectors found that the flawed operation "increased the opportunities for dropping all or part of the explosive during handling and hence increased the potential for a violent reaction," a finding that ran against assurances such a detonation was impossible.

In the second case, technicians were extracting an assembly of high explosives and plutonium from the casing of a different missile warhead for servicing. Using a jackscrew to apply several thousand pounds of force to the explosives, technicians exceeded the allowable loads and over a three-day period violated strict safety protocols.

Dan Swaim, BWXT president at Pantex, acknowledged that both incidents broke safety rules and were unacceptable, but he said there was no risk of a disaster.

"No nuclear yield was possible," Swaim said, asserting the company maintains huge safety margins that preclude any potential for a conventional or nuclear explosion. "As a guy who works here every day, I want it to be darn safe."

The problems at Pantex came to light in the fall after Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington watchdog group, wrote two letters to Bodman complaining about safety. The group has cited a lengthy report in 2000 by former Energy Department safety expert Frank Rowesome, who said that a detonation caused by lightning strikes, solvent fires or other incidents at Pantex was more probable than the Energy Department was admitting.

In an interview, Rowesome, who retired in 2004, said he did not want to alarm the public, but he believes Energy Department officials are so "overly confident" and "complacent" about safety that they are not alert to deteriorating safety conditions.

Where some people see problems, others see progress. Last month, Pantex finally began overhauling the B83, a nuclear bomb designed to drop from a plane, following an 18-month delay triggered when scientists discovered potentially dangerous static electricity in work cells. Schoenbauer said the delay shows how far the Energy Department will go to protect safety. Critics say it shows that hidden safety problems can still exist.

Meanwhile, Pantex has fallen behind schedule in performing critical surveillance tests required by laboratory scientists to certify the reliability of the bombs, Schoenbauer acknowledged. "That backlog has not affected the lab's ability to certify weapons," he said.

But Ralph Levine, who once ran the Energy Department's nuclear weapons surveillance testing, wrote a letter in 2005 asserting the backlog would allow defects in nuclear weapons to go undetected for years. As a result, he said, energy officials removed him as manager of the program and he retired last year.

John Duncan, who until four years ago headed surveillance testing at Pantex for Sandia National Laboratory, agreed that testing problems at Pantex are undermining confidence in the stockpile. Even today, the certifications of nuclear weapons are being made with less certainty than scientists should have, Duncan and Levine said.

"I knew we were in trouble when I started attending meetings in Washington and was told to work better, faster, cheaper," said Duncan. "They started sending people to the plant with little weapons experience."

DOJ_NMG_0134643

The Energy Department confirmed last Friday it planned to reduce the number of annual surveillance tests, saying the plan was better suited to an aging bomb stockpile. But Duncan said this would further erode the reliability of the weapons.

A current senior federal manager at Energy Department headquarters, speaking not for attribution because the interview was not authorized, endorses those concerns.

"The delays in testing and lack of resources are so significant," he acknowledged. "The real question is when the laboratories can no longer certify the reliability of the stockpile."

The work load at Pantex probably will grow even more onerous in coming years.

Under the Moscow Treaty, the U.S. needs to get rid of roughly 4,000 surplus nuclear warheads. At current rates, that will take Pantex until 2050, said Harvard University nuclear weapons expert Matthew Bunn. Although there is no firm deadline, that pace is unacceptable to arms control experts, Bunn said.

The Bush administration has ordered the plant to increase dismantlements by 50 percent this year.

Another task looming for Pantex is modernizing the W76 missile warhead used on the Trident submarine. Hundreds of W76 warheads will have to be disassembled and rebuilt with new parts. Swaim said the W76 program will begin on schedule later this year.

Pantex -- named for the panhandle of Texas -- has a largely blue collar culture. The people who actually touch the weapons are known as "production technicians." They earn about $24 per hour. Engineers average $84,000 per year.

Although the jobs are sought after in Amarillo, an anonymous letter surfaced in November alleging that the plant was in serious disrepair, BWXT management was letting safety slip, and employees were forced to work more than 80 hours a week in some cases.

The stress of working with nuclear weapons has been exacerbated by an abusive management, according to Henry Bagwell, the former chief of the Metals Trade Council, the principal union at the plant. "They treat people badly," said Bagwell, who left last year after 24 years at the plant.

Bagwell said that when he attempted to raise a health and safety problem involving toxic beryllium dust in 2003, he was demoted from X-ray technician to janitor.

"It sent a message," Bagwell said. "It was a public humiliation. Safety seriously took a back seat."

Swaim takes sharp exception to allegations that the roof leaks, labor relations are strained or that severe amounts of overtime are being forced on workers. After the letter surfaced, Swaim said an audit showed overtime averaged just 15 percent over the normal 40-hour work week, although some individuals racked up more.

"I told my guys no more than 72 hours a week," he said.

Md. House Approves Cut In Car Pollution (WP)

By Lisa Rein

Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Higher Gas Mileage Would Be Required

The House of Delegates overwhelmingly approved legislation yesterday that could make Maryland the 12th state to force carmakers to slash emissions thought to cause global warming.

Senate leaders predicted approval of a similar bill this week, and Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) has pledged to sign the legislation.

The stricter standards for cars and trucks hitting dealerships in 2010 would put Maryland in the forefront of states seeking to slow climate change, environmentalists said. But automakers said the requirements would raise prices and reduce choices for consumers -- to make way for more fuel-efficient cars, fewer sport-utility and other large vehicles would be on the market.

Since the best way to reduce gases is to use less fuel, the legislation would require vehicles to be more fuel efficient. The law is designed to raise the state's average fuel efficiency for new vehicles sold in Maryland to 43 miles per gallon. The current average for light trucks and SUVs is 22.2 mpg and for cars, 27.5 mpg.

Five years ago, California became the first state to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide from car tailpipes. The higher standards are to take effect in 2009, but the auto industry has sued that state to block them.

DOJ_NMG_0134644

Maryland lawmakers -- mindful of cancer rates, asthma and rising water levels hastened by climate change in the Chesapeake Bay -- are pushing a slew of clean-energy initiatives during this session.

"It's a big day," House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) said, estimating that the Clean Cars Act would take the equivalent of 190,000 vehicles a year off the road. "People for years wrote off climate change. Now they're seeing things like Hurricane Katrina, tsunamis, and they know the causes of melting ice caps have credibility."

The 122 to 16 House vote included Republican support and reflected the power of the state's environmental movement after passage of legislation last year to curb pollution from coal-fired power plants. O'Malley highlighted clean cars in his State of the State speech last month and embraced the measure in his first-session legislative package.

"He thinks we have a responsibility to lead the fight against global warming," spokesman Rick Abbruzzese said.

New cars in Maryland with 7,500 or fewer miles would have to be built to emit about a third less carbon dioxide from the mix of cars sold in Maryland than today's models. Emissions of other pollutants, including carcinogens and nitrogen compounds that foul the bay, would also be cut.

A percentage of the cars on dealers' lots would have to be manufactured like hybrids, with advanced technology, including some with zero emissions. Motorists would not need to retrofit their cars, but they could not bypass the rules by buying cars in another state: They would be blocked from registering those in Maryland based on their vehicle identification numbers.

The carbon dioxide rule, aimed at reducing emissions of gases produced by burning coal, oil and gas, met the stiffest resistance from automakers.

Carmakers estimate $3,000 would be added to consumers' costs. And they argue that by adopting California's emissions standards, Maryland, New York, New Jersey and other states are ceding their power if California should decide to tweak its regulations.

"This legislation will result in higher costs, reduce choices and give California the authority to make decisions about the vehicles Marylanders drive," said Charles Territo, spokesman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, which lobbied heavily against the bill.

"Some of us are a little uncomfortable with that," said House Minority Leader Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), who voted against the measure.

Territo disputed any health or environmental benefits from reducing carbon dioxide emissions.

The carbon dioxide rules have not taken effect in other states, so there is no test case yet for Maryland consumers.

But environmental groups said the carbon dioxide rules can be met through current technology. Advocates said that average car prices would rise about $1,064 but that in the long term, cleaner cars would save money.

The auto industry blocked the clean cars bill for three years. "General Motors came in and said, 'We have a plant here in Maryland. You'll have to close that plant,' " recalled Del. Maggie McIntosh (D-Baltimore), chairwoman of the House Environmental Matters Committee. Said Del. Elizabeth Bobo (D-Howard), sponsor of the House bill: "We didn't pass the bill, and they still left," closing the GM plant in Baltimore. GM's waning influence in the state and a "lot of education about air and air quality" pushed the measure forward this year, McIntosh said.

The General Assembly is considering other anti-pollution and energy efficiency measures, including bills to reward greater reliance on solar and wind-powered energy. Another bill would revive a tax break for hybrid cars.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Any allies left?

A White House pool report described yesterday's arrival of Vice President Dick Cheney in Tokyo, where he was "greeted by some extremely loud sound trucks" and "one unmistakable chant blaring from one of the trucks in a Japanese-accented male voice, chanting in English: 'Yankee go home, Yankee go home.' "

Stretched thin

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee that FBI referrals for counterterrorism cases increased a whopping 671 percent between 2001 and 2003 -- and to this day require "difficult choices in determining how to most effectively use the available agents" -- did not go unheeded.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware has introduced legislation to add 1,000 FBI agents to the bureau's roster, all to focus exclusively on traditional criminal cases. Estimated cost: $160 million per year.

Gone private

Ambassador Cofer Black, the former ambassador-at-large and coordinator for counterterrorism at the State Department, and Rob Richer, who was the CIA's No. 2 for counterintelligence, will create a new "CIA-type" organization to address intelligence needs in the private sector.

"Terror attacks," "political instability," "avian-flu outbreaks," and even severe weather events will be on the radar of the company, which the pair names Total Intelligence Solutions.

Don't slurp

One-hundred guests at Teatro Goldoni's "Carnevale" last night were certainly watching their manners.

Judith Martin, aka "Miss Manners," was honorary queen at the lavish Save Venice Benefit, seated alongside honorary king Eric Denker, curator and senior lecturer at the National Gallery of Art.

The popular etiquette columnist and author of 12 books, who spent part of her youth in Europe, has a new release due out next month, "No Vulgar Hotel: The Desire And Pursuit of Venice." Considered the definitive manual for the hopeless Venetophile, she emphasizes:

"Love of Venice can strike anyone, not just romantic [weaklings]. Among the toughies with serious cases were Lord Byron, Richard Wagner, Ezra Pound and Ernest Hemingway. There is no cure for this affliction."

After an evening of Venetian cuisine and wine presented by Teatro's chef-owner Fabrizio Aielli and Marco Bolla, owner of Ristorante Lineadombra in Venice, guests were indeed "stricken" with Venetian charm.

Stone by stone

It's some two years behind schedule and about double the anticipated cost, but the much-anticipated underground U.S. Capitol Visitor Center just about has its final stone in place.

At nearly 580,000 square feet, or three-quarters the size of the U.S. Capitol itself, this $600 million polished cellar features a Great Hall, Exhibition Hall, congressional auditorium and Senate and House theaters, accented with marble, granite, solid wood, bronze and glass -- both floor panels and skylights.

Stone masons have placed the Tennessee Valley marble in basket-weave patterns, while on the Rotunda level the last stones are now being set at a pace of 70 per day.

Major construction should wrap up in the next few weeks, with a likely grand opening in early 2008.

Beats checkers

Jim Martin, president of the 60 Plus Association, the nonpartisan seniors advocacy group in Washington, is sitting at home convalescing from neck surgery 10 days ago.

"Who says basketball is not a contact sport?" Mr. Martin said when reached yesterday. "I'm wearing a neck brace for four more weeks, but this is the price I pay to be able to play in the Senior Olympics in mid-June in Louisville, Kentucky."

Mr. Martin's squad of seniors are the Virginia state basketball champions, and play three-on-three.

Professor Norton

That was Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, D.C. Democrat, bragging about the 100th anniversary of Hoyas basketball at Georgetown University, which is in the midst of another exciting season under head coach John Thompson III.

Mrs. Norton, many don't know, is a tenured faculty member of Georgetown University Law Center.

•John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

Border Agents Help Make Pot Seizure (CGVD)

Casa Grande Valley Dispatch, February 21, 2007

Border Patrol agents from the Casa Grande station helped in confiscating $3.7 million worth of marijuana over the weekend.

Agents were asked to help a Bureau of Land Management ranger who was pursing two trucks camouflaged with tarps near Stanfield about 6:45 a.m. Sunday.

While agents responded, the ranger reported his vehicle was intentionally struck by one of the trucks.

Agents found both trucks abandoned on Stanfield Road. They found 4,660 pounds of marijuana in the two trucks, as well as a loaded .45 caliber pistol.

One of the trucks was reported stolen in San Diego, Calif., and was turned over to the Arizona Department of Public Safety.

The other truck is being processed for forfeiture by the Border Patrol. The marijuana was turned over to the DEA and the gun was given to ATF. No arrests have been made and no injuries were reported.

Colombian Rebel Convicted On Drug Charge (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A Colombian woman was found guilty Tuesday of participating in an operation to smuggle tons of cocaine to the United States.

Authorities say her case showed the main rebel group in Colombia is deeply involved in illegal drugs.

Nayibe Rojas, known in the Colombian rebel movement as "Sonia," was convicted by a jury of conspiracy to import and-or distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine. The charge carries a mandatory sentence of at least 10 years.

Two male co-defendants were convicted of the same charge, but they have not been implicated by authorities, as Rojas was, in connection with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC.

Prosecutors accused Rojas of helping export more than 220 tons of cocaine to the United States and Europe since 1994, earning millions of dollars for the FARC.

"Today's convictions represent a significant victory against the FARC, one of the most dangerous narcoterrorist organizations operating in Colombia," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in a statement.

District Judge James Robertson set a May 7 date for sentencing Rojas in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Under current sentencing guidelines, she and the men, Jose Antonio Selis and Juan Diego Giraldo, could be sentenced to 30 years in prison, said Elita Amato, the men's attorney.

Rojas was extradited in March 2005, under a treaty between the United States and Colombia.

The guilty verdict for Rojas is a victory for the United States and Colombia, which have recently stepped up a campaign to portray the FARC, which is on the U.S. list of "foreign terrorist organizations" as a drug-trafficking cartel. In March 2005, the United States announced drug indictments against 50 FARC leaders and offered rewards totaling $77.5 million for their capture.

FARC leaders insist that rather than produce and sell cocaine, they levy taxes on farmers of coca, the raw material used in the production of cocaine, and the drug-traffickers.

Associated Press writer Toby Muse contributed to this report from Bogota, Colombia.

Colombian Rebel Commander Found Guilty Of Drug-trafficking (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - A federal jury on Tuesday convicted a Colombian peasant who rose to become the financial chief of a powerful squadron of leftist guerrillas on charges of conspiring to send more than 5 tons of cocaine to the United States.

Nayibe Rojas is the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - FARC, in its Spanish initials - whom a U.S. federal court has convicted of drug running, although the U.S. and Colombian governments long have alleged that FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry.

The jury heard hours of taped phone and other conversations and testimony of U.S. and Colombian law enforcement agents as well as alleged former drug traffickers during the five-week trial. It issued the verdict after deliberating for four days.

The defense painted Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a member of an insurgency that was battling injustices in Colombia, and government witnesses as shady and unreliable characters from Colombia's drug underworld.

Prosecutors cast Rojas as a gun-totting senior FARC logistics chief who gathered coca base from farmers in the coca-rich Caquet region in southern Colombia and sold it to refiners and traffickers, who then sent the cocaine to the United States.

The jury also convicted two co-defendants, Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo weren't members of FARC, but the prosecutors argued that all three had conspired to send more than 5 tons of cocaine to the United States.

The three face prison terms of up to 30 years. Sentencing was scheduled for May 7.

The U.S. government suffered an embarrassing setback late last year when another Washington jury failed to reach a verdict on Ricardo Palmera - a senior FARC leader better known as Simon Trinidad - who was accused in the kidnapping of three U.S. defense contractors whom the FARC still holds. His retrial is scheduled for next month.

Rojas' case grew more important after the Palmera hung jury, because Colombian prosecutors often use the threat of extraditions to the United States to entice FARC members to cooperate.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty called the outcome of the trial "a significant victory against the FARC."

"This case sends a message to major overseas drug-trafficking organizations: We will investigate, prosecute and punish all those who manufacture and distribute illegal drugs for export to the United States," he said in a statement. "There is no international safe haven for illegal narcotics traffickers."

Jury Convicts FARC Leader (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - A Colombian peasant who rose to become the financial chief of a powerful squadron of the leftist FARC guerrillas was convicted Tuesday by a federal jury on charges of conspiring to send more than five tons of cocaine to the United States.

Nayibe Rojas was the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, convicted of drug running by a U.S. federal court, although the U.S. and Colombian governments have long alleged that the FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry.

Late last year, the U.S. government suffered an embarrassing setback when another Washington jury failed to reach a verdict on Ricardo Palmera -- a senior FARC leader better known as Simón Trinidad -- accused in the kidnapping of three U.S. defense contractors still held by the FARC. His retrial is scheduled for next month.

Rojas' case grew in importance after the Palmera hung jury because Colombian prosecutors often use the threat of extraditions to the United States to entice FARC members to collaborate with them.

The 12-member jury in Rojas' trial heard hours of taped phone and other conversations and testimonies by U.S. and Colombian law enforcement agents as well as by alleged former drug traffickers during the five-week trial. It issued the guilty verdict after deliberating for four days.

The defense painted Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a member of an insurgency battling injustices in Colombia, and government witnesses as shady and unreliable characters of Colombia's drug underworld.

Prosecutors cast Rojas as a gun-totting senior FARC logistics chief who gathered coca base from local farmers in the coca-rich Caquetá region in southern Colombia and then sold it to refiners and traffickers who then sent the cocaine to the United States.

The jury also issued guilty verdicts for her two codefendants, José Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo were not members of the FARC, but prosecutors argued that all three conspired to send more than five tons of cocaine to the United States.

The three could go to jail for as long as 30 years. Sentencing was scheduled for May 7.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty called the outcome of the trial ``a significant victory against the FARC."

DOJ_NMG_0134648

"This case sends a message to major overseas drug trafficking organizations: We will investigate, prosecute and punish all those who manufacture and distribute illegal drugs for export to the United States," he said in a statement. ``There is no international safe haven for illegal narcotics traffickers."

The Bush administration estimates that 80 percent to 90 percent of cocaine on U.S. streets comes from Colombia, and that the FARC controls 70 percent of that country's drug trade to finance its insurgency.

Ruleville Chief Sentenced On Extortion Charge (AP)

AP, February 20, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal judge sentenced Ruleville police Chief Ronald Robinson to 2 1/2 years in prison Tuesday for trying to extort protection money from drug dealers.

Robinson agreed to plead guilty to extortion in an October plea deal that wiped out another extortion charge and four counts of attempting to aid in the possession of crack cocaine with the intent to distribute. He faced up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Robinson was sentenced by Chief U.S. District Court Judge Glen H. Davidson in Oxford, Assistant U.S. Attorney James Maxwell told http://www.clarionledger.com.

Assistant Police Chief Larry Mitchell, who was arrested on the same charges with Robinson, is scheduled for trial April 16 in Davidson's court.

The pair was arrested in August. Authorities said that from December 2003 to June 2006, Robinson and Mitchell, acting in their official capacities, conspired to extort cash payoffs in exchange for providing protection for alleged crack dealers and other people they believed to be distributing crack.

Robinson's Sentencing Scheduled (DDT)

Delta Democrat Times, February 20, 2007

RULEVILLE - Former Ruleville Police Chief Ronald Robinson could be given up to 20 years in prison today when he is sentenced in federal court.

Robinson is being sentenced today in connection to him and former Assistant Chief Larry Mitchell being arrested in August in connection to claims that the two officers extorted alleged criminals to avoid criminal charges.

Robinson, 46, and Mitchell, 33, were arrested on Aug. 4 in different locations near Ruleville by the Federal Bureau of Invesigation on federal drug and extortion charges.

The arrests were made in a joint effort by the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics, the Mississippi attorney general's office and deputies from the sheriff's departments in Bolivar and Sunflower counties.

Their arrests came after a federal grand jury indicted the two in July.

The eight-count federal indictment charges that from December 2003 to June 2006, Robinson and Mitchell, acting in their official capacities, conspired to extort cash payoffs in exchange for providing protection for alleged crack cocaine dealers and other people Robinson and Mitchell believed to be distributing crack cocaine.

On Oct. 26, 2006, Robinson pleaded guilty to the federal charge of extortion in connection with his August arrest.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jimmy Maxwell, who is handling the prosecution of the case, said Robinson is scheduled to be sentenced at 2 p.m. today in Oxford before United States Disrict Court Chief Glen H. Davidson.

Robinson pled guilty to count three of the federal indictment charging him with extortion.

Robinson admitted that while employed as Chief of Police of the Ruleville Police Department, he obtained a cash payoff of $3,000 to which he was not entitled, in exchange for not pursuing drug and gambling related charges against an individual and for providing protection for an indiviual that he believed to be distributing crack cocaine.

Maxwell said as part of Robinson's plea agreement, the remaning counts of the indictment revelant to Robinson “will be dismissed at the sentencing.”

Robinson and Mitchell now also face state charges in connection with their alleged actions as Ruleville's top lawmen.

State indictments against Robinson and Mitchell claim that the two officers extorted alleged criminals to avoid criminal charges.

Maxwell said that although Robinson "only pled to one count of the indictment, it will not affect his sentence."

Maxwell said based on Robinson's guilty plea, he now faces up to 20 years imprisonment, a $250,000 fine and up to three years supervised release.

As a result of Robinson's arrest and guilty plea, he has been released as the town's chief of police.

Mitchell remains on suspensioon from his position with the Police Department without pay pending the result of the investigation.

Mitchell has also maintained his innocence on the federal charges.

Maxwell said as a convicted felon, Robinson will no longer be able to possess a firearm.

Ruleville Police Chief Gets Prison Time (JCL)

Jackson Clarion Ledger, February 20, 2007

Ruleville Police chief Ronald Robinson has been sentenced to two-and-a-half years in federal prison after pleading guilty to extorting protection money from drug dealers.

Robinson was sentenced today by Chief U.S. District Court Judge Glen H. Davidson in Oxford, said Assistant United States Attorney James Maxwell.

Robinson's co-defendant, Assistant Police Chief Larry Mitchell, is scheduled for trial April 16 on the same charges in Davidson's court.

Oxycodone Ringleader Gets 20 Years (HL)

Herald-Leader, February 21, 2007

A Berea man who was the kingpin of a drug ring was sentenced yesterday to 20 years in federal prison in one of the largest prescription drug investigations in Eastern Kentucky.

Danny Clark, 51, was indicted in U.S. District Court in April along with other members of the ring including his brother Richard Clark, Marlene and Rufus Holmes, Samuel Duane Lawson and James Ellis Renner. Clark and others were arrested after a long-term investigation by Rockcastle and Laurel County Sheriff's deputies, London and Richmond police officers, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and the Kentucky State Police.

Clark pleaded guilty in October. He will pay a $1 million judgment as part of the plea.

Clark, according to the indictment and other court documents, was the leader of a drug ring that sold oxycodone and methadone from January 1998 through April 2006 mostly in Madison and Rockcastle counties.

As part of his guilty plea, Clark admitted to distributing more than 53,000 OxyContin pills, including 51,793 80-milligram OxyContin pills, which sell for $100 per pill. The street value for those drugs was more than $5 million. The DEA, Rockcastle County Sheriff, Richmond Police Department and state police used cooperating witnesses to purchase drugs from Clark and his associates, who admitted that they got the drugs from Clark, court documents show.

Richard Clark, Danny Clark's brother, died last year, and charges against him were dismissed. Lawson and Renner pleaded guilty to drug-related charges. Lawson was sentenced to 15 months, Renner was sentenced to eight years and three months. In January, Marlene Holmes was sentenced to five years in prison. Her husband, Rufus Holmes, was sentenced to seven years and three months.

During sentencing, according to the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District, U.S. District Judge Danny Reeves said the Clark case was the largest prescription drug case he has seen in the federal court in London. Eastern Kentucky counties led the nation in per capita sales of prescription painkillers, a 2003 Herald-Leader investigation found.

IMMIGRATION:

Tougher Tactics Deter Migrants At U.S. Border (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134650

SAN LUIS RÍO COLORADO, Mexico — For 10 years, Eduardo Valenzuela has been crossing the border illegally near Yuma, Ariz., trekking over desert scrub and hopping a freight train to get back to his job with a construction company in Phoenix. The clandestine trip has become an annual ritual for him, as he goes home each winter to see his children.

But on a recent afternoon he and four travel companions from his hometown, Los Mochis, plopped down on a bench in a park in the border town of San Luis Río Colorado, exhausted and dispirited. They were beat. Border Patrol agents had caught them twice over three days, hounding them with helicopters and four-wheel-drive trucks.

"It's become much more difficult," Mr. Valenzuela said, echoing the comments of dozens of other migrants. "Before, you just arrived here and then you walked a little and got the train. You used to see a border patrol agent every 10 kilometers. Now you see four of them where there was one. Think of it."

All along the border, there are signs that the measures the Border Patrol and other federal agencies have taken over the last year, from erecting new barriers to posting 6,000 National Guardsmen as armed sentinels, are beginning to slow the flow of illegal immigrants.

The only available barometer of the decline is how many migrants are caught. In the last four months, the number has dropped 27 percent compared with the same period last year, the biggest drop since a crackdown immediately after 9/11. In two sections around Yuma and near Del Rio, Tex., the numbers have fallen by nearly two-thirds, Homeland Security officials say.

"We are comfortable that this actually reflects a change in momentum," Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, said in an interview last week during his first official visit to Mexico City. "I'm always quick to say it doesn't mean we can declare victory. To some degree, I expect the criminal organizations or smugglers are pulling back a little, watching to see if we lose interest."

Some immigration experts said it was too early to tell if the enforcement efforts had caused a permanent downturn. In the past, tougher enforcement has only caused smugglers to seek new routes.

"It's the squeeze the balloon phenomenon," said Roberto Suro, the director of the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington. "Sometimes you can't tell where the bubble will come when you squeeze until later."

Nor can they rule out other factors, like a relatively cold winter on the border and Mexico's solid economic growth last year.

Border Patrol commanders say they see no explanation for the drop-off across the entire 2,000-mile border other than stiffer enforcement deterring migrants. The slackening flow, they argue, belies the conventional wisdom that it is impossible to stem illegal migration. Many veteran officers in the force are now beginning to believe it can be controlled with enough resources.

The new measures range from simply putting more officers out on patrol to erecting stadium lights, secondary fences and barriers of thick steel poles to stop smugglers from racing across the desert in all-wheel-drive trucks. The Border Patrol has deployed hundreds of new guards to watch rivers, monitor surveillance cameras and guard fences.

In the Yuma headquarters of the Border Patrol, for instance, Chief Ronald Colburn said that with the help of the National Guard the patrol had doubled the agents in his sector to about 900, extended the primary steel wall eight miles past the end of the Mexican town of San Luis Río Colorado, and constructed a vehicle barrier six miles beyond that. "It's the right mix, the right recipe," he said.

The federal government has also begun punishing migrants with prison time from the first time they enter illegally in some areas. For instance, along the 210 miles of border covered by the Del Rio office of the Border Patrol, everyone caught crossing illegally is charged in federal court and, if convicted, sentenced to at least two weeks in prison.

That is an enormous break with past practice, when most Mexican migrants were simply taken back to the border and let go. People from Central American countries were given a court date and released on their own recognizance. Few ever showed up.

In San Luis Río Colorado, the effects of the stepped-up patrols are apparent. A year ago, migrants thronged the town park and cheap motels, where guides, known as "coyotes" or "polleros" offered their services. Now the park is nearly empty. The smugglers are telling their charges to take a bus to a spot called El Sahuaro about 50 miles east of town. From there the migrants make a dangerous two-day walk through rocky canyons and barren desert to reach Interstate 8.

DOJ_NMG_0134651

On the other side, Border Patrol agents say they are picking up about 100 people a day, rather than the 500 a day they handled a year ago. A year ago, the processing center in Yuma, where migrants are fingerprinted then shipped to the border, was mobbed. Now it is nearly empty most of the time.

Several migrants waiting their chance in San Luis cursed under their breath in Spanish when asked about the soldiers and beefed-up patrols. Some are indignant that the United States would treat them like enemies or criminals.

"It's harder and harder, and that's the reason why people are dying in the desert," said Miguel Pérez, a 24-year-old migrant from Guerrero State. "It makes no sense."

A year ago, a flood of immigrants from Central America was also overwhelming the border patrol in Del Rio and Eagle Pass, two small Texas towns on the Rio Grande. The migrants were taking advantage of a lack of detention space, which had led to the policy of giving them a hearing date and letting them remain in the country.

The result was bizarre: Central Americans would cross the river in droves in broad daylight, run up to Border Patrol agents and line up to be arrested, knowing they would be released and could then continue on their journey. More than 200 a day were arrested in Eagle Pass alone.

Agents at the processing center, never intended as a jail, were so busy feeding and fingerprinting migrants they had little time for patrolling, said Randy Clark, the agent in charge of Eagle Pass Border Patrol office.

"It was a madhouse, literally a madhouse," he said, as he walked through the processing center, its empty cells covered in graffiti. "It's like night and day. Night and day."

Agent Clark and his colleagues attribute the reversal to two changes. First, the Justice Department gave Border Patrol agents the ability to deport most of the Central Americans more quickly, without a hearing before a judge.

Then, in December 2005, the federal government started prosecuting everyone the Border Patrol picked up for illegal entry, a misdemeanor that carries a penalty of up to six months in county, state and federal jails for a first offense.

On a recent morning, 78 immigrants shuffled into the federal courtroom of Judge Victor Roberto Garcia. The migrants were shackled around the feet and hands as if they were dangerous criminals.

Once in court, the judge conducted an unusual mass hearing in which all the migrants — represented by a single lawyer — agreed to waive their right to a trial and pleaded guilty to illegal entry. The judge gave the first-timers 15 days in jail, but he handed out sentences of 120 or 180 days to those who had been deported in the past.

One Honduran woman, Gloria Machado-Lara, had been deported just a month before, but tried to slip in again with her husband, Freddy Rosales Díaz, in early February. The judge looked dumbfounded.

"Just last month they sent you back?" he said. "You understand that's why you have to go to jail."

Head lowered, she said, "Forgive me." He gave her and her husband 120 days.

Though it seems cruel to many migrants, the zero-tolerance policy appears to be working, Border Patrol commanders say. Along the river the Del Rio sector patrols, arrests are a third of what they were a year ago, only about 35 a day. In the meantime, drug seizures have doubled, as more agents have been freed up to patrol.

"Word is getting around out there that if you cross in this area and get apprehended you are probably going to go to jail, and that is a deterrent," Sector Chief Randy Hill said.

Yet across the river in Ciudad Acuña, where migrants arrive bewildered and penniless every afternoon after serving their prison sentences, several said they had no idea they ran the risk of jail. The smugglers they hired never told them.

One of the migrants was a 51-year-old plumber from Acámbaro, Guanajuato, who asked that his name not be used because he was ashamed of the criminal conviction. He said he was trying to get to San Antonio, where a friend had promised to get him a job at a water park.

He needed more money, he said, to pay his son's college tuition. He had never set foot in a jail before.

But he acknowledged that the stint in jail had persuaded him not to try again, even if his son must drop out. "No way," he said, shaking his head.

Memo May Be Basis For New Trial Of Agents (SBS)

San Bernardino Sun, February 21, 2007

Defense attorneys for two former El Paso, Texas, area Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting a Mexican drug smuggler will ask for a new trial based on evidence they say wasn't provided to them in court.

Mary Stillinger, co-counsel for former Border Patrol agent Ignacio Ramos, said an April 12, 2005, Department of Homeland Security memo was never provided to them.

The memo - written by Christopher Sanchez of the department's Inspector General's Office acknowledged that all nine agents at the scene, including two supervisors, knew about the shooting, heard about the shooting and covered up the shooting.

Shana Jones, special assistant to U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton for the Western District of Texas, whose office prosecuted the case, said that prosecutors will continue to challenge any questions on appeal.

"Both supervisors testified at trial as well as other witnesses that they were not present when agents Compean and Ramos were shooting at the fleeing alien," Jones said.

"Additionally, radio traffic confirms their testimony that they were not there at the time of the shooting. With regard to legal questions, we have litigated those at trial and will continue to litigate those legal questions on appeal."

Only Ramos and fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean were charged in the case.

"I confirmed with all other trial counsel, and we concurred that the document was never disclosed to us," Stillinger said. "If we had that document we would've used it."

Ramos and Compean were convicted in March for shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila on Feb. 17, 2005, in the left buttock as he fled to Mexico.

Aldrete-Davila, who allegedly smuggled about 700 pounds of marijuana from Mexico into the U.S. that day, received immunity from prosecution to testify against the agents.

Ramos and Compean, who are in federal prisons, have appealed their case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

Stillinger also has filed a sealed motion with the appellate court for bond pending appeal.

However, Andy Ramirez, chairman of the Chino-based Friends of the Border Patrol, said that the Compean family had the document since the trial began. Compean's wife Patty said the attorneys had the document since 2005 and may have overlooked it.

"I hope that the memorandum was just overlooked," Patty Compean said.

Stillinger, however, said the four defense attorneys working the case did not see the memorandum.

Both agents said that the other agents and supervisors who were involved in the incident knew about the shooting. That assertion was backed up by the memo written by Sanchez.

Regarding the memo, Stillinger said, "either the Office of Inspector General withheld it from the prosecution or the prosecution withheld the document from us."

The memo is not an admissible part of Ramos and Compean's appeal because it was not part of the original trial, Stillinger said.

A new trial, however, may be possible if the district court believes the memorandum would have made a significant difference in the outcome of the case, she added.

"We would have to file for a new trial with the original court," Stillinger said. "The court would look to see is this something that we did not get in the past? Is it something that should be given to us? And is this material evidence?"

Policy Supports Agents (DB)

Daily Bulletin, February 20, 2007

Two convicted former El Paso Border Patrol agents accused by the U.S. Attorney of not filing a report when they shot a Mexican drug smuggler were prohibited by their own agency's firearms policy from doing so, according to documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin.

Meanwhile, the government made public Monday its response to Border Patrol Agent Ignacio Ramos' October motion to reduce his sentence.

DOJ_NMG_0134653

The response contends that Ramos and fellow agent Jose Alonso Compean knowingly shot an unarmed suspect, filed a false report, and that supervisors were not notified.

Attached to the motion were domestic violence arrest reports regarding three disputes Ramos had with his wife, Monica. Those documents were not admissible during the agents' trial. Ramos was not charged with a crime stemming from the incidents.

Ramos and Compean were convicted last spring for shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican drug smuggler, in the buttocks on Feb. 17, 2005. The agents are now serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, in federal prison.

The agents were convicted partly due to the government's successful argument at trial that the two men failed to file a report about the shooting.

But U.S. Border

Advertisement

Patrol firearms policy specifically states that agents are prohibited from filing a report if a shooting incident takes place and that only an oral report to supervisors is required.

"Ensure that supervisory personnel or INS investigating officers are aware that employees involved in a shooting incident shall not be required or allowed to submit a written statement of the circumstances surrounding the incident," according to the firearms policy.

"All written statements regarding the incident shall be prepared by the local INS investigating officers and shall be based upon an interview of the INS employee."

INS refers to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which oversaw the Border Patrol prior to the creation of the Department of Homeland Security. The shooting policy has remained unchanged.

Department of Homeland Security Office of Inspector General documents obtained by the paper show that all nine agents on the scene at the time of the shooting - including two supervisors - knew shots had been fired.

Oscar Garcia, El Paso Border Patrol Union representative with Local 1929 and a firearms instructor, said that the Report of Apprehension or Seizure filed by Compean and Ramos on the day of the incident was accurate. Garcia stated that the agent's omission of the shooting in the drug seizure report followed firearms policy.

"Our own policy prohibits them from filing any report on the shooting incident," Garcia said. "The U.S. Attorney's assertion that they covered up the incident by not filing a report is ridiculous."

Johnny Sutton, the U.S. attorney for western Texas whose office prosecuted the case against the agents, contends the agents didn't report the shooting to supervisors who arrived on scene and knowingly lied about the incident.

"Ramos did not mention the shooting, and said nothing about the suspect having a weapon," Sutton said in an Aug. 11 press release.

Sutton was not immediately available for comment on Monday.

Both agents, however, told the Daily Bulletin the other agents and supervisors on the scene that day knew about the shooting, an assertion echoed in a Department of Homeland Security Office of Inspector General memorandum written March 12, 2005, by Christopher Sanchez, an investigator with the Office of Inspector General.

"Investigation disclosed that the following Border Patrol agents were at the location of the shooting incident, assisted in destroying evidence of the shooting, and or knew/heard about the shooting: Oscar Juarez, Arturo Vasquez, Jose Mendoza, David Jaquez, Lance Medrano, Lorenzo Yrigoyen, Rene Mendez, Robert Arnold, and Jonathan Richards," Sanchez wrote.

Arnold and Richards were the two supervisors on the scene that day.

Richards was given a promotion shortly after the incident and testified against the agents. Agents Vasquez, Juarez and Jaquez were given immunity from prosecution to testify against Ramos and Compean.

The prosecution's objection to Ramos' motion to reduce his sentence, which was released Monday, goes against what was reported by the Office of Inspector General and contends the two former agents covered up the shooting on their own.

According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Debra Kanof, who prosecuted the agents and wrote the motion, some of the least credible evidence was when Ramos and Compean walked away from the scene.

"Instead of fulfilling (Ramos') duties as an agent and as a member of the response team, he walked side by side with Compean, who according to Compean's own testimony, bent down at least nine times to pick up his own spent casings."

Kanof also states in her response that Ramos never mentioned until the trial that he thought his life or Compean's was in danger, or that they thought the smuggler had a gun.

Ramos chose not to speak to investigators until his attorney was present, he told the Daily Bulletin. Compean, however, did wave his right to counsel and discussed the incident with investigators from the Office of Inspector General.

Contrary to Kanof's statement, several memorandums written by Sanchez, the investigating officer, attest that Compean believed his life was in danger.

"Compean said that he began to shoot at Aldrete-Davila because of the shiny object he thought he saw in Aldrete-Davila's left hand ... Compean explained that he thought that the shiny object might be a gun and that Aldrete-Davila was going to shoot him because he kept looking back at him as he ran away."

TAX:

Rapper Can't Evade Tax Charge (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, February 21, 2007

A federal judge refused to dismiss tax-evasion charges against a controversial Hub hip-hop artist on the opening day of his trial yesterday simply because the rapper's accountant was singing to the FBI and IRS about his alleged shenanignans.

Lawyers for Ray "Benzino" Scott, 41, former co-owner of the hip-hop magazine The Source, argued in court papers, "There is something fundamentally wrong with the government employing (Scott's) controller to gather evidence of other crimes at the very same time the controller is ostensibly putting together the information necessary to prepare (Scott's) tax returns."

But U.S. District Court Judge Rya W. Zobel sided with federal prosecutors, who called Scott's eleventh-hour bid "far from candid."

The informant, George Moore, handled finances for The Source. On at least one occasion when he was secretly recording a conversation with Scott, telling him he had to file taxes, Scott hung up, according to prosecutors.

Moore assisted with the government's investigation of Scott from 2001 to 2002, but was never paid, prosecutors insist.

Scott's struggling musical acts have included Made Men and the Almighty RSO. Best known for the anti-police rap "One in the Chamba," he stands accused of failing to file tax returns for 1999 and 2000, despite pulling down six-figure incomes both years.

The former Easton resident had a well-publicized feud with Eminem after he accused the white rapper of making it hard for black artists to break into the mainstream.

The Source's board of directors dropped Scott and co-founder Dave Mays last year amid allegations of financial mismanagement. The longtime friends have since launched a competing publication, Hip Hop Weekly. Scott plans to call Mays as a witness.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Presses Case For Health Plan (MRKTWTCH)

By William L. Watts

Market Watch, February 21, 2007

Faced with a growing chorus for some type of universal healthcare coverage, President Bush met with insurers Tuesday to argue his case for changing the tax code in a bid the White House says will make health insurance more affordable for many Americans.

"I discussed my health care plan that would ... equalize the tax code so that the individual would be more likely to be able to purchase a plan, because I believe a good health care system is one that rewards the consumer, encourages the consumer, and makes sure the consumer has got the capacity to make viable choices," Bush said following the White House meeting with CEOs, including the top executives at Aetna Inc., Cigna, EHealth Inc. and Wellpoint Inc.

Bush, in his State of the Union address last month, outlined a plan that would significantly alter the tax treatment of employer-provided health benefits. Under current law, such benefits are provided to the employee tax-free. Under Bush's plan, all workers would receive a standard deduction of up to $15,000 for married couples and $7,500 for individuals for health insurance.

"If you buy health insurance on your own, you pay much more after taxes than if you get it through your job," Bush said in his weekly radio address on Saturday.

Backers say the measure would create a more level playing field between workers with employer-provided health care and workers who buy their own health insurance. Opponents say the plan would prompt employers to ditch health-care plans while doing little to reduce the number of uninsured.

Democratic leaders have said the Bush plan has little chance of advancing legislatively.

While not endorsing Bush's proposals, a bipartisan group of 10 senators last week sent the White House a letter calling on the president to work with them on a major health-care overhaul.

"We disagree with those who say the Senate is too divided and too polarized to pass comprehensive health care legislation. We disagree with those who believe that this issue should not come up until after the next presidential election," said Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., in a response to Bush's Saturday radio address.address.

Bush's Pallid Health-Care Proposal (BSWK)

By Robert Greenstein And Edwin Park

BusinessWeek, February 21, 2007

President George W. Bush recently proposed major changes in the way the tax code treats health insurance. It's a welcome development that the President has placed this issue on the table. Unfortunately, his plan is unlikely to significantly reduce the ranks of the uninsured, in part because it isn't targeted at the people who can least afford coverage. Moreover, the plan could cause many people in poor health to lose coverage by weakening the employer-based health system—the source of most Americans' health insurance—without putting a viable alternative in its place.

Today, employer-sponsored health insurance is exempt from taxes. This exemption is worth the most to high-income people because they often have more extensive coverage and they pay taxes at higher rates. But low- and moderate-income people, who have more difficulty affording health insurance, get only a modest tax break (if any) because they either pay taxes at low rates or owe no income tax. And people who don't have employer-based insurance generally get no help at all.

Under the President's plan, anyone who has employer-based coverage would have their taxable income increased by the amount that their employer pays for their health plan. However, they would be allowed to claim a standard deduction of $7,500 for single coverage or $15,000 for family coverage, starting in 2009. People who buy insurance through the individual market could claim the same standard deduction.

Further, if an employer's contribution is less than the standard deduction, the employee's taxable income—and thus their tax bill—would go down. If their employer's contribution exceeds the standard deduction, they'd owe taxes on the difference.

There are three basic problems with the President's plan:

1. Most of the uninsured would receive only modest help. About half of uninsured Americans wouldn't receive an income tax break from the plan because they don't owe federal income taxes. Their payroll taxes would decline under the plan, but that would generally be offset by reduced Social Security benefits when they retire (because those benefits are based on the amount of wages subject to the payroll tax).

Nearly all of the remaining uninsured are in the 10% or 15% tax brackets, so their tax benefits would be modest—usually not enough to enable them to afford health coverage, especially if they have medical problems. The President's own estimates indicate that the new standard deduction would shrink the number of uninsured, currently nearly 47 million, by only about 3 million. Some analysts expect even smaller gains.

DOJ_NMG_0134656

2. The plan would weaken employer-based coverage. While highly imperfect, the employer-based health system is the principal means for "pooling" healthy and sick workers together, so that insurance is affordable for those in poor health. Pooling allows insurers to offset the high cost of covering sick people with the low cost of covering healthy people, keeping premiums at more manageable levels for everyone.

Currently, the tax system supports this pooling mechanism by giving a tax exemption for employer-sponsored coverage. The President's plan would eliminate this tax advantage by allowing people to claim the standard deduction whether they get their coverage through their employer or on their own. As a result, some employers—particularly smaller organizations—would have an incentive to stop offering health insurance to their employees, assuming that workers could use the deduction to purchase coverage in the individual market.

For many workers, especially those in poor health, that would be a dubious assumption. In most states, insurers in the individual health insurance market vary premiums according to a person's health. For people with medical problems the insurers often charge very high amounts, refuse coverage for the conditions they have, or refuse to cover them altogether. Workers in poor health whose employers drop coverage as a result of the President's plan could find themselves unable to secure adequate or affordable coverage on their own. Many could end up uninsured.

3. The plan provides no viable pooling alternative to employer-based coverage. The President's staff has acknowledged that many unhealthy people would probably be unable to use the standard deduction to find coverage in the individual market. To address this concern, the President would allow states to redirect some existing federal funds from public and charity hospitals that care for the uninsured, to state initiatives like "high-risk pools," which provide coverage to people unable to purchase insurance in the individual market because of their health status.

High-risk pools have proven ineffective, however, because they don't pool sick people with healthy people, but with sickly people who cost even more to insure. To keep the cost of these pools from spiraling out of control states have had to limit enrollment, set premiums at very high levels, and scale back the coverage they provide. That makes high-risk pools a very poor alternative to employer-based coverage.

In sum, the President's plan would weaken employer-based coverage without providing an alternative to pool risk, such as allowing people to "buy into" Medicare or the health plan used by Congress and federal workers. That's not a step toward the health care reform this country needs.

Greenstein is executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Park is a senior health policy analyst at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Many Americans Don't Trust Leaders To Reform Health Care, Poll Finds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Nearly half of Americans don't trust President Bush to reform the nation's health-care system, a new Wall Street Journal Online/Harris health-care poll found.

When asked much they trust the president to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system, 49% said "not at all," while 16% said "not much," according to the online survey of 2,482 U.S. adults. By comparison, 18% said they trust Mr. Bush "to some extent" and only 9% trust him "a great deal" on the issue. The survey was conducted Feb. 7-9.

The survey found more confidence in Democrats than Republicans. Fifty percent said they trust Democrats on the issue "a great deal" or "to some extent," up from 45% in a survey conducted last year1. In contrast, 28% of people in the latest poll said they trust Republicans "a great deal" or "to some extent," compared with 31% last year.

Among potential presidential contenders, 48% said they trust Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton on the issue a great deal or to some extent, while 45% said the same about Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, 34% about Republican Sen. John McCain and 19% about Republican Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts.

Group To Protest Bush Visit To Chattanooga (CHA)

Chattanoogan, February 20, 2007

A group opposed to the war in Iraq will protest during President Bush's visit to Chattanooga.

But the Hamilton County Republican Party was urging a turnout of support for the President.

DOJ_NMG_0134657

Connie Weathers, county GOP chairman, said, "Bring your friends and family to come show your support for our President beginning at 10 a.m. outside the Trade Center. Bring your flags and red, white and blue!"

The protest site is at the sidewalk of Carter Street across from the Convention Center.

The president is set to fly into the Chattanooga Metropolitan Airport on Air Force One Wednesday morning.

He is due to make about a 20-minute tour of Erlanger Medical Center prior to going to the Convention Center. There he will hold a "conversation on healthcare initiatives."

The events are not open to the public.

It was announced Tuesday night that Gov. Phil Bredesen will join President Bush in Chattanooga on Wednesday "for several events that will focus on expanding healthcare options for the uninsured."

His office said Gov. Bredesen will greet President Bush at Chattanooga Metropolitan Airport, and will proceed with the President to Erlanger Medical Center for a tour of the facility. The governor will then travel with the President to the Convention Center to participate in a conversation on healthcare initiatives.

Also set to be in the entourage are Sen. Lamar Alexander, Sen. Bob Corker and Rep. Zach Wamp.

UTC student Matthew Pullen said he expects 30-50 protestors at a minimum for the protest.

He said in an email, "Try to think of it as just one of the few days out of the year you can speak out, especially in the President's presence.

"Of course, none of us expect that this will reverse the War in Iraq or reform healthcare, but what we CAN hope for is that it will show lawmakers, candidates, and Bush himself that there are concerned citizens here. We will speak up, we will show that we respectful dissent.

"Hopefully, this protest will take some wind out of the sails of President Bush's speech on healthcare he is giving in Erlanger."

He urged group members, "Please keep it peaceful and quiet. The last thing we need is any trouble to diminish our point. Keep signs clean, keep chanting/yelling/ singing to a minimum, etc. We want to show that we are a peaceful public group."

Airport officials said there will be no public access to view either the President or Air Force One from the airport on Wednesday.

There will be minimal delays on commercial air traffic, if any, it was stated.

Officials said all services provided by the Chattanooga-Hamilton County Health Department will operate under normal business hours on Wednesday. However, some streets around the Health Department will be closed.

During the President's visit to Erlanger, Health Department clients, business partners, and visitors can access the Health Department entrance by the following route:

From the east, take a right onto Central Avenue, which turns into Blackford Street. Blackford Street runs behind Erlanger Hospital and ends at the Health Department. Health Department clients, business partners, and visitors can park in the parking garage behind the Health Department.

From Amnicola Highway or downtown, take McCallie Avenue and turn left onto Central Avenue. Follow Central Avenue to Blackford Street. Blackford Street runs behind Erlanger Hospital and ends at the Health Department. Health Department clients, business partners, and visitors can park in the parking garage behind the Health Department.

The circular driveway behind the Health Department is also available for client or service drop-off.

The Health Department is available to answer questions about the continuation of services on Wednesday or to help direct clients to our entrance. Please call (423) 209-8000 for more information.

Medicare Benefit Appears To Slow Spending Growth On Drugs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Federal number crunchers said yesterday that the new Medicare drug benefit appears to be slowing the growth in national spending on prescription medicines because the drug plans are negotiating lower prices with drug companies.

DOJ_NMG_0134658

But the analysts also forecasted that overall health-care spending would continue to rise and would account for nearly 20 percent of the economy -- or more than $4 trillion a year -- by 2016. In contrast, health-care spending was about $2.1 trillion in 2006, accounting for about 16 percent of the economy. In 1985, it was just over 10 percent.

The findings provide new fuel for the debate about whether Medicare could get better drug prices if the government negotiated with pharmaceutical companies. Many Democrats in Congress say it would, and the House has already passed legislation requiring the government to use its negotiating muscle. President Bush maintains that the current system achieves the best prices, and he has threatened a veto.

The figures are being published today by actuaries and economists at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) in the journal Health Affairs. The figures cited in the study for 2006 are forecasts as well because data are not available yet, federal officials said.

Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit research institution, said the projections show that the United States still has a serious problem with rising costs despite a slowdown in health-care spending growth in recent years.

"The cost problem isn't solved," Davis said. "In the 1990s we thought managed care was the solution. In the 2000s we thought consumer-driven health care and higher deductibles for patients was the solution. Now, when you look at these numbers, you realize we've got to get serious about transforming the health-care system."

Analysts said they expect to see that spending on prescription drugs rose more slowly in 2006 because of the Medicare Part D drug benefit that began last year. In the program, private insurers negotiate prices with drug companies as they compete to attract Medicare beneficiaries.

That has helped hold down prices even as more seniors are able to get drugs, John A. Poisal of the CMS said in a briefing. National spending on prescription drugs was expected to rise to $214 billion in 2006, from $201 billion in 2005. But that increase is 0.4 percentage points less than it would have been without the new drug benefit, he said.

Several national polls have shown that a majority of the public believes government negotiations would hold down drug costs even more. A survey of 1,000 adults released yesterday by AARP, for instance, found that 87 percent of respondents -- including majorities of Democrats, Republicans and independents -- supported allowing the government to use its bargaining power.

Health Costs To Nearly Double In A Decade (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Healthcare spending in the United States will nearly double over the next decade to $4.1 trillion in 2016, government economists said today, prompting concern that Americans cannot keep paying for cost increases that outstrip the growth of the economy.

The healthcare bill will average $12,782 for every man, woman and child in 2016, an increase from $7,498 this year, said the report, published online by the policy journal Health Affairs. Healthcare costs will account for nearly 20 cents out of every dollar Americans spend in 2016, up from about 16 cents today.

And by 2016 — even before most baby boomers retire and become Medicare recipients — federal, state and local government will be picking up nearly half the national healthcare tab, putting pressure on Congress to curb benefits, raise taxes or both.

"This is really the key issue for the fiscal future of the nation," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a private group that promotes reducing the federal deficit. "If healthcare costs continue to drift up — unless you dramatically raise taxes — you will have healthcare pushing out everything else government does. Nobody can say exactly when you reach a point that it's unsustainable, but you can look at something and say it's unlikely."

The report by the government's Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services follows a recent private study concluding that the United States spends far more on healthcare than other advanced countries, with no measurably better result.

DOJ_NMG_0134659

Even after adjusting for greater disposable income here, the report by the McKinsey Global Institute, a private economic think tank, found that costs in the U.S. were $1,645 per person higher than in countries such as the United Kingdom and Germany. It attributed the excess costs to higher administrative expenses, drug prices, doctors' incomes and other factors.

"Most components of the U.S. healthcare system are economically distorted," the report said, adding that "no single factor is … the silver bullet for reform."

The new federal cost report, prepared by government statisticians, deliberately steered clear of policy recommendations. But its authors warned of a growing possibility "that we will have to make important sacrifices to pay for healthcare" and a need for "constant assessment of the value we associate with our healthcare investment."

Core healthcare costs such as hospital care and doctors' services are expected to rise at relatively modest rates of 6% to 7% a year over the coming decade, the report found. The problem, according to the authors, is that those rates are 1 to 2 percentage points higher than the growth forecast for the overall economy.

"That is a very significant point," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, an advocacy group that supports coverage for the nearly 47 million people in America who are uninsured. "As healthcare spending increases faster than earnings, it means more and more people will find healthcare unaffordable and join the ranks of the uninsured and underinsured."

The report also marks the first time that such long-range cost estimates take into account the Medicare prescription benefit launched last year. The benefit is administered through private insurers — a feature that many Democrats consider wasteful, arguing that Medicare could get lower prices by negotiating directly with drug companies.

The report's verdict on the drug benefit was mixed.

Overall, it found that the private plans had done a good job of obtaining discounts from manufacturers, helping hold down spending growth even as more seniors were buying medications. But it also found that Medicare's discounts are not as deep as those available under the Medicaid program, which does not rely on private intermediaries.

More significantly, the report found that the Medicare drug benefit has led to a dramatic shift in who pays the bill for drugs. Government is now picking up about 40% of the national tab, compared with 28% in 2005, before the benefit went into effect. That could become a problem because the prescription program lacks its own stable source of long-term financing.

"As the nation moves from more traditional sources of insurance … to more federal and state-provided healthcare, we will continue to face tough questions about how we finance our healthcare bill," said John A. Poisal, the report's lead author.

Roberts Launches Opposition To Bush's Health-care Proposals (WE)

By John Hanna

The Wichita Eagle, February 21, 2007

TOPEKA - Republican Sen. Pat Roberts is working with a Democratic colleague to block some of President Bush's budget proposals for social services, suggesting those recommendations could amount to "rationing health care."

The Kansas senator said Monday that he doubts Bush's proposals enjoy much support, so he would like Congress to avoid a lengthy back-and-forth before providing additional funds for the Medicare and Medicaid programs. He's most concerned about payments to hospitals that provide services to the programs' participants.

Bush's proposals are designed to save $76 billion over five years in Medicare, the program that provides medical services for the elderly. They also would trim $25 billion from Medicaid, the medical program for low-income people. They've already received strong criticism from Democrats.

Roberts was in Topeka to discuss health care issues with the chief executives of 15 northeast Kansas hospitals. His visit was among a week's worth of events scheduled statewide.

He and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., are drafting a letter to the White House and the chairman and ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, asking them to protect hospital payments.

"Health care programs are under a lot of pressure," Roberts said after meeting with the hospital chief executives. "What we end up doing is basically rationing health care, and that's not right."

Roberts said he anticipates 20 to 30 senators will sign his letter to the White House and the Budget Committee leaders. He said he doesn't want the debate this year to follow the pattern of previous budget debates.

DOJ_NMG_0134660

"We usually discuss this for a full year in a session of Congress, and then we come up with an emergency supplemental," he said. "My goal will try to be to not go through that and to restore the funding."

He said squeezing Medicare and Medicaid can lead to more costs. For example, he said, if Congress reduces the number of people who receive rehab services after a serious accident, some end up back in the hospital.

Employer Groups Take Aim At Part Of Medical-leave Law (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Employer groups are trying to persuade the Bush administration to restrict the illnesses that qualify under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) and make it less tempting for workers to take sporadic time off under the law.

Passed in 1993, the FMLA requires businesses with at least 50 employees to give 12 weeks' unpaid leave to workers for the birth or adoption of a child or in the case of their own or a close family member's sickness.

Employers say they have no qualms with the portion of the law that allows employees leave to care for a new child.

Rather, they claim that weaknesses in the law and the regulations handed down since it was passed have spawned rampant abuse by shirkers and headaches for managers in charge of approving and tracking leave.

"This isn't about taking away FMLA rights to mothers and newborns. But there are a lot of areas where there are challenges and we think it needs to be looked at," the director of government affairs for the Society of Human Resource Management, Mike Aitken, said. The group is one of about 50 employer organizations, including the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, that have formed the National Coalition to Protect Family Leave to petition the Department of Labor to change the FMLA.

More than 50 million Americans have taken advantage of FMLA protections in the 14 years since it was passed. But the business community has long opposed aspects of the law. Parts of the act have been litigated scores of times and stricken down by courts, including the Supreme Court.

This latest push by employers to modify the FMLA comes on the heels of a Department of Labor (DoL) request in December for public comment on the law and just after Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), one of its original architects, introduced a bill Feb. 1 to expand the act. His legislation would ensure six weeks' paid leave under the FMLA, to be funded by the federal government, the employer and the employee.

Last month's DoL request for comments on the FMLA sparked worries among proponents that the administration would water down the act.

"We have significant concerns that this is a first step in a process that will lead to a substantial weakening in the FMLA protections," Jocelyn Samuels, vice president in charge of education and employment at the National Women's Law Center, said.

The comment period ended on Friday, Feb. 16. The DoL said it would review the more than 100 comments filed in the coming weeks but said it wasn't wedded to proposing any changes.

"The next step for us is to review the record. Whether that results in a rule or a proposed rule I do not know and it would be very premature to suggest that that will happen at this point," the assistant secretary of the department's Employment Standards Administration, Victoria Lipnic, insisted.

One major beef employers have with the law is a 1996 DoL regulation that qualifies a host of minor illness for FMLA protection that they believe should be addressed by companies' regular sick leave policies.

Under the rule, earaches, upset stomachs or common colds meet the criteria for a "serious health condition" under the FMLA as long as the worker is incapacitated for at least three consecutive days and is following a treatment regimen, such as taking prescription drugs.

Another big gripe is unplanned, intermittent leave, which employers complain wreaks havoc on production schedules. Workers may use FMLA leave sporadically throughout the year and without advance warning as long as they have a doctor's note on file certifying a chronic condition. The widespread use of such leave has fed the suspicion among employers that workers are abusing the system.

DOJ_NMG_0134661

"It's 'Oh, I want to go fishing' or 'Oh, the Yankees are in town today,'" the director of human resources policy at the NAM, Jason Straczewski, said. He added that NAM's members had no problem with workers taking intermittent leave for a serious medical condition or for scheduled treatment such as chemotherapy.

To crack down on any abuse of intermittent leave, employer groups want to increase the increments of time with which workers can take leave under FMLA. A DoL regulation currently forces businesses to account for leave "to the shortest period of time that the employer's payroll system uses," which can be as small as six minutes for some businesses.

Employers argue this invites absenteeism and tardiness. Increasing the increment "might require the individual to really think, 'Is this really a situation that should prevent me from going to work?'" Aitken argued.

Employer groups also want the DoL to require workers to update their medical certification for intermittent leave periodically, permit managers to contact an employee's doctor about a chronic condition and streamline the paperwork required to comply with the law.

They said they are trying to improve, rather than dismantle, the law.

"We are not trying to repeal this law. We are not trying to gut the regulations. What we are seeking is clarity and simplicity," the director of labor law policy at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Marc Freedman, said.

Bush Friends, Loyal And Texan, Remain A Force (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Israel Hernandez was a fresh-faced college graduate from the Texas border town of Eagle Pass in the summer of 1993 when he landed a job in Dallas as the personal aide to the part-owner of the Texas Rangers George W. Bush.

Together, they spent months driving the dusty back roads of the Lone Star State to promote the team, Mr. Hernandez behind the wheel of Mr. Bush's Lincoln Town Car.

"He would speak to a rotary or chamber and say, 'You need to come to the ballpark and we'll make it Athens, Texas, Day. We'll put you in your own special section; we can say 'Welcome Athens, Texas,' on the big screen; you can come to batting practice, '' Mr. Hernandez recalled.

Today, after nearly 14 years in Mr. Bush's employ, with a short break to get a master's degree, Mr. Hernandez, 37, travels the world promoting free trade as an assistant secretary of commerce. From his sun-drenched corner office, with its sweeping view of the Washington Monument, he can sit at his desk and watch the presidential helicopter, Marine One, ferry around the man to whom he owes his career.

"In many ways," Mr. Hernandez said of Mr. Bush, "I feel like I have grown up with him."

He is not the only one. Six years into Mr. Bush's presidency, the corps of loyal Texans who accompanied him to Washington from Austin remains a powerful force inside the administration, a steady source of comfort for an increasingly isolated president. No matter how grim the polls or dire the news in Iraq, they have stood by Mr. Bush — and been rewarded with plum jobs — as their lives have grown increasingly intertwined with one another's and with his.

"We've gotten married, gotten remarried, had babies," said Margaret Spellings, who was a single mother with two children when she followed Mr. Bush to Washington and has since been promoted from a domestic policy adviser to secretary of education. "I remember the Bush twins when they were just little squirts."

To hear these people talk about the president is to meet a man many Americans have either forgotten or no longer recognize. Their George W. Bush is the compassionate conservative who helped soften the harsh image of the Republican Party, a man who chokes up at going-away parties, as he did last year for Andrew H. Card Jr., his departing chief of staff; a man unafraid of giving promotions to openly gay people, as he did with Mr. Hernandez, and who always remembers to ask how the family is.

"There's a lot of devotion to George Bush the person," said Clay Johnson, a prep school buddy of Mr. Bush who is now a deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget.

DOJ_NMG_0134662

Like another Bush devotee, the first President Bush, these Texans are increasingly angry at criticism leveled at him. Karen Hughes, the communications adviser who famously went back to Texas when her teenage son grew homesick but has since returned as an under secretary of state, says she is tired of seeing Mr. Bush treated as a "caricature."

Mr. Johnson says the most painful accusation is hearing Mr. Bush called a liar.

"I said, 'How in the world can you be considered a liar by some?' " Mr. Johnson said, recounting a conversation with Mr. Bush. "I mean, there are bumper stickers about lying. It's just incredible.' And he said, 'Well, you've just got to get used to it. Because that's what we have here.' "

Every president has his kitchen cabinet, the intimate and informal circle of friends and advisers who typically wind up with high-placed jobs. John F. Kennedy installed his brother Robert at the Justice Department. Ronald Reagan brought Edwin Meese III and Michael K. Deaver from California. Jimmy Carter had the so-called Georgia Mafia: Jody Powell, Hamilton Jordan and Bert Lance.

But in a White House that prizes loyalty, the Texans stand out, in number, influence and discretion. Those who have left remain supportive even if they have been nudged out the door, as in the case of Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel.

"Loyalty and friendship" is one explanation, said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, who has spent 13 years — nearly his entire adult life — with Mr. Bush. Another explanation, Mr. Bartlett said, is the war in Iraq, which "lengthened a lot of people's stay."

Scholars say Mr. Bush has been more strategic than most presidents in sprinkling loyalists throughout the administration. Paul C. Light, an expert in public service at New York University, says it has created an "echo chamber" in which the president gets advice he wants to hear.

"It's like these are George Bush's political children that he's raised from infancy," Mr. Light said. "They're incredibly loyal, and they're also likely to tell him what he thinks, and that's what we've seen as the big weakness in this administration."

The Texans, not surprisingly, disagree; they say their closeness to Mr. Bush frees them to be candid.

Mr. Bartlett, 35, knows the president better than most. His job during Mr. Bush's first campaign for Texas governor was to research the candidate's background, and he is today a kind of walking presidential biographer, with details crammed into his brain of Mr. Bush's triumphs but also his travails, including his National Guard Service and his arrest for drunken driving in 1976.

"I dealt with him directly at a very young age," Mr. Bartlett said. "I don't even think twice about telling him what I think."

The Texas circle includes three cabinet officials — Ms. Spellings, the education secretary; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez; and Alphonso R. Jackson, the secretary of housing and urban development — as well as some of the best-known names in Washington: Karl Rove, the chief political strategist, Mr. Bartlett and Ms. Hughes.

There are also lesser-knowns. Mr. Johnson, the deputy budget director, met Mr. Bush in 1961 at Phillips Academy in Andover, Mass., when they were two 15-year-olds far from home. Mr. Johnson later ran the governor's personnel office in Austin; in Washington, he keeps a George Bush doll on his desk and is one of the few people in town to have had the Bushes at his home for dinner, motorcade, Secret Service and all.

Gordon D. Johndroe, once a $5-an-hour college intern in Austin, is today the chief spokesman for the National Security Council. Mr. Johndroe learned the art of dealing with reporters by literally sitting at the president's knee on the floor of the eight-seat Bush campaign plane in 2000, monitoring the governor's interviews.

"My job," he said, "was, 'Let us know if he makes any news. Let Karen know or call back to Dan Bartlett, who was in Austin.' And I was able to do that because I had listened to him speak so much. I knew when he said something new."

Among the benefits to being an old Texas friend of the president is access: the invitations to Camp David, to dinner and movies at the White House, to Mr. Bush's annual July 4 birthday bash. Ms. Hughes remains a regular dinner companion, most recently at a small White House gathering for Vaclav Havel, the former president of the Czech Republic.

Among the downsides is being ridiculed as a crony. Ms. Miers, who met Mr. Bush when she ran the Texas Bar Association, was excoriated by lawmakers who deemed her unqualified when Mr. Bush nominated her to the Supreme Court. Still, she calls her association with the president "one of the great blessings of my life."

DOJ_NMG_0134663

Mr. Hernandez, who is so close to the Bushes that he moved in with them in Dallas after his apartment was burglarized, has been the subject of news articles suggesting that the president dubbed him Altoids Boy, a reference to his duties dispensing Altoids mints to Mr. Bush during their Texas travels.

"I hate that," Mr. Hernandez said. "He doesn't call me Altoids Boy. He calls me Izzy."

Two years ago, the online edition of The New Republic, a liberal magazine, singled out Mr. Hernandez as a member of the Bush "hackocracy."

But sitting in his corner office the other day, recounting his travel this past year to Peru, China, Vietnam and Panama, Mr. Hernandez — who in his Department of Commerce job supervises 1,600 employees in 80 countries — had the final word.

Mr. Bush, he said, is simply giving him an opportunity to show what he can do.

"Everyone has their own journey, their own story," he said. "I feel like I climbed this mountain with the president, and I'm getting a chance."

Swift Action Promised At Walter Reed (WP)

By Dana Priest And Anne Hull, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Investigations Urged as Army Moves to Make Repairs, Improve Staffing

The White House and congressional leaders called yesterday for swift investigation and repair of the problems plaguing outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, as veterans groups and members of Congress in both parties expressed outrage over substandard housing and the slow, dysfunctional bureaucracy there.

Top Army officials yesterday visited Building 18, the decrepit former hotel housing more than 80 recovering soldiers, outside the gates of the medical center. Army Secretary Francis Harvey and Vice Chief of Staff Richard Cody toured the building and spoke to soldiers as workers in protective masks stripped mold from the walls and tore up soiled carpets.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow said that he spoke with President Bush yesterday about Walter Reed and that the president told him: "Find out what the problem is and fix it."

Snow said Bush "first learned of the troubling allegations regarding Walter Reed from the stories this weekend in The Washington Post. He is deeply concerned and wants any problems identified and fixed." The spokesman said he did not know why the president, who has visited the facility many times in the past five years, had not heard about these problems before.

Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, said in an interview that the Army leadership had assured him that all the staff increases he had requested would be met. "This is not an issue," he said. "This is their number one priority."

He said the Army has agreed to fund what he called a "surge plan" that has been designed for the likelihood that the 21,500-person troop increase underway in Iraq will result in more casualties.

Weightman said case managers have been ordered to call each of the 700 outpatients to ask about problems they may be encountering. He has also put half a dozen senior enlisted officers from the hospital in charge of the outpatients' companies normally in the hands of lower-level platoon sergeants. Also, a medic will be stationed 24 hours a day at the Mologne House, the largest residence on the 113-acre post, to help soldiers with medical or psychological problems.

Harvey said he was surprised and disappointed by the conditions and the bureaucratic delays. "In the warrior ethos, the last line says you should never leave a fallen comrade, and from that facility point of view we didn't live up to it . . . and it looks to me we may have not lived up to it from a process side," he said, adding that conditions at the building are "inexcusable."

"It's a failure . . . in the garrison leadership . . . that should have never happened, and we are quickly going to rectify that situation," he said.

"We had some NCOs [noncommissioned officers] who weren't doing their job, period," Harvey said. He said he and Cody will report regularly to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates on a plan to fix the conditions.

The Post series documented tattered conditions at Building 18, including mold, rot, mice and cockroaches, but also a larger bureaucratic indifference that has impeded some soldiers' recovery.

At Building 18 yesterday, platoon sergeants with clipboards went from room to room inspecting for mold, leaks and other problems. A broken elevator was repaired, and snow and ice were cleared from the sidewalks.

DOJ_NMG_0134664

The secretaries of the Army and Navy announced that they had begun a broader review of Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center and that an independent review group will be formed to investigate outpatient care and administrative processes. Walter Reed is set to close in 2011, and the naval facility in Bethesda will be expanded to handle the additional wounded.

Walter Reed's fixes are unlikely to immediately quiet the criticism from members of Congress, who received a flood of calls from the public and veterans groups asking how the problems could have been unknown to officials -- some of whom regularly visit Walter Reed.

"We need to bring the Army people in and say, 'What the hell is going on?' " said Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Veterans Affairs Committee.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) asked the House Armed Services Committee to investigate outpatient care at Walter Reed. "The treatment reported in The Post of our troops and our veterans is disgraceful," Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Several senators, including presidential candidate Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former presidential candidate John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), announced they are co-sponsoring legislation to simplify the paperwork process for recovering soldiers and increase case managers and psychological counselors. The bill would also require the Army to report more regularly to Congress and the inspector general about the living conditions of injured soldiers.

Jeff Miller (Fla.), the ranking Republican on the House Veterans' Affairs subcommittee on health, said: "The neglect being experienced by some wounded service members is outrageous. The Defense Department is never shy about asking for supplemental funds for operations and equipment; I cannot imagine why housing for recuperating wounded would not be a similarly high priority."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), former chairman of what was then known as the House Government Reform Committee, urged the committee to hold a hearing at Walter Reed to give members an "invaluable firsthand look" at how the Army is processing the wounded. "Improvements to date have been episodic, and in some case, short-lived," Davis said in a statement.

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson contributed to this report.

Leadership Blamed For Shabby Army Hospital Building (CNN)

CNN, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Army Secretary Francis Harvey blamed a failure of leadership for substandard conditions in a building that is part of Walter Reed Army Medical Center and vowed Tuesday to move quickly to fix the problem.

"We failed here, we failed in having a facility like this," Harvey told CNN. "Unfortunately, it's a leadership problem."

Inside Building 18, used for outpatients who suffered wounds in Iraq and Afghanistan, workers were repairing plumbing, covering holes in ceilings and repainting mold-covered walls. (Watch a tour of the run-down facility)

Harvey said he learned about the conditions in the building, a former hotel where some soldiers have been recuperating for more than a year and a half, on Sunday, when the Washington Post broke the story.

"If we would have known about this, we would have fixed it," he said. "Unfortunately, we didn't know about it."

The article, titled "The Other Walter Reed," said some outpatients at the facility include veterans who suffer from depression and were involved in overdoses and suicide attempts.

Walter Reed is the Army's top medical facility. It opened in 1901 in a single small building and now is a complex of structures with 28 acres of floor space.

The hospital can accommodate 250 patients and admits more than 14,000 a year. Thousands use its outpatient facilities daily.

President Bush has been seen visiting wounded troops at the hospital several times, and presidents often receive medical care there.

The Base Realignment and Closure Commission in 2005 recommended closing Walter Reed in 2010.

Harvey said an "action plan" was being put together "to ensure across the board that our soldiers are being taken care of with the highest quality medicine possible in the kind of facilities that provide a quality of life for the soldier that is equal to the quality of their service."

DOJ_NMG_0134665

He added, "To have it in this condition is disappointing to me, unacceptable to me as the secretary of the Army, and we have a plan in place."

Walter Reed Probes Former Aid Director (KCS/AP)

The Kansas City Star/AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - Walter Reed Army Medical Center is investigating the former head of a program that aids injured soldiers.

The probe involves the activities of Michael J. Wagner, who until last month ran the Army's Medical Family Assistance Center, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said Tuesday. The center links businesses, charities and other donors with wounded troops who need financial help or with families strained by living costs, air fares and other expenses when they come to Washington to visit or help care for injured soldiers.

The Washington Post - citing documents and interviews with current and former assistance center staff members - said Wagner was seeking funders and soliciting donations for a Dallas charity at the same time he administered the Army program.

Wagner is now a director of the Texas-based charity, the Military, Veteran and Family Assistance Foundation, a nonprofit group that provides services and resources for veterans and their families.

He could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday at the foundation office.

The Post said that in a telephone interview Wagner denied he had solicited funds for the charity or made contact with donors during office hours. "It's just not true," he was quoted as saying. "I intentionally stayed out of that. I couldn't do that. I couldn't do both."

Wagner said the charity was founded by his brother and that he did not officially become its executive director until he left Walter Reed, according to the Post.

The story was the latest in a Post series that also disclosed bureaucratic delays and substandard living conditions endured by some soldiers there as outpatients, as well as problems in receiving benefits.

Democratic Sens. Barbara Mikulski of Maryland and Patty Murray of Washington urged Defense Secretary Robert Gates in a letter Tuesday to launch an inspector general's investigation into what they called the "deplorable living conditions facing returning Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans." They urged him to investigate conditions at the Navy's top hospital - the National Naval Medical Center - in Bethesda, Md.

"If conditions at Walter Reed, the crown jewel of military health care facilities, have degraded to the point where mouse traps are handed out to patients, how can we feel confident that our troops and veterans truly have the care and transition assistance they have been promised at any facility across the country?" the senators wrote.

Two other Democratic senators - presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and freshman Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo. - said they are working on legislation to improve the care of war veterans, including measures designed to improve how they are treated as outpatients while still on active duty. The legislation would require more frequent hospital inspections, establish timelines for repairs to facilities that don't meet standards and improve access to psychological counseling, Obama's office said in a statement.

The Pentagon responded Tuesday by announcing that the Army has begun a review of medical care at Walter Reed and the Navy has undertaken a similar review at its National Naval Medical Center. The Pentagon also said an independent review group would be formed to investigate outpatient and administrative issues at the two military medical centers.

The Pentagon said the reviews would be done "promptly," but it gave no specific timetable.

The problems at Walter Reed also caused a stir at the daily press briefing at the White House, where presidential spokesman Tony Snow deflected all requests for comment to the Pentagon.

"The president is committed to these people, committed to men and women who have served. We need to make sure that whatever problems there are get fixed," he said. "What I'm telling you is, let's sort through the facts."

Snow at first was unable to say how President Bush learned of the problems. Later, he amended the transcript of his briefing with a statement saying Bush first heard of the allegations from the Post stories.

Rotten Homecoming (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134666

IF YOU LISTEN to the PR operation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, the U.S. military's gleaming flagship hospital offers veterans the best treatment available. What doesn't get mentioned is the bureaucratic contempt and physical squalor that too often await badly injured outpatient soldiers on the Walter Reed campus, the subject of a four-month Post investigation detailed in articles published Sunday and Monday.

Reporters Dana Priest and Anne Hull and researcher Julie Tate spent hundreds of hours inspecting conditions and interviewing injured troops and their loved ones at the Walter Reed outpatient facilities. Their findings: Veterans' rooms are rank; bureaucratic hassles and paper-pushing make the process of repairing buildings, redressing patient grievances and providing veterans with basic goods depressingly inept; administrators' neglect of patients' mental and physical health borders on the criminal; and, most distressing, many veterans leave Walter Reed without the compensation they clearly deserve for their sacrifices.

The walls of one soldier's room were covered with black mold, and the ceiling of his shower had a large hole. Soldiers who lost their uniforms while undergoing emergency treatment on the battlefield have had to present their purple hearts to get replacement clothes. Amputees and patients on taxing drug regimens are required to report for formation early in the morning, even if it means trudging over accumulated ice and snow. Lost paperwork, which in one case resulted in an obviously impaired veteran getting an order to report to Germany, is a constant problem, sometimes forcing soldiers and their relatives to live at Walter Reed for 18 months or longer as their cases are processed.

Most infuriating are reports of official efforts to deny disability benefits to discharged fighters. The Army tried to deny disability compensation to Cpl. Dell McLeod, who suffered a head injury that left him aimless and unable even to count change at the cafeteria. Army officials' argument: Because he had done poorly in high school, his current mental state might not have been caused by the steel door that smashed his skull in Iraq. If the Army determined that he was mentally fit to serve in the first place, it cannot now abscond from its responsibility for the consequences of his service overseas. Cpl. McLeod ended up getting a settlement from the command at Walter Reed -- despite base staffers' best efforts -- only after his wife got a congressional staffer involved.

Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, says that conditions on the post will improve rapidly. His response is commendable, and it should not be forgotten that thousands of professionals and volunteers, civilian and military, are working hard to help veterans heal and adjust. But it also should not have taken newspaper articles to bring change to outpatient conditions at Walter Reed. And while filthy conditions at Building 18 are a temporary problem for these veterans, lowball settlements may leave soldiers and their families impoverished for life.

US Deficit Is Shrinking, For Now (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

Despite the ongoing costs of US military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the outlook for the federal budget has grown substantially brighter.

Tax revenues are rising much faster than spending, according to Treasury Department numbers released last week. The recent trend is strong enough that, were it to continue, the budget could move into surplus in barely a year, one economist calculates.

Already, the federal deficit is shrinking toward about half the size that it has averaged since 1970, when analyzed as a percentage of gross domestic product.

The shift reflects a strong economy, with higher incomes and corporate profits generating a bigger flow of tax revenue. In turn, the Treasury's progress could help the economy by buoying investor confidence in the nation's fiscal position.

Although it is a welcome change, the improvement does little to stave off the long-run challenges to the nation's financial health, many economists say. Baby boomers are starting to retire, placing new demands on government. Costs for healthcare programs like Medicare are still projected to rise faster than overall inflation.

DOJ_NMG_0134667

"The picture is getting brighter," and if there's no recession over the next several years "there are going to continue to be some good strides made," says Mark McMullen, a senior economist at Moody's Economy.com in West Chester, Pa. But "it's unlikely that we're going to see a balanced budget anytime in the near or long term."

Some experts say the budget could achieve balance in the short run of the next few years. In unveiling its proposed budget this month, the Bush administration forecast black ink on the federal ledger in 2012. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO), in its recent annual outlook, also shows a surplus for that year.

A year ago, the CBO's forecast for the 2007 fiscal year called for a deficit of $270 billion. In the annual outlook released last month, the 2007 gap is projected at $172 billion.

"Right now, we're in some sense in a relatively good spot," says Jim Horney, a budget analyst at the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal think tank in Washington. "We're in the sixth year of an economic expansion," a time when federal revenues often rise along with a growing economy.

But both the CBO and the White House make important assumptions that are far from assured.

The CBO's annual outlook assumes that President Bush's tax cuts phase out in 2010 as scheduled, thus adding new tax revenues.

Mr. Bush's budget calls for the tax cuts to be made permanent, but foresees a surplus in 2012 thanks to a sharp fall in Iraq spending and robust productivity growth in the economy.

But several issues are unsettled. Among them: How much will military operations in Iraq and elsewhere cost? Will Congress make some of the Bush tax cuts permanent? Will Congress scale back the alternative minimum tax (AMT), which is poised to take a rising tax toll on middle-class Americans in the years ahead?

The answers will have a big impact on the budget, and may not be resolved before a new president takes office in 2009.

The long-term outlook remains sobering, all sides agree. The cost of Medicare, in particular, is slated to soar due to healthcare inflation and an aging population.

Even the near-term outlook comes with an asterisk. When Bush took office in 2001, the CBO was forecasting a decade of budget surpluses totaling more than $5 trillion. Then came a recession, the terrorist attacks of 9/11, and enormous wartime spending. The Bush tax cuts helped to stimulate the economy, but at the cost of lower tax revenue.

"We had three years where revenues went down," says Mr. Horney. "All that has happened is that we have ... caught up from the really bad decline that we had."

Still, analysts say the recent budget gains are good news for the government and the economy.

The budget deficit now stands at about 1.4 percent of the nation's GDP, well below the 2.3 percent that's been the norm since 1970, according to economist Michael Darda of MKM Partners in Greenwich, Conn. "At the current pace, the budget could move back into surplus as early as May 2008," Mr. Darda wrote in a report to clients last week.

That isn't a forecast, but it shows how the nation's fiscal health is closely related to that of the overall economy.

A more stable budget outlook, in turn, has benefits for the economy.

The less money the government has to borrow to pay its bills, the more is left for investment in new goods and services. Alternatively, the nation will be less reliant on foreign lenders to fund that investment – debt that siphons away a portion of national wealth.

"Unexpectedly strong revenue growth" has improved the outlook quite a bit, says Mr. McMullen.

In the CBO projections, for example, the nation's public debt is forecast to fall from 37 percent of GDP in 2006 to 30.5 percent of GDP in 2012.

In the longer run, the rise of entitlements such as Medicare could force difficult choices to keep that debt from rising again.

Conservatives say it will be vital to contain costs. "If nothing changes in Washington then both revenues and spending will be higher," says Chris Edwards, a tax expert at the libertarian Cato Institute in Washington. "It'll hammer the economy," he says, as government takes a larger share of GDP.

Others say the answer will probably involve tax hikes as well as some reductions in promised entitlement benefits – and that a modest increase in taxes need not damage economic growth.

Both sides agree on the need to tame medical inflation, if not on how to do it.

DOJ_NMG_0134668

"If we were able to reduce the growth of the cost of healthcare," says Horney, "that would definitely be good for the economy."

Murtha Sees Security Threat In Trade Deal (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), is calling elements of a Peru free-trade agreement (FTA) signed by the Bush administration a threat to national security. The chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee has warned Democratic leaders on trade that the deal grants a United Arab Emirates company the ability to invest in U.S. ports.

Murtha has asked Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) to demand that the administration alter the free-trade deal it negotiated with Peru to prevent enterprises there from investing in U.S. landside port activities.

If the administration fails to make such changes, Murtha and Rep. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.) charge that a "trade pact-granted right" to invest in U.S. ports would be handed to Dubai Ports World (DPW). The United Arab Emirates-based company last year found itself at the heart of a controversy when the administration gave it the go-ahead to operate several U.S. ports.

Murtha and Taylor argue that the issue is particularly sensitive with the pending Peru FTA because Dubai Ports World has acquired a 30-year concession to develop and operate a new container terminal just outside of Lima. The move makes DPW an enterprise in Peru that under the FTA would be able to make investments in the U.S., according to the congressmen.

Congress seemed set to approve legislation blocking

DPW's ability to take over U.S. ports before the company voluntarily backed out of the deal. DPW last week completed its sale of U.S. ports.

Like other U.S. free-trade agreements, the one with Peru includes a provision allowing the U.S. to block investments if they are considered national-security threats. Murtha and Taylor, however, argue the provision is insufficient since Peru could in turn sue the U.S. under the deal's dispute-settlement system. A successful challenge could cost the U.S. millions in taxpayer dollars, the two congressmen say.

Under the Peru FTA, a dispute could be brought either to a World Trade Organization panel, or to a tribunal set up under the Peru FTA that would consist of one U.S. national, a Peruvian national and a national from a third country.

"Members of Congress again will be asked to support these agreements relying on the hope that a foreign tribunal deigns to permit us to justify our violation of the agreements by accepting our claim of an Essential Security Exception," Murtha and Taylor wrote in a letter last month to Rangel and Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), the chairman of the Ways and Means Trade subcommittee.

"It is unconscionable to knowingly agree to any trade agreement that contains obligations that limit our national security authority regarding sensitive infrastructure such as our ports," the letter said.

A Ways and Means spokesman noted that Rangel and Levin raised the same questions during debate over the U.S.-Oman free-trade deal last summer, and said Rangel and Levin would stay in touch with Murtha and Taylor on the issue. A Levin spokeswoman went further and said Levin's view is that the landside port provision needs to be changed in the Peru deal.

So far this year, public discussions between House Democrats and the administration on the Peru FTA and a similar deal with Colombia have centered on labor provisions. For example, Rangel and Levin did not raise the ports issue with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab during a hearing on trade policy last week.

The ports issue nearly sank the generally uncontroversial Oman deal. The Republican-controlled House approved the Oman FTA in a 221–205 vote, with only 22 Democrats voting in favor.

During the Oman debate, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative argued that under the "essential security" provision in U.S. trade deals, nothing in a deal can prevent the country from applying measures it deems necessary for protecting essential security. USTR also emphasized that this essential-security exception is self-judging, meaning that the validity of the defense in a trade dispute before an international tribunal would be based on what the U.S. government considers necessary to protect essential security, rather than the conclusions of a tribunal.

DOJ_NMG_0134669

"This is really a red herring," said USTR spokesman Sean Spicer, adding that USTR has worked to educate members about the essential-security provision since the Oman debate. USTR also has noted that those participating in landside port activities do not control, manage or operate a U.S. port. Landside port activities include operating and maintaining docks and loading and unloading vessels.

Rangel, Levin, then-Rep. and current Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.) and Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) last year asked the administration to clarify how this self-judging interpretation was consistent with trade deals the administration has pursued. They noted the essential-security exception could be challenged in dispute settlement under the Peru FTA, and that World Trade Organization panels have suggested they could interpret whether the use of this exception was valid.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

About-face

Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland said he would welcome Iraqi refugees to Ohio, a change of course from comments the governor made last week. He said the earlier remarks were meant to express frustration with President Bush instead of the people displaced by the war.

The Democrat told the Associated Press last week he was not inclined to accommodate any refugees because doing so would help bail out the president.

"I am sympathetic to the plight of the innocent Iraqi people who have fled that country," he said. "However, I would not want to ask Ohioans to accept a greater burden than they already have borne for the Bush administration's failed policies."

On Monday, he said he had been attempting to express his frustration with the Bush administration and the Iraq war, which he opposed when he was serving in the U.S. House.

"It's one of those incidents out of many [when] I've said something inartfully and conveyed something that I did not wish to convey," said Mr. Strickland, who was elected Nov. 7 and sworn in last month. "I guess it means that when you're a governor, people seem to be interested in what you say, which is fine, but I think everything has a context."

Mr. Strickland's initial comments were in reaction to an administration plan to allow about 7,000 Iraqi refugees to settle in the United States over the next year.

Johnson's move

More than two months after suffering a brain hemorrhage, Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota Democrat, has left a Washington hospital and entered a private rehabilitation facility, his office said yesterday.

A spokeswoman refused to say whether the senator remained in Washington or was moved to a facility in South Dakota, citing family concerns about press scrutiny. "They just want him to focus on getting better and not worried about outside cameras snapping away," spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said.

Mr. Johnson's brain hemorrhage Dec. 13 and subsequent surgery highlighted his party's tenuous one-seat advantage in the Senate.

Mr. Johnson was rushed to George Washington University Hospital after becoming disoriented during a phone call with reporters and underwent emergency surgery hours later. He was diagnosed with arteriovenous malformation, a condition that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst.

Mr. Johnson will continue undergoing physical, occupational and speech therapy at the private facility. Dr. Philip Marion, the chief of rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, said the senator has made "great progress" and a final test showed no evidence the tangled arteries that triggered the senator's hemorrhage remain.

Mr. Johnson's office has said his recovery is expected to take several months, though he has been doing some work from his bed.

McCain's outreach

Republican presidential candidate Sen. John McCain is defending his outreach to conservative Christians, arguing that his effort is not political pandering to win the party's nomination.

DOJ_NMG_0134670

The Arizona senator met privately Monday with religious broadcasters in Orlando, Fla., then answered questions about his appeal to conservatives in Vero Beach.

In the 2000 campaign, Mr. McCain angered the party's right by calling evangelist leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance." Last spring, he spoke at Mr. Falwell's Liberty University, although hard feelings still linger among some conservatives. Focus on the Family founder James Dobson has said he won't support Mr. McCain.

"Nobody accused me of courting and pandering to the liberals when I went to the New School," Mr. McCain told the crowd, a reference to the New York City school. "What I have found out in my life, is that every time I have done something for political reasons and not the right reasons, I have paid a very heavy price for it -- a big price."

Mr. McCain said he is trying to reach out to all elements of the party.

"I don't know which part of the party is going to be more influential or not," he said. "I've tried always in my political career to have a big-tent party, where a lot of people are welcome with differing views."

Backing Rumsfeld

The White House yesterday defended Donald H. Rumsfeld after criticism from Republican Sen. John McCain that he was one of the worst defense secretaries in history for his handling of the Iraq war.

Mr. McCain, one of President Bush's key allies in Congress on Iraq, is running for president.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," the Arizona senator and Vietnam War veteran said on the campaign trail in South Carolina on Monday.

The White House backed Mr. Rumsfeld, but was careful not to criticize Mr. McCain in doing so.

"We think Donald Rumsfeld was an enormously consequential and effective secretary of defense and somebody who led to the transformation of the Department of Defense. Senator McCain holds a different point of view," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

A day after Republicans lost control of Congress in elections in November in large part owing to concerns about the Iraq war, Mr. Bush accepted Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation and replaced him with Robert M. Gates.

"The thing that's important to us right now is that Senator McCain is a strong supporter of the president's position on the way forward in Iraq and somebody who has been an eloquent voice and a reliable leader on the issue. And we appreciate it," Mr. Snow said.

Asked if Mr. McCain's comments should be chalked up to election politics, Mr. Snow replied: "I left the chalk at home."

Mitt's introduction

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney this week will air his first presidential campaign ad to introduce himself to voters in several early-voting states, the Associated Press reports.

The 60-second spot describes the Republican candidate as a "business legend" who "rescued the Olympics" and "turned around a Democratic state."

Mr. Romney himself adds: "This is not a time for more talk and dithering in Washington. It's a time for action."

The ad is set to air starting today. It will rotate between Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Michigan and Florida.

It is the first ad by a top-tier contender in a campaign analysts think will cost more than $1 billion by the time it ends in November 2008.

A fellow Republican, Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, staging a long-shot bid for the presidency, aired the first ad of either major party in December with a limited buy in South Carolina, North Carolina and South Dakota.

Greg Pierce can be reached at 202/636-3285 or gpierce@washingtontimes.com.

VA Regains Access To Medical Records (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

The Defense Department is once again permitting Department of Veterans Affairs doctors to get full medical records they say they need to treat severely injured troops arriving at VA hospitals from Iraq and Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0134671

Pentagon officials cut off VA's access on Jan. 23, concluding that privacy concerns and federal regulations barred the department from using the military's Joint Patient Tracking Application system without a formal data-sharing agreement.

VA physicians, who handle troops with brain and other serious injuries at four trauma centers, strongly protested the cutoff, saying that they rely on the tracking system to help them determine the best treatment for the wounded.

Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee, and ranking Republican Larry E. Craig (Idaho) wrote Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel David S.C. Chu on Feb. 6 that they were "deep[ly] concerned" the VA doctors had been cut off.

The Pentagon on Thursday declined to comment on the situation when we called, and the senators had received no response.

On Friday, VA officials notified the senators that access to the tracking system had been restored. Akaka and Craig said they were pleased the problem had been resolved. So, most likely, is everyone else.GOP Supporter Faces Terrorism Charges

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) said yesterday that it will donate to charity the $15,000 it received in recent years from Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari if Alishtari is convicted of assisting terrorists.

Alishtari, a.k.a. Michael Mixon, pleaded not guilty in federal court in Manhattan on Friday to charges of terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering, among other things.

Alishtari, on a Web rÃ©sumÃ© he apparently posted this year, says he was named to the NRCC's "White House Business Advisory Committee" and was named the NRCC's New York state businessman of the year in 2002 and 2003.

He was indicted in a plan to send $152,000 to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support a terrorist training camp, the Associated Press reported. And he was accused of funneling $25,000 from a bank account in New York to an account in Montreal, allegedly to support terrorists.

"We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges," NRCC communications director Jessica Boulanger said in a statement -- or understatement -- "but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward." He's a businessman in New York, after all, not some guy in Guantanamo. "If the individual in question is found guilty of a crime," Boulanger said, "it is our intent to donate the money to charity."

In most cases, political contributions from controversial sources are often returned to donors, but obviously it wouldn't do to return the money to someone charged with helping fund terrorists. Never know where the money might end up.Author, Author!

Seems Robert Andrews, deputy undersecretary of defense for counterintelligence, former Green Beret and former CIA officer, has his own after-hours job. Andrews, it turns out, is a novelist and, we're reliably informed, an excellent one.

None other than publisher Otto Penzler, owner of the Mysterious Bookshop in Manhattan and the first and last word on American mystery books, last week notified Andrews that his short story "Solomon's Alley" had been picked for inclusion in the 11th volume of Houghton Mifflin's Best American Mystery Stories 2007, to be published in October.

Penzler says he picked about 50 stories from around 1,500 submitted. All were published in 2006. Then Miami Herald columnist Carl Hiaasen, mega-best-selling author of some of the funniest novels ever written, selected the final 20.

Andrews is the author of four novels dealing with the spy business and three detective mystery stories set in the District. One involves the murder of a Washington Post diplomatic reporter.Will Bolton Tell All?

Speaking of authors, John Bolton's tell-all book on his days at the State Department and as ambassador to the United Nations could be coming out as early as the end of this year.

All right, maybe not a classic "tell-all" -- perhaps just a "tell-some" -- but top folks in Foggy Bottom and at the United Nations are most surely not going to be happy when this one comes out. The buzz is that it's going to focus mostly on Bolton's work at the United Nations, where he's said to be still upset at his inability to lop off 10 of the building's 38 floors that he had said were expendable. The book is likely to rank the floors in order of those most expendable.

Unclear how Bolton will treat his most recent bosses, Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice. His view of Rice may have altered a bit after last week's agreement with North Korea on its nuclear program, an agreement Bolton and other conservatives have criticized as "a bad deal." There are others at State sure to come in for their share of abuse.

No working title yet and no publisher, although several have expressed interest. But if this is to come out before Christmas, he'd better get typing.

DOJ_NMG_0134672

Johnson Update (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

More than two months after suffering a brain hemorrhage, Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) has left a Washington hospital and entered a private rehabilitation facility, his office said yesterday.

A spokeswoman refused to say whether the senator remained in Washington or was moved to a facility in South Dakota, citing family concerns about media scrutiny.

The Democrat's Dec. 13 brain hemorrhage and subsequent surgery highlighted his party's tenuous one-seat advantage in the Senate.

Johnson will continue to undergo physical, occupational and speech therapy at the private facility. Philip Marion, chief of rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, where Johnson had been treated, said in a statement released by Johnson's office that the senator has made "great progress" and that a final test showed no evidence that the tangle of veins and arteries that triggered the senator's hemorrhage remains.

Johnson's office has said his recovery is expected to take several months, though he has been doing some work from his bed.

More And More, Retirees Are Finding That It Pays To Have Worked For The Government Instead Of The Private Sector (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, February 21, 2007

Johnnie Nichols, a civilian Defense Department employee, contributes to a federal pension that will let him retire at age 56, after 32 years of service.

His wife, Kimberly, a math teacher at a private business college, has no pension after two decades of teaching and running a horse farm. Their marriage reflects the new world of retirement: government employees who have secure benefits and private workers who increasingly are on their own.

"If we were both in her shoes, we'd be in a world of hurt," says Nichols, 45, an information technology manager in Middletown, Ind. "We wouldn't be able to retire until age 67."

As the first wave of 79 million baby boomers heads to retirement, the nation is dividing into two classes of workers: those who have government benefits and those who don't. The gap is accelerating in every way: pensions, medical benefits, retirement ages.

Retired government workers are twice as likely to get a pension as their counterparts in the private sector, and the typical benefit is far more generous. The nation's 6 million retired civil servants — teachers, police, administrators, laborers — received a median benefit of $17,640 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service. Eleven million private-sector retirees covered by traditional pensions got $7,692.

Governments' generosity could have serious consequences for taxpayers and pensioners. Some states — including Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, New Jersey, Ohio and West Virginia — have troubled retirement systems that may require huge tax increases, spending cuts or even defaulting on promised benefits. The U.S. government has a bigger unfunded liability for military and civil servant retirement benefits ($4.7 trillion) than it does for Social Security ($4.6 trillion).

The pension gap will continue to widen because governments pump far more money into employee pensions than companies do. Civil servants earn an average of $12.38 an hour in benefits, about $5 an hour more than private-sector workers, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The difference was just $2.70 an hour in 1995.

Pension promises have "gotten out of hand," says Peter Hanson, 73, chairman of NAI James E. Hanson Inc., a real estate firm in Hackensack, N.J. His firm offers a healthy private pension — up to 25% of compensation, given to employee retirement accounts — but it is tied to profits and given as a lump sum, not a lifetime promise of benefits.

Supporters of government pensions say the decline in private pensions is the problem, not the generosity of public retirement plans. "Rather than lower the bar for public employees, we need to stabilize retirement programs for everyone," says

DOJ_NMG_0134673

Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, a union with 1.4 million members.

He acknowledges public pensions are getting more scrutiny. "People want to know, 'Why should you have more security than us?' " he says. "It's pension envy."

State and local governments have sweetened retirement benefits during the past decade at a time when corporations have soured on them because of their cost. Only 18% of private workers now have traditional defined benefit pension plans, compared with more than 80% of government employees.

Contrary to a widely held notion, the extra government benefits aren't compensation for lower pay. Most government workers are paid more than private employees in similar jobs, and the wage gap is growing.

A typical full-time state or local government worker made $78,853 in wages and benefits in the third quarter of 2006, $25,771 more than a typical private-sector worker, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports. The difference was $7,604 in 2000. The compensation advantage holds true for all types of public workers, from teachers to laborers and managers. Better benefits for government workers is the biggest reason for the growing compensation gap.

"The government is in direct competition with us for employees. It's hard to compete against these benefit packages," says James Bellis, owner of Tree Tech, a 120-worker tree trimming company in Randolph, N.J. His company has a 401(k) plan that matches up to 2% of employee pay.

By comparison, tree trimmers working for a government in New Jersey would get a pension benefit worth more than three times that.

Superior retirement benefits for civil servants can be traced to the establishment of Social Security, which originally did not cover government employees, says E.J. McMahon, a pension expert at the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank that deals with economic policy. Today, three-fourths of government workers participate in Social Security, but their overall benefits have not been reduced accordingly, he says.

The boost in benefits since the 1960s reflects the rising power of public employee unions, which have thrived as industrial labor unions and the benefits they won have eroded, he says.

The growing benefit gap makes government an increasingly attractive employer.

Anneliese Crosby, 46, who codes medical records at a private hospital in Manchester, N.H., is trying to get a government job for financial reasons — better pay, benefits and job security. The hospital recently ended its pension plan for new employees. That didn't affect Crosby, but her retirement depends mostly on contributions to her tax-deferred retirement account.

"It's scary. I feel like I need a second job or to be on the lookout for a new job," she says. "I should put more in my retirement account, but I can't afford it."

Her solution: Apply for a similar job at a Veterans Affairs hospital. She'd get a pay raise, better benefits and a secure future. "My ex-husband keeps encouraging me to get a government job, and he's right about that," she says.

Pensions for civil servants often are superior to private pensions in subtle ways that make a huge financial difference. For example, government pensions:

•Generally base benefits on a worker's top three earning years. Private pensions typically base benefits on the top five years of pay, which lowers the average.

•Often let retirees add the value of overtime, unused leave and other benefits into the pension formula. The results can be extreme. Dover, N.H., Police Chief William Fenniman, 46, added more than $200,000 for severance, sick leave and other payouts into his three-year salary average when he retired in January. This will boost his retirement benefit to as much as $125,000 a year, more than he made as chief.

•Permit early retirement at age 50 or 55 with less of a benefit reduction than private pensions.

•Provide free or subsidized medical care for retirees under age 65 and supplemental coverage after that for those on Medicare.

•More often provide automatic cost-of-living increases to benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0134674

Baby boomer retirements will force governments to confront the rising costs of civil servant benefits. The U.S. government's unfunded retirement obligation grew $200 billion last year to $4.7 trillion. That's the amount the government would need today, set aside and earning investment returns, to pay for promised retirement benefits.

Before 1984, federal workers had a defined benefit plan and no Social Security. Today, new employees have Social Security and a pension that is part defined benefit plan (lifetime monthly payments) and part defined contribution (a lump sum at retirement).

The pension is more generous than most private pensions, but workers have to pay more to take advantage of the plan. "You have to be aggressive about making contributions if you want a good retirement," says Nichols, the Defense Department employee.

Unlike private pensions, though, the federal system still encourages early retirement. "The sweet spot for me is about age 56. When I run the numbers, the system almost forces me to retire" early, Nichols says. For example, he expects to qualify for a free supplemental annuity at age 56 that provides a benefit equal to what he'd get at age 62 under Social Security.

Another big incentive to retire early: Most governments offer health insurance to early retirees until they qualify for Medicare at 65. Massachusetts spent $377 million on retiree medical benefits last year. The state's unfunded liability for such costs is $13.3 billion, nearly as much as its actual debt of $18.5 billion, which is counted separately.

"It's a burden on taxpayers, of course," says Delores Mitchell, executive director of the Massachusetts Group Insurance Commission, which runs the program. But she doesn't foresee major benefit cuts. "States have a tradition of treating retirees well."

Medical insurance may be the most vulnerable benefit because it has fewer legal protections than pensions, which often are guaranteed in state constitutions. Orange County, Calif., recently slashed promised retiree medical benefits, cutting its liability from $1.4 billion to $600 million. The county hasn't done anything about its pension problem.

"Pension benefits are like a lobster trap. You can get in, but you can't get out," says John Moorlach, an Orange County supervisor who has tried to reduce retirement benefits for government workers.

He blames elected officials for awarding unsustainable retirement benefits to win support from employee unions. "Elected officials love to give generous retirement benefits because they don't cost anything today and they'll be out of office when the payments come due," Moorlach says. "And the public? Eyes droop with boredom when you bring up the topic."

The financial soundness of civil servant pensions varies across the country. Government pensions are, on average, in a similar condition as private pensions — about 20% below the assets needed to be properly funded. But some states, especially in the industrial Midwest, have severely troubled pensions.

"The taxes needed to pay for these promises would push many of these states' economies into a death spiral," Chicago bankruptcy lawyer James Spiotto says.

He says public employee unions should not overestimate legal protections for pension benefits. Localities can shed their obligations in a bankruptcy filing, and states, as sovereign governments, can ignore the requirements, he says. "Unions can win all the litigation and still lose because the judgments can't be enforced," Spiotto says.

Tim Lee, executive director of the Texas Retired Teachers Association, says unions understand the cost of the retirement benefits. He says his association's top goal is improving the financial health of the pension fund, not winning new benefits.

As expensive as government pensions are to taxpayers, civil servants don't feel the benefits make them rich. Frank Caron, 49, maintains lab equipment at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. He makes about $40,000 a year.

He has contributed heavily to his pension, including an extra $74 a week to restore pension credit for earlier government jobs. That will let him retire:

•At 55 with 47% of pay;

•At 60 with 72% of pay;

•Or at 65 with 103% of pay.

He also will have medical benefits and be eligible for Social Security at 62. "I've worked hard to have my ducks lined up in a row for retirement," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0134675

FEDERAL DIARY: Thrift Savings Plan Hopes To Engage No-Shows (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 21, 2007

For lack of a better phrase, we'll call them the TSP No-Shows.

Some members of the Thrift Savings Plan rarely or never check to see how much money is in their retirement accounts. Others have seemingly vanished because their mail is returned to the TSP as undeliverable.

To some extent, the problem of dropouts in a large organization should not be surprising. The TSP, the 401(k)-type program for government workers, has more than 3.7 million members around the world. With more than $210 billion in assets, it is one of the nation's largest retirement programs.

But the no-shows have emerged as a concern at the TSP, in part because of what the staff at the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, which oversees the TSP, learned from a recent survey.

The survey found that about 16 percent of TSP members rarely or never review their retirement accounts. What was of more concern was the response from those who have most at stake in the TSP -- employees covered by the newer Federal Employees Retirement System -- because TSP savings will be a larger share of their retirement income. Of that group, 18 percent said they almost never or never look at their accounts.

The TSP also stumbled onto another problem while conducting the survey. Almost 10 percent of the questionnaires were returned to the TSP as undeliverable, suggesting that the retirement program has a similar percentage of incorrect addresses in its records.

To reach out to the no-shows, the TSP staff yesterday proposed sending an annual account statement to all 3.7 million plan participants. The cost of producing, printing and mailing the yearly statements would be $2.2 million to $2.6 million, based on preliminary estimates, said Gregory T. Long, TSP's director of product development.

The TSP provides quarterly account statements to participants through the plan's Web site. Paper statements are sent to participants who ask for them, and about 367,000 signed up to get statements in the mail.

The TSP shifted quarterly statements to the Web in 2003, and the effort has been successful, by and large. About 83 percent of respondents in the TSP survey said they were satisfied with their ability to get account information on the Internet. The elimination of quarterly paper statements saved the TSP more than $7 million last year.

Still, Long said yesterday, the TSP needs to take another look at the paperless policy in light of concerns about delivery of benefits, account security, participant education and notification requirements under the recently enacted Pension Protection Act.

A memo provided to the board by Long and Veronica Mance, a TSP benefits analyst, said participants who do not use the TSP Web site or receive paper statements may be unaware of their account balances, "resulting in poor retirement planning."

Those "disengaged participants" also may leave unpaid benefits in the plan or allow fraudulent activity on their accounts to go undetected, the memo said.

The board, chaired by Andrew M. Saul, gave Long a green light to design a single-page, doubled-sided document that would summarize account activity annually. Long said he hopes to have a firm cost estimate and proposal ready for board approval by spring.TSP's International Chase

Not all TSP participants are disengaged.

Last month, the TSP handled trades worth more than $1 billion in its international stock index fund, as participants tried to maximize their returns. The participants also ran up $523,123 in trading costs, far more than the costs incurred by the large and small-cap U.S. stock funds, Tracey A. Ray, the TSP chief investment officer, reported to the board.

The trading costs for the I Fund are high because the Australia and Asian stock markets close before the fund manager, Barclays Global Investors, receives the TSP buy-and-sell orders for the day. The trades are executed the following morning and in times of greater volatility, as was the case last month, the time lag can be costly.Take That, Jack!

Jack Bauer, the government's superagent on Fox's "24," leads a tortured life. But his TV dad, the evil Phillip Bauer, really knows how to hurt his son. In Monday's installment, the dad says to Jack:

DOJ_NMG_0134676

"You know, none of this would have happened if you hadn't turned your back on me. So that you could become -- what? -- a civil servant."

Yipes!

Helen Thomas Moving Back After 46 Years Down Front (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 21, 2007

Every theater-style seat in the White House briefing room, now closed for renovation, had a brass plaque inscribed with the name of a news organization. Only one, in the middle of the front row, had a name: "HELEN THOMAS," it said. The unique assigned seat between the chairs for CBS News and ABC News was reserved for the legendary United Press International correspondent who is now a columnist for Hearst Newspapers.

The press corps is scheduled to move from temporary facilities back into the spiffed-up, rewired briefing room in May or June. Thomas, who has been questioning presidents and press secretaries for 46 years, plans to be there. But her front-row seat won't be. Plans call for her to be moved to the second row to make room for a cable news channel – a sign of Washington's changing pecking order, and of the new ways that Americans get their news.

"I didn't think I had a monopoly on that seat," Thomas, 86, said in a telephone interview. "Since my peers have decided that I don't belong there, I'll bow to their – I'll drink the – What did Socrates drink?"

Hemlock?

"I'll drink it," she said. "You have to submit to the will of the people, and apparently this is the will of my peers. It's OK with me. I've had a good run in the front seat."

Thomas has been at the front of the class ever since scribes just pulled their chairs up around the press secretary. Now, the assigned seats are coveted real estate – both as a sign of status and because the closer you sit to the front, the better your chance of getting called on – whether the person giving the briefing is Tony Snow or the president himself.

Thomas usually comes to the press secretary's morning "gaggle" but does not always attend the afternoon briefing, so sometimes her seat is empty. It's the only seat that traditionally is left vacant if unoccupied. Every other chair gets filled in by those without regular seats, whose questions do not always live up to Thomas's zingers.

Thomas has retained her edge over the years and asks blunt, argumentative questions, often sympathetic to Palestine. Nevertheless, press secretary Tony Snow treats her with deference. One day, he mysteriously said from the podium that he wanted to see her afterward. It turned out he wanted her to sign one of her books.

Asked in December if President Bush had factored in "how many people will die" in forming his Iraq strategy, Snow replied patiently, "Helen, you ask that question every day."

"It's a very valid question," she said. Snow said: "It's a question he thinks about every day."

The old briefing room had eight rows of six seats across. The new one will have seven rows of seven seats, so the departure of Thomas would mean two more front-row spots. Both CNN and Fox have expressed interested in moving up from the second row. Thomas will move back. "Her special place in history is secure," said one of the correspondents involved in the decision. "Only one columnist in all the United States has a seat in the briefing room. Helen. She still will."

The Politico's Anne Schroeder first wrote about the possibility of a move for Thomas in her "Shenanigans" column, and now the details appear to be worked out. Steve Scully, president of the White House Correspondents Association, which traditionally decides the seating arrangement, said Thomas was "very gracious" when he approached her about the possible change.

"The wires and three networks have had a front-row seat dating back to the Nixon administration, when the West Wing briefing room opened," explained Scully, who is C-SPAN's senior executive producer and political editor. "When discussions began two years ago about redesigning the briefing room, both Fox and CNN expressed an interest in having a front-row seat. Among the criteria for seating arrangements are the size of the news organization a reporter represents and the frequency with which they attend the briefings. Helen Thomas remains the dean of the White House press corps, and we will make certain her needs are met. She has been terrific in understanding our situation." A final decision will be made by the group's board within a month.

DOJ_NMG_0134677

The cover of Thomas's latest book -- "Watchdogs of Democracy?" -- shows the rows of briefing-room seats with whimsical Post-It Notes labeled with the names of news organizations. She says in the book that she has retained her chair by dint of seniority. Asked in the interview if she'll still come in to occupy a second-row seat, she replied: "Of course."

Thomas left the ailing UPI and became a columnist for Hearst in July 2000. She started covering the White House on Jan. 20, 1961 – the inauguration of JFK. At the time, the press was crammed into what she calls "Kissinger's old office," now the National Security Affairs Office. "A very tight little island, long before the advent of regular television and radio," she recalled. About 10 people hung out there. She became UPI's White House bureau chief in 1974 and held that title until she moved to Hearst, where she writes columns, such as one titled "Cheney the Irrelevant."

She is deeply disillusioned by the state of press-presidential relations. "I think we have a public trust, and I think we have fallen down on the job," she said. "The newest crop of journalists don't do their job. For one thing, they're being blocked. I think they came out of their coma on Katrina. But the questions that should have been asked have not been asked and time has passed us by."

I pointed out that there is a school of thought that questions are worth asking even if the president won't answer them. "At least the public'll know you're doing your job," she said. "Questions should be out there, because the American people have seen us become so compliant and complicit. You were there for the run-up to the war. Where were the questions? Who asked why, what, what do you mean? We drop bombs and we accuse the enemy of meddling? We attack a country that did nothing on us? We dropped bombs on innocent people and started this war. You were there. Nobody said why." When she paused and I filled the silence with "fascinating," she continued: "It isn't fascinating. It's rid– it's, it's sad."

As for how she thinks the next White House will handle the press, she said, "I think reporters should pin down the candidates and get them to almost sign on a dotted line that they're going to give regular news conferences. It's the only institution in our society where a president can be questioned on a regular basis. If he's not questioned, he can operate solo, as a dictator."

Earlier this month, Thomas received a Lifetime Achievement Award at the black-tie congressional dinner of the Washington Press Club Foundation. In 1974, The New York Times printed her byline over her exclusive year-end interview with President Gerald Ford, who was already arguing that President Richard Nixon's acceptance of the pardon amounted to a confession to his role in Watergate. In 1973, interviews by Thomas with Martha Mitchell, wife of Attorney General John Mitchell, helped expose Watergate. On Aug. 26, 1973, Thomas quoted Martha Mitchell as saying she had seen a Nixon campaign strategy book that included plans for Watergate-style operations, according to UPI's Web site.

Asked about White House stories she's proud of, Thomas said: "One was Martha Mitchell, calling for Nixon's resignation. And I think the whole Nixon era: We all were picking up things. I mean, we didn't get the big exclusive on Watergate. But we were writing stories. I've covered history every day since I've covered the White House, and that's how I view it. I was not in Dallas, but my boss was. He won the Pulitzer. He was in the third car. I can't recall. I do know that I was the only woman print journalist to go to China in '72 with President Nixon, and wrote many firsthand stories about China. You don't need my biography."

Thomas was famous for her brisk "Thank you, Mr. President" – the now-defunct signal to end a news conference by the senior wire service reporter. UPI's Merriman Smith started the tradition when he covered Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Now, the president just stops when he wants to.

That Sinking Feeling (NYT)

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

How do you know when it's time to improve the country's roads and bridges, the water systems and power grids that the United States relies upon? There have been plenty of warning signs: spiking traffic congestion and spectacular blackouts. But at what point does the issue move from the province of anxious engineers to an outright national priority?

When sinkholes start swallowing repair trucks, it's a pretty good bet that it's time to pay attention. As William Yardley reported recently in The Times, the country's water and sewer lines, many of them a century old, are in terrible shape, leading to those collapsing roads. And the Army Corps of Engineers reported earlier this month that more than 120 levees around the country could fail in a major flood. New Orleans needs to remain an exception, rather than a sad model for the future.

DOJ_NMG_0134678

According to the federal Environmental Protection Agency, just fixing the nation's aging wastewater infrastructure will cost as much as $390 billion. A report to be released next month by the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton notes that a successful business environment also demands more reliable energy, water and transportation systems. The report cites a Transportation Department finding that freight bottlenecks — with planes circling at overcrowded airports and cargo stacked up at overcapacity ports — are costing the United States economy $200 billion annually.

That means that America's ability to compete isn't just a matter of being inventive and having a good work ethic, but also depends on the ability to deliver products reliably and on time. The first president with a master's degree in business administration — hint, he's the current Oval Office occupant — should convene a task force of federal, state and local officials to address the growing problem.

If a company kept its factories in the condition that America keeps its infrastructure, you'd expect it to lose business.

Making Amends (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

WHEN ASKED yesterday on NBC's "Today Show" about his views on a federal passenger bill of rights, JetBlue chief executive and founder David Neeleman said, "Why should Congress tell us how to treat our people? We should be able to do that." In a perfect world that would be true. But recent events, including last week's JetBlue debacle, raise doubts.

The renewed push for a passenger bill of rights gained traction in the Valentine's Day ice storm, when nine fully loaded JetBlue aircraft sat on the tarmac at John F. Kennedy airport in New York, some frozen to the ground, for six to 10 hours. In addition to the hundreds who were held hostage on stifling planes that ran out of food and water, hundreds more were stranded as JetBlue's operations ground to a halt.

The seven-year-old carrier wasn't alone in wreaking havoc on travelers that day. But because JetBlue has been heralded for its customer service, it has borne the brunt of criticism. That explains why Mr. Neeleman has been pleading for public forgiveness and instituting his own "Customer Bill of Rights," which includes compensation for canceled and delayed flights, payments to those who are bumped, and the option to get off the plane after five hours.

Meanwhile, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) introduced a passengers' bill of rights on Saturday and Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) plans to do the same next week. Both bills require airlines to allow travelers to get off planes after three hours of delay. That's more reasonable than what JetBlue is offering. And Mr. Thompson's bill goes a step further to mandate frequent updates on the cause and timing of delays.

Kate Hanni, who founded the Coalition for an Airline Passengers' Bill of Rights after being trapped in Austin on an American Airlines jet with no food, water or access to a bathroom for eight hours in December, wants a mandated 150 percent refund for passengers who are bumped or whose flights are canceled or postponed. The congressional bills wisely avoid saddling the very competitive and not-very-profitable airline industry with potentially crippling penalties. Neither should the government be micromanaging airline customer service. But setting minimal standards of decency seems like a fair approach.

OTHER NEWS:

Blue Chips Hit Another High, Aided By Wal-Mart, Oil's Fall (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Solid earnings at Wal-Mart Stores and a drop in oil prices outweighed weak results at Home Depot, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record.

The blue-chip average gained 19.07 points, or 0.1%, to end at 12786.64, up 2.6% on the year. Wal-Mart, a Dow component, rose 3.7% after the retail giant announced fourth-quarter profits that beat Wall Street's expectations. Home Depot posted its first full-year decline in earnings, but the results were largely in line with analysts' estimates. Shares fell slightly, off 0.2%.

DOJ_NMG_0134679

Other market measures posted their highest closes in more than six years. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.3%, or 4.14 points, to 1459.68, up 2.9% on the year.

The technology-stock-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite Index added 0.7%, or 16.73 points, to 2513.04, up 4% on the year.

For the second time in a week, the Dow Jones Utility Average and the Dow Jones Transportation Average hit records on the same day as the Dow industrials, another sign of the broad market gains.

In early trading, stocks hovered in the red. But a steep selloff in the oil market put stock investors in a better mood, since lower energy costs often free up money for consumers to spend on U.S. goods and services.

Warmer weather in the Northeast and statements by Iran's foreign minister calling for more talks regarding his country's controversial nuclear program prompted the decline in oil prices. Crude futures for March delivery plunged $1.32, or 2.2%, to $58.07 a barrel, down 4.9% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Analysts expect sharp criticism of Iran's nuclear program in a United Nations report due out today. But in large part, the market has factored in the likelihood of such criticism.

That left room for traders to interpret the foreign minister's remarks as a glimmer of hope, said energy analyst John Kilduff, of brokerage Fimat USA.

"We're definitely seeing some of the geopolitical fears come out of the oil price right now," said Mr. Kilduff.

In recent days, the market also has dealt with jitters over possible disruption of Nigerian supply due to political violence.

Another Dow component, Hewlett-Packard, reported earnings after the market close, beating analysts' estimates with a 26% rise in profits for its fiscal first quarter. In after-hours trading, the stock fell 38 cents, or nearly 1%, to $42.75 a share.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.34 billion shares, as 1,809 stocks rose and 1,504 fell.

Bond prices advanced2. The 10-year note added 3/32 point, or 93.80 cents per $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.680%.

The dollar strengthened3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.99 yen, compared with 119.53 yen. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.3139, compared with $1.3156.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com4

U.S. Stock Indexes Celebrate Milestones (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK — Another bad memory from the stock market plunge earlier this decade was wiped clean Tuesday from investors' minds.

The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 stock index, the broadest gauge of the U.S. equity market, hit an all-time high Tuesday, finally erasing all of its 50.2% loss suffered in the 2000-02 bear market.

The index rose 62.89 points, or 0.4%, to 14,796.54, eclipsing its former high of 14,751.64 set on March 24, 2000, at the peak of the last big bull market on Wall Street. The market capitalization of the U.S. stock market now stands at a record $18.5 trillion, Wilshire Associates says.

While the Wilshire 5000 is not as well known as the iconic Dow Jones industrial average, it is an important index because, given that it includes 4,924 components, it acts as a barometer of the broad stock market's health.

Since hitting its bear-market low on Oct. 9, 2002, the index has earned back $9 trillion in market capitalization, restoring much of the lost wealth suffered by diversified investors who did not invest most of their money in the much-harder-hit technology stocks that reside in the Nasdaq composite. The Nasdaq is still 50.2% off its all-time high.

DOJ_NMG_0134680

The Wilshire milestone came amid more records on Wall Street. The Dow Jones industrial average rallied to its 32nd record close since October, gaining 19.07 points to finish at 12,786.64. The small-cap Russell 2000 also hit a record, closing up 7.96 points to 826.11.

Despite posting gains, both the Nasdaq and Standard & Poor's 500 remained the two most conspicuous major U.S. stock indexes that still are below their 2000 record highs. The S&P 500 gained 4.14 points to 1459.68, leaving it 4.4% shy of its record. The Nasdaq gained 16.73 points to 2513.04.

A drop in oil futures and a flurry of merger deals, including one between Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio, gave the market a boost. Sirius shares rose 6% to $3.92, while XM jumped 10.2% to $15.41. (Q&A, 6B.)

Highlights:

Shares of Wal-Mart Stores gained $1.78, or 3.7%, to $50.26, its biggest percentage gain in nearly four months after the world's No. 1 retailer reported better-than-expected earnings. (Retailers' earnings, 2B.)

•Home Depot, the world's largest home-improvement retailer, reported a 28% drop in quarterly profit. Shares dipped 10 cents, or 0.2%, to $41.34.

Falling Oil Prices Help Push Dow To Another Record Close (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 20 -- Wall Street managed a moderate advance in an uneven session Tuesday after a drop in oil prices and encouraging comments from a Federal Reserve official allowed investors to shrug off disappointment over declining sales at Home Depot.

The Dow rose 19.07, or 0.15 percent, to 12,786.64, after falling more than 60 points earlier. The Dow ended the day at its 31st record close since early October and its biggest five-day rally since mid-November. The Dow also reached a new trading high, 12,795.93.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 4.14, or 0.28 percent, to 1459.68. The Nasdaq composite index rose 16.73, or 0.67 percent, to 2513.04.

Home Depot said sales at stores open at least a year dropped in the fourth quarter, suggesting that consumers were buying fewer home-improvement goods because of a sluggish housing market. Shares fell 10 cents, to $41.34.

The company's results sent the market down in early trading, but comments from outgoing Fed Governor Susan Bies, who said slumping demand for housing may have bottomed out, alleviated some concerns about the downturn dragging down the rest of the economy. Her remarks echoed those of Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who last week predicted that the economy will keep growing at a modest pace.

Oil prices, which fell $1.32, to $58.07 a barrel, on forecasts of warmer weather, also lent support to stocks. The decline in crude prices gave some investors reason to buy back into the market, as lower fuel costs curb consumer prices, which could help boost spending and reduce the chance of an interest rate increase.Movers

Wal-Mart rose $1.80, to $50.28, after reporting fourth-quarter profit growth of 9.8 percent, which beat analyst estimates.

New River Pharmaceuticals rose $4.84, to $63.19. Shire, a British pharmaceutical firm, plans to buy New River for about $2.6 billion.

Hewlett-Packard rose 36 cents, to $43.13. The computer maker said holiday sales drove its profit up in the latest quarter by 26 percent.

Fed Buzz Advances Market (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- Wall Street managed a moderate advance in an uneven session yesterday after a drop in oil prices and encouraging comments from a Federal Reserve official allowed investors to shrug off disappointment over Home Depot Inc.'s declining sales. The Dow Jones Industrial Average set another closing high.

Home Depot said sales at stores open more than a year dropped in the fourth quarter, suggesting that consumers' appetite for home improvement goods is still dwindling because of the sluggish housing market.

DOJ_NMG_0134681

The company's results sent the market down in early trading, but comments from outgoing Fed Governor Susan Bies, who said slumping demand for housing may have bottomed out, alleviated some concern about the downturn dragging down the rest of the economy. Her remarks echoed those of Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who last week predicted the economy would keep growing at a modest pace.

"The overall trend of the market is basically positive," said Brian Gendreau, investment strategist for ING Investment Management, pointing to Mr. Bernanke's recent forecast of moderating growth and cooling inflation. "That's a great environment for equities. Unless you have some specifically nasty news, there's no reason why the trend shouldn't be upward."

Falling oil prices, which tumbled $1.32 to $58.07 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on forecasts of warmer weather, also lent some support to stocks.

The Dow rose 19.07, or 0.15 percent, to 12,786.64, after falling more than 60 points earlier. Yesterday's climb brought the index to its 31st record close since early October, and its biggest five-day rally since mid-November. The Dow also reached a new trading high of 12,795.93, just short of 12,800.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index rose 4.14, or 0.28 percent, to 1,459.68, and the Nasdaq Composite Index climbed 16.73, or 0.67 percent, to 2,513.04. The Russell 2000 Index of smaller companies rose 7.96, or 0.97 percent, to 826.11.

ConocoPhillips fell 57 cents to $65.58; Chevron Corp. fell 69 cents to $70.12; and Exxon Mobil fell 42 cents to $74.87.

Home Depot's weaker-than-anticipated sales also kept some pressure on stocks.

Home Depot fell 10 cents to $41.34 after reporting same-store sales that disappointed analysts. But Wal-Mart rose $1.78, or 3.7 percent, to $50.26 after issuing its financial results, which showed better-than-expected fourth-quarter profit growth and an upbeat forecast for 2007.

Hewlett-Packard Co. said after the market closed that holiday sales drove its profit up in the latest quarter by 26 percent. The results beat analysts' expectations, but the computer and printer maker's stock fell 43 cents to $42.70 in after-hours trading after closing up 36 cents at $43.13 in regular trading.

British drug company Shire is buying U.S. drug maker New River Pharmaceuticals for about $2.6 billion; Vulcan Materials is acquiring construction aggregate maker Florida Rock Industries for $4.6 billion; and EMI Group said it was approached by Warner Music about a takeover.

Florida Rock soared $19.58, or 42 percent, to $66.54.

Warner Music climbed 90 cents, or 4.9 percent, to $19.15.

New River, of Radford, Va., surged $4.84, or 8.3 percent, to $63.19.

Not all takeover talk was positive for stocks, though. General Motors Corp. slipped 39 cents to $35.95 as rumors continued to circulate that the struggling automaker is interested in buying Chrysler Group.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by about 5 to 3 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mistrial In Malpractice Case After Defendants Aid Juror (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

BOSTON, Feb. 20 — A mistrial was declared on Tuesday in a medical malpractice case brought by the head football coach at the University of Notre Dame after a juror collapsed and the defendants, two doctors at Massachusetts General Hospital, rushed to help him.

The coach, Charlie Weis, who had N.F.L. coaching positions with the New England Patriots, the New York Giants and the New York Jets, has accused the doctors of negligence by letting him bleed internally for 30 hours after a gastric bypass in 2002.

Mr. Weis's lawyer said that he nearly died after the procedure and that the operation left his legs with nerve damage.

The doctors, Richard A. Ferguson and Charles M. Hodin, said that Mr. Weis knew the dangers of the operation and that bleeding was not uncommon after such surgery.

Around 10 a.m. as another doctor was testifying, a juror gasped and lost consciousness. The witness, with Drs. Ferguson and Hodin, rose and helped the juror, who was taken to a hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0134682

After the juror left, Mr. Weis's lawyer, Michael Mone, asked Judge Charles T. Spurlock of Superior County in Suffolk County for a mistrial. In an interview, Mr. Mone said two jurors had told the judge that the events could influence their verdict.

"Like anybody, he wanted the case to be completed," Mr. Mone said of his client. "But he also wanted to have the case decided by a jury that was not affected by such an extraordinary event."

On Friday, the Patriots quarterback, Tom Brady, testified that after the operation he saw Mr. Weis drift in and out of consciousness and that leg pain subsequently often hobbled the coach.

Supreme Court Will Review The Way New York Selects Judicial Candidates (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — The United States Supreme Court agreed on Tuesday to review New York's method of selecting candidates to its own Supreme Courts — the 324 judges who have general trial jurisdiction throughout the state and whose nomination to 14-year terms is tightly controlled by a political process that two lower federal courts declared unconstitutional last year.

The lower court rulings, which were stayed until after the 2006 election cycle, have created turmoil in the state's judicial politics and spurred calls for fundamental change in a system that dates to 1921. The political parties control the nominating conventions, and candidates who are not favored by the parties' leaders have no chance of getting on the ballot. The actual elections are for the most part uncontested.

From 1994 to 2002, these nominating conventions in the state's 12 judicial departments chose 568 State Supreme Court candidates, none of whom were challengers to the party favorites. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in a ruling last August affirming a decision issued five months earlier by Judge John Gleeson of Federal District Court in Brooklyn, ruled that the system was so exclusionary as to violate the First Amendment right of the state's voters to freedom of political association.

"The First Amendment guarantees voters and candidates a realistic opportunity to participate in the nominating phase free from severe and unnecessary burdens," Judge Chester J. Straub wrote for a three-judge panel of the appeals court. He added that the United States Supreme Court's election-law precedents "establish that the First Amendment prohibits a state from maintaining an electoral scheme that in practice excludes candidates, and thus voters, from participating in the electoral process."

The ruling was appealed to the Supreme Court by the New York State Board of Elections, joined by several political organizations; the incumbent State Supreme Court justices; and by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who was governor-elect by the time the appeal reached the court on Nov. 28.

Governor Spitzer's view of the case will be a matter of some interest as it goes forward. Addressing the Rockefeller Institute of Government shortly after his election as governor, Mr. Spitzer indicated that he did not support the existing system, which he said was "in dire need of reform." According to an account in The New York Law Journal, the governor-elect said that "there must be a way to primary onto the ballot," and added that "I will not support anything that has a closed convention structure, where only those who came out of the convention could be on the ballot."

Governor Spitzer's office in Albany said on Tuesday that he would have no comment on the Supreme Court decision to hear the case, New York Board of Elections v. Torres, No. 06-766. The court will take up the case when its next term begins in October. It could be a year from now, or longer, before the justices issue a decision.

That long waiting period presents considerable uncertainty. Under Judge Gleeson's original ruling, the state will have to begin to use a primary election system unless it comes up with another way to satisfy the court's constitutional concerns. A bill to establish primary elections as the way to choose State Supreme Court nominees passed the State Senate last year and was reintroduced at the beginning of the new session in January.

But primaries present their own problems, including the need for candidates to raise considerable amounts of money. (Money is also an issue with the nominating conventions; a judge who was arrested in Brooklyn on corruption charges several years ago asserted that the going rate in the borough for the Democratic nomination for judge was $50,000.)

DOJ_NMG_0134683

A task force convened by the New York City Bar Association in response to the court rulings recommended a system of merit selection, under which bar associations, civic groups and others would screen and present a list of candidates from which the governor or, in New York City, the mayor would choose.

Mark H. Alcott, president of the New York State Bar Association, said on Tuesday that the organization had long supported a merit selection system. The shift to such a system would require a state constitutional amendment. The Constitution was amended in 1846 to require election of State Supreme Court justices.

The challenge to the convention system was brought by a group of judicial candidates, Republican and Democratic voters, and the civic group Common Cause, represented by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School. The lead plaintiff, Margarita López Torres, who is now the Brooklyn surrogate court judge, tried and failed several times to obtain a Democratic nomination for State Supreme Court. As an elected Civil Court judge, she refused an order to make a patronage appointment of a law secretary, and complained that she was told by a party leader that she "did not understand the way it works."

Romney Mounting An Early Presidential Ad Campaign (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Mitt Romney, who entered the race for the Republican presidential nomination last week, will run television advertisements in five states starting Wednesday, the latest sign of how quickly the 2008 campaign is moving.

The advertisements, 10 months before the first nominating contests next year, are an early move to inform Republican primary voters about his views and record at a time when he has come under some criticism by opponents for shifting his views on several issues.

The television advertising campaign will begin in Iowa and New Hampshire on Wednesday and then expand to South Carolina, Florida and Michigan, all states with early 2008 contests, his aides said. The advertisements will run for about two weeks.

Mr. Romney, a former governor of Massachusetts, becomes the first of the major presidential contenders of either party to buy television time. By contrast, in the 2004 election, Howard Dean, a Democrat seeking his party's presidential election, bought the first television advertisements only six months before the first nominating contests.

"It is very early," said Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, a firm based in Virginia that tracks advertising. "But everything this time is seemingly very early."

The advertisements include film from Mr. Romney's announcement last Tuesday in Dearborn, Mich., along with shots of him speaking at a rally at the Iowa State Fairgrounds that afternoon. As is typical with early introductory advertisements, they focus heavily on presenting information about someone who is little known outside his state, focusing in particular on his tenure as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City.

The advertisement also offers a hint of how Mr. Romney may package himself in the campaign. "The Republican governor who turned around a Democratic state," the announcer says.

Some Romney supporters have been urging him to push back against criticism that he has shifted on issues as he has sought the backing of conservatives in his party — particularly his move from supporting abortion rights when he was a candidate in Massachusetts to opposing them now.

Recently, for example, Mr. Romney said in an interview on the ABC News program "This Week" that he just recently signed up as a member of the National Rifle Association and that he voted for Paul E. Tsongas, the former Democratic senator from Massachusetts, in his state's 1992 Democratic presidential primary, which is open to voters from both parties.

Mr. Romney's advisers said the advertisements had long been planned and should not be viewed as an expression of concern that he is being defined early by these questions.

"What the announcement did is stimulate a great deal of demand and interest about Mitt Romney from voters," said Kevin Madden, his spokesman. "What this does is introduce Mitt Romney to voters and gives more information about who he is. We don't enjoy the universal name identification that other candidates enjoy at this point."

Romney Goes Up On TV (POL)

DOJ_NMG_0134684

By Jonathan Martin

Politico.com, February 21, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney goes up on the air tomorrow in parts of Florida, Iowa, Michigan, New Hampshire and South Carolina with his campaign's first ad. The 60-second spot, "Unplugged," features Mitt on the stump. There will also be a condensed, 30-second version.

Asked why the campaign would air commercials so far ahead of the first voting, Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said, "It's the perfect time."

"We just launched last week, and since then voter interest in Mitt Romney is continuing to grow and demand is rising," Madden continued. "This ad allows people to see and hear Mitt Romney as he works the campaign trail and makes his case for people's support."

The spot also allows Romney to boost his name ID in the key early states, where he currently lags far behind the better-known Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani. While Romney has put together a solid organization in each of these initial nominating states and created buzz with the political class, he's yet to penetrate the larger population. These ads aim to change that.

The Abortion Wars (POL)

Politico.com, February 20, 2007

The campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, whose stance on abortion has often been hard to pin down, now is attacking Sen. John McCain on the issue, accusing the Arizonan of ducking the debate over the right to life since his 2000 presidential bid.

"Ask the pro-life movement where his leadership has been in the six years since 2000 that he's been running for president," says Gary Marx, who is charged with handling conservative outreach for Romney. "What has he done?"

But isn't it a bit audacious for the campaign of a candidate who was, in his own words, "effectively pro-choice" as late as his 2002 gubernatorial run, to now take shots at the record of a consistently pro-life opponent?

"We're making sure that all primary voters and [conservative] leaders have full picture on all the candidates," responds Marx.

Which is why Marx sent an e-mail (pasted in full below) last night to more than 100 influential social conservatives highlighting various news clips about McCain's stance on abortion, bolding and italicizing those lines that call into question the senator's commitment to ending the practice.

Romney's views on social issues, and particularly abortion, have received sustained scrutiny over the past few months and it's time that the other candidates face a similar examination, Marx says.

McCain, for example, "votes pro-life," Marx concedes, "but he still doesn't get it on what to do" to end the legalization of abortion.

Matt David, spokesman and rapid response guru for McCain, responded by noting his candidate's long record of opposing abortion.

"Senator McCain ran as a pro-life candidate, was elected as a pro-life senator and serves as a pro-life senator," he said.

McCain said Sunday on the campaign trail in South Carolina that, as president, he would support overturning Roe v Wade.

And what about Romney's own conversion on what conservatives call "the sanctity of life"?

Marx points out that Romney as governor vetoed funding for embryonic stem cell research, an emergency contraception bill and a measure that would change the defintion of when life begins.

While Romney's rhetoric was consistently pro-choice before being elected, his gubernatorial record "is 100% pro-life as a record," notes Marx.

That may be the case, but as long videos like this continue to appear on YouTube, it will be difficult for Marx and Co. to keep the focus on anybody's record on the issue but their own.

Mitt Romney's Extreme Makeover (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

DOJ_NMG_0134685

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Precisely two years ago, Mitt Romney, then the governor of Massachusetts but already eyeing a 2008 presidential bid, sat in the coffee shop of a Washington hotel, doing his best not to explain his views on abortion.

Romney was speaking to a few of us from The Post, and my colleague Dan Balz noted the similarity between Romney's expressed views on abortion rights and the stance of another Massachusetts politician, Sen. John F. Kerry: Both men said they were personally opposed to abortion but did not support making it illegal.

From there, Romney proceeded to expound one of the odder positions I've heard in years of listening to politicians talk about a subject most would prefer to avoid: "I can tell you what my position is, and it's in a very narrowly defined sphere, as candidate for governor and as governor of Massachusetts," he said. "What I said to people was that I personally did not favor abortion, that I am personally pro-life. However, as governor I would not change the laws of the commonwealth relating to abortion.

"Now I don't try and put a bow around that and say what does that mean you are -- does that mean you're pro-life or pro-choice, because that whole package -- meaning I'm personally pro-life but I won't change the laws, you could describe that as -- well, I don't think you can describe it in one hyphenated word."

Got it? I didn't, and I asked, "Do you support making abortion illegal? I'm not talking about what you would do as governor of Massachusetts."

Romney: "But that's the furthest I'm going to take you right now. I'm governor of Massachusetts, and I'm telling you exactly what I will do as governor of Massachusetts, but I'm not going to tell you what I'd do as mayor of Boston or a congressman or any of those positions."

I reprint so much of Romney's answer (you can read or listen to the full exchange online) because its baroque circumlocutions seemed to say so much about him. It was hard to know what Romney actually thought about abortion rights other than that this was a political minefield it was best to avoid stepping into for as long as possible.

But it was also hard to see how a man with deeply held convictions on abortion rights -- either for or against -- could take a position so calibrated and inconclusive. Listening to Romney that day was like watching a chameleon in the fleeting moment that its color changes to suit its environment. Indeed, several months later, after vetoing a bill to expand access to emergency contraception, Romney wrote in the Boston Globe about how his views on the subject had "evolved and deepened."

Evolved, indeed. During his Massachusetts races, Romney paraded his conviction that "abortion should be safe and legal in this country" and promised that "you will not see me wavering" on Roe v. Wade.

Now Romney says he opposes abortion except in cases of rape and incest or to save the life of the mother, and supports overturning Roe. At the National Review Institute Conservative Summit last month -- at the very hotel where he had told us of his commitment to not altering state law one way or another -- Romney boasted that each time an issue involving reproductive rights came up during his governorship, "on every single one of them I came down on the side of respecting human life."

Romney's "Extreme Makeover: Political Edition" goes beyond abortion rights. Once he supported allowing gays to serve openly in the military and backed a federal law to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation -- not anymore. He's gone from saying "I don't line up with the NRA" to becoming, last August, a life member.

Romney told the Boston Globe in 1994 that, as a registered independent, he voted in the 1992 Democratic primary for Paul Tsongas because Tsongas was from Massachusetts and he favored Tsongas's ideas over Bill Clinton's. Appearing last weekend on ABC's "This Week," Romney offered a contradictory explanation: "When there was no real contest in the Republican primary, I'd vote in the Democrat primary, vote for the person who I thought would be the weakest opponent for a Republican."

Surely a man with a Harvard MBA could do better than that. At the time of the primary, Tsongas was doing better than Clinton in matchups against George H.W. Bush. And Tsongas didn't need Romney's help trouncing Clinton in his home state.

To give this explanation the credit it doesn't deserve, Romney's rationale boils down to arguing that he didn't really mean his vote; he was just trying to game the political process. Those considering Romney in 2008 have reason to wonder what a politician who admits so freely to that kind of manipulation is willing to do to win their votes.

marcusr@washpost.com

DOJ_NMG_0134686

McCain Defends Christian Outreach Effort (AP)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Republican presidential candidate John McCain is defending his outreach to conservative Christians, arguing that his effort is not political pandering to win the GOP nomination.

McCain met privately Monday with religious broadcasters in Orlando, Fla., then answered questions about his appeal to conservatives in Vero Beach.

In the 2000 campaign, McCain angered the party's right by calling evangelist leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance." Last spring, he spoke at Falwell's Liberty University although hard feelings still linger among some conservatives. Focus on the Family founder James Dobson has said he won't support McCain.

"Nobody accused me of courting and pandering to the liberals when I went to the New School," McCain told the crowd, a reference to the New York City school. "What I have found out in my life, is that every time I have done something for political reasons and not the right reasons, I have paid a very heavy price for it — a big price."

The Arizona senator said he is trying to reach out to all elements of the party.

"I don't know which part of the party is going to be more influential or not," McCain said. "I've tried always in my political career to have a big tent party where a lot of people are welcome with differing views."

Conservatives are a critical voting bloc in the GOP primaries.

The Rev. Patrick Mahoney of the Christian Defense Coalition said after McCain's private meeting in Orlando that he helped repair damage with Christian conservatives.

"He recognized he cannot be president of the United States without reaching out to the evangelicals," Mahoney said. "There definitely is an uneasy relationship between McCain and people of faith, but he is reaching out and he is breaking down those walls. He helped himself in that room tremendously today."

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — John Edwards' presidential campaign wants to make it clear that he does not consider Israel a threat to world peace.

A spokesman for the 2008 Democratic candidate issued a statement Tuesday denying such a report on Variety.com. Columnist Peter Bart reported that Edwards told a Hollywood fundraiser last month that the possibility that Israel would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities is perhaps the greatest short-term threat to world peace.

The report was circulating on the Internet, and the Edwards campaign wanted to reassure its pro-Israel supporters that is not his position.

"The January 19th Variety article is erroneous," said Edwards spokesman Jonathan Prince. "Senator Edwards did not say nor does he believe that the greatest short-term threat to world peace is the possibility that Israel would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities. Senator Edwards said, as he has in the past, that Iran acquiring a nuclear weapon is one of the greatest short-term threats to world peace."

Bart said Variety stands by its report. The host of the Jan. 9 fundraiser, Adam Venit of the Endeavor talent agency, did not respond to a message seeking comment.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama will deliver the keynote address next month at the annual Bridge Crossing Jubilee that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, organizers said Tuesday.

Obama is scheduled to speak at a March 4 service at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church, the site in Selma where marchers gathered in the historic protest that gave blacks across the South greater access to the ballot.

Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., who district includes Selma, asked Obama to participate and plans to hold a fundraiser for the Illinois senator. Davis and Obama met while attending Harvard Law School.

The 1965 march helped spark passage of the Voting Rights Act, which allowed blacks to register across the South without the obstacles used by segregationists to limit their access to polling places.

DOJ_NMG_0134687

Club-swinging troopers and deputies beat and turned back marchers at the Edmund Pettus bridge at Selma on March 7, 1965, an attack that became known as "Bloody Sunday" and helped galvanize national support for the voting rights movement. With a federal court order clearing the way, the march to Montgomery was completed later that month.

___

Associated Press writers Ben Evans and Nedra Pickler in Washington contributed to this report.

McCain Suffers In Polls Despite Iraq Stance (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Once considered the un-crowned Republican candidate for the 2008 presidential election, John McCain's fortunes are plummeting rapidly. And the senator's frustrations are beginning to show.

At a campaign stop in South Carolina on Monday, Mr McCain lashed out at Donald Rumsfeld, the controversial former defence secretary, as "one of the worst secretaries of defence in history". The 70-year-old Vietnam war veteran added: "We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement – that's the kindest word I can give you – of Donald Rumsfeld of this war. The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

In spite of his criticisms of the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq war since 2003, Mr McCain is starting to pay a price on the campaign trail.

Last month the Arizona senator came out strongly in favour of George W. Bush's "new way forward in Iraq", which involves sending another 21,500 US troops into the field. Since then, his poll numbers among registered Republican voters and among the US public at large have fallen sharply.

From being the virtually uncontested frontrunner among Republicans, recent polls show Mr McCain trailing Rudy Giuliani, the form-er mayor of New York seen by many as an "American hero" because of the leadership he displayed after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

According to the latest poll by Fox News, only 22 per cent of Republicans support Mr McCain's candidacy compared with 34 per cent for Mr Giuliani. Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House of Representatives, attracted 15 per cent support even though he has not yet decided whether to enter the race.

Meanwhile, Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, who is trying to position himself as a candidate of the powerful social conservative bloc, failed to get into double figures. Mr Romney's Mormon beliefs are seen as a severe handica p in a party where up to one-third of members are registered evangelicals.

Mr McCain is viewed with suspicion because of his support for stem cell research and lukewarm opposition to abortion and gay marriage.

He has stretch-ed voter credulity by making overt attempts to reconcile with the Christian right. He said the 1973 Roe vs Wade Supreme Court ruling that paved the way for abortion should be overturned.

Although Mr Giuliani is more liberal by far on social issues than either of the other candidates and is also on his third marriage, his image as a tough operator in what is widely expected to be a national security-dominated election in 2008 has assisted his poll numbers, say analysts.

Dewine, Castle Endorse Mccain (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) yesterday picked up a 2008 endorsement from Ohio's former GOP senator, Mike DeWine, who maintains strong name-recognition in the quintessential swing state, despite losing his seat last year.

Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.) also joined McCain's 2008 bid.

Of the 17 House Republicans who voted with Democrats on last week's resolution condemning the Bush administration's plan to add troops in Iraq, five are public McCain supporters: Reps. Ric Keller (Fla.), Fred Upton (Mich.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio), Mark Kirk (Ill.) and Castle.

DOJ_NMG_0134688

South Carolina To Test Rudy's Line On Judges (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 21, 2007

A speech Rudy Giuliani delivered to an abortion-rights advocacy group when he was mayor of New York City and more recent comments about the Supreme Court could complicate his efforts to woo conservative votes in crucial presidential primary states.

Giuliani will test his new abortion talking points with conservative voters today when he campaigns in South Carolina, a state that is expected to pose an obstacle to centrist GOP presidential candidates next year.

Giuliani, who was an outspoken supporter of abortion rights when he ran for city office in the 1990s, has shifted his position to appeal to conservative voters by promising to nominate conservative jurists to the federal courts if elected president. He has vowed to select judges like Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., conservative stalwarts on the Supreme Court who are viewed as abortion-rights opponents.

The credibility of that stance is undermined by remarks Giuliani delivered in April of 2001 to the National Abortion & Reproduction Rights Action League, now known as NARAL Pro-Choice America.

NARAL was perhaps the harshest critic of President Bush's appointments of Roberts and Alito to the high court. NARAL aired the first television advertisement opposing Roberts's nomination, accusing him of supporting violent anti-abortion groups while showing footage of a 1998 abortion clinic bombing.

The ad was met with such a barrage of protest that NARAL took it off the air. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), then the centrist chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, condemned the ad, saying it was untrue and undercut the credibility of abortion-rights advocates.

Giuliani's remarks to NARAL could prove embarrassing because the Roberts episode is still fresh in the minds of many conservative activists the former mayor hopes to win over to his side.

"I thank NARAL for taking the lead in establishing freedom of choice for all of us, and as the mayor of New York City, I thank you for being here in New York City," he said in 2001.

Giuliani also indicated then that he supported changing the Republican Party's platform on abortion.

"In a recent poll by American Viewpoint, 65 percent of Republicans supported changing the plank in the Republican platform that calls for a constitutional ban on abortion," he said. "And over 80 percent of Republicans believe that the decision with regard to an abortion should be made by a woman, her doctor, and her family, rather than dictated by the government."

Abortion rights, Giuliani said, fit well within the Republican Party's philosophy of reducing the role of government in people's lives.

"So it is consistent with that philosophy to believe that in the most personal and difficult choices that a woman has to make with regard to a pregnancy, those choices should be made based on that person's conscience and that person's way of thinking and feeling," he said. "The government shouldn't dictate that choice by making it a crime or making it illegal."

At the NARAL lunch, Giuliani also said he and the assembled guests were "upholding a distinguished tradition that began in our city starting with the work of Margaret Sanger," a founder of Planned Parenthood and a pioneer of distributing birth control to the poor.

An official with Giuliani's campaign stressed that he has since clearly stated his personal opposition to abortion.

"I oppose it," Giuliani said during a Fox News interview this month. "I don't like it. I hate it. I think abortion is something that is a personal matter I would advise something against. However, I believe in a woman's right to choose. I think you have to ultimately not put a woman in jail for that. I think ultimately you have to leave that to a disagreement of conscience and have to respect the choice that somebody makes…"

Now that Giuliani is pinning his abortion stance to a promise on federal court nominations, he could be haunted by other public comments.

In July of 2005, he said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg fit criteria that would be important to him when picking a Supreme Court justice.

DOJ_NMG_0134689

"[W]hat's important to me is to have a very intelligent, very honest, very good lawyer on the court," he said. "Justice Ginsburg fit that category." Giuliani added that she was a "very qualified lawyer and a very smart person."

Ironically, Giuliani made his 2005 statements on Fox News's "Hannity & Colmes," the same show on which he made an appeal this month to conservative voters.

"I think the appointment of judges I would make would be very similar if not exactly the same as the last two judges that were appointed," he said. "Chief Justice Roberts is somebody I admire. Justice Alito, someone I knew when he was U.S. attorney, I also admire."

Influential conservatives say Giuliani cannot merely promise to nominate conservatives to the bench. They say he must address his personal stance on the issue.

"I think it's probably going to have to be stronger," the director of public policy for the South Carolina Baptist Convention, Joe Mack, said. "He'll have to deal with where he stands on the issue, not just on his court appointees. I think people are still going to want to know where he stands on the issue."

Mack said that if Giuliani has changed his mind on abortion, he will have to make his case convincing.

"What kind of case he makes will determine whether they accept it or not," he said, speaking of social conservatives from his state.

A conservative activist leader based in Washington, Connie Mackey, said Giuliani's comments need to be scrutinized.

"It's relevant," said Mackey, who works for the legislative-action arm of the Family Research Council, a group representing evangelical Christians. "Any conservative who thinks it's sufficient to get a promise that [Giuliani] will put strict constructionists on the courts are missing the point. You use the bully pulpit to advance an agenda you believe in and you put people in federal agencies who will do the work of your stated agenda. His stated agenda is that he's pro-abortion."

Giuliani made other statements in 2005 that will make it difficult for him to appease conservatives' concerns by promising to nominate judges in the mold of Roberts and Alito.

During a June 2005 interview on MSNBC's "Hardball," Giuliani said he would not select a judicial nomination based on his or her abortion views.

"I wouldn't pick a judge based on whether I knew or didn't know their position on choice," he said. "I'd pick a judge based on their overall record."

Perhaps more awkward for Giuliani now is a declaration he made in 2000 during an ABC interview with George Will that Roe v. Wade, the landmark Supreme Court decision establishing the right to an abortion, was good constitutional law. Even many defenders of abortion rights acknowledge that the legal justification behind the case was poorly reasoned.

These statements could turn up in campaign ads aired by his political opponents in the run-up to next year's primaries.

Obama Attracts Celebrities And Cash (AP)

By Michael R. Blood, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Checks from Hollywood's A-list stars such as George Clooney, Eddie Murphy and Barbra Streisand added up to a one-night take of $1.3 million for Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama.

Obama spoke to a star-studded audience at a closed-door fundraiser in Beverly Hills arranged by three of the industry's biggest names — DreamWorks studio founders Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen.

He told an audience that included Spielberg, Oscar nominee Eddie Murphy, actress Jennifer Anniston and singer Jackson Browne that they have "enormous power" that comes with "enormous responsibility" because of their impact on American culture.

"Don't sell yourselves short," he said in a 25-minute address. "You are the storytellers of our age."

Tickets were $2,300, the maximum individual donation to a federal campaign, or $4,600 for a couple. A later, private dinner at Geffen's home was being held for fundraisers who brought in at least $46,000 for the evening.

DOJ_NMG_0134690

Before the fundraiser, Obama urged a crowd of thousands at an outdoor rally to help him transform America. The freshman senator from Illinois spoke of a government that is failing the country and a slash-and-burn political culture that stands in the way of significant change.

With the support of the electorate, Obama said, he could work to resolve such issues as an unpopular war in Iraq and a public education system that he said leaves too many people behind.

"We can do all these things. I can't do it without you," Obama, tieless and in shirt sleeves, exhorted the audience as supporters enthusiastically waved a sea of blue "Obama '08" signs.

The crowd was strikingly large for a rally a year before the state's expected February 2008 primary.

The fundraiser underscored the intense competition among the party's leading 2008 candidates for Hollywood dollars and endorsements. The entertainment industry is a perennial source of cash for Democrats, with big names often donating to multiple campaigns while withholding formal endorsements until later.

Spielberg, for example, is a host of the event but has not made an endorsement. Katzenberg and Geffen are backing Obama.

The movie, television and recording industries gave $33.1 million to federal candidates and parties in 2004, with much of that coming from Hollywood, according to the nonprofit Center for Responsive Politics.

Obama's display of celebrity sizzle and campaign dollars challenges any assumptions that Hollywood dollars would default to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who has long-standing ties to the industry, along with her husband, former President Clinton.

"I think this guy is for real," said longtime Democratic consultant Garry South, who is unaligned in the 2008 race. "I was skeptical at first, but something is going on here. ... Whether it can sustain itself remains to be seen."

Clinton will be pulling in Hollywood dollars next month, when a fundraiser is scheduled at the home of supermarket tycoon Ronald Burkle, a longtime friend and fundraiser for her husband.

In addition to money, the state has taken on new importance in presidential politics with lawmakers poised to move its primary to Feb. 5 from June.

Among other candidates, Republican Rudy Giuliani was in the state earlier this month. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is planning to appear Wednesday with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in the Los Angeles area to discuss climate change.

Obama was on a three-day swing through California, his first since announcing his candidacy. He also held a fundraiser in San Diego's upscale La Jolla section.

Beside the celebrity giving, checks have come in from studio bosses, including Paramount Pictures studio chief Brad Grey; Richard Cook, chairman of Walt Disney Studios, and Ron Meyer of Universal Studios.

Hollywood Gives Obama Both Cash And Credibility (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Hollywood has always gravitated to the fresh face, so the crushing turnout there yesterday at a rally and a series of fundraisers for presidential contender Barack Obama followed a familiar Tinseltown story line.

The Democratic senator from Illinois drew thousands to a South Los Angeles park, then headed to Beverly Hills for a fundraising double feature that organizers said yielded him an estimated $1.3 million.

Movie stars Tom Hanks, Jennifer Aniston and Denzel Washington wrote checks, and scores of producers and agents paid $4,600 per couple -- the maximum allowed -- to jam a hotel ballroom for a two-hour, closed-door cocktail reception hosted by entertainment moguls Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen.

Those who collected $46,000 in checks for the event, which attracted 300 people, were invited to Geffen's house for a more intimate sit-down dinner with Obama.

Organizers said they expected the freshman senator to leave town flush not only with money but also with valuable connections in a city that has for decades served as a lifeline for Democratic presidential contenders.

DOJ_NMG_0134691

Money collected now could provide an important boost, in that it will appear on Obama's first quarterly earnings report. Those figures, when released in April, will help signal his campaign's viability.

A clear undercurrent to yesterday's high-profile Hollywood swing was the ease with which Obama swept up support from entertainment industry titans who had once been squarely with President Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"There will be lots of excitement about her," Donna Bojarsky, a Hollywood-based political consultant who attended last night's Obama event, said of Hillary Clinton. "But with him, there's this overwhelming sense that people could be getting in at the ground floor of a historic journey."

That is not to say Hollywood is leaving Hillary Clinton behind. Spielberg is one of many who have pledged to raise money for Obama, Clinton and former senator John Edwards. Next month, former supermarket magnate Ron Burkle will host a major fundraiser for Clinton.

"Senator Clinton has been a box-office hit in this town for 15 years," said Chad Griffin, a Hollywood-based political strategist and staff member in the Clinton White House. "Anyone who can survive the industry for 15 years has lasting power."

Obama Hat In Hand In La-la Land (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. -- In Hollywood, it's never too early to be famous.

Never too soon to be "it." No such thing as too much attention. And no better place for a politician who is known as much for his celebrity as his record.

So on Tuesday night, Sen. Barack Obama made his debut as a presidential candidate among an A-list of Hollywood power and fame, tapping into one of the most formidable honey pots of Democratic money and connections. The crowd included Jennifer Aniston and Eddie Murphy as well as singer Natalie Maines of the Grammy-winning Dixie Chicks and movie producer Ron Howard.

And the hosts are among the entertainment world's best known and most powerful figures, Steven Spielberg, David Geffen and Jeffrey Katzenberg, the DreamWorks SKG partners. Studio bosses from Universal, Paramount, Disney and Fox each paid $2,300 for tickets to the event with the Democratic senator from Illinois.

It is the season's premier fundraising event in the cradle of American myth-making, one of the most important sources of money for presidential candidates. In addition to contributing money to its favored candidates, the entertainment industry also casts an aura of glamour and currency upon a hopeful trying to catch on as the next big thing.

So in a town that lives and dies by the ability to predict what will capture the imagination of the American public, candidates are feverishly making their pitches.

Attendance at such a star-studded event isn't necessarily a promise of political backing. In fact, Spielberg, has promised to help throw an upcoming event for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clintonof New York, one of Obama's chief rivals for the Democratic nomination. The two are fiercely battling for the heart of Hollywood these days, with Clinton getting ready for her own high-stakes fundraiser in the next few weeks and counting the support of several influential moguls and producers in the community.

But the fact that the DreamWorks partners are so early in staging such a big party — expected to net at least $1 million — has drawn notable attention to Obama, especially as media from around the world assemble in advance of this weekend's Oscar ceremonies. For others in the circle, say some, it signals Obama as someone to take seriously.

'Very discerning'

"These guys are very discerning people," said Anne Dunsmore, a California Republican fundraiser who was state finance director for both George W. Bush presidential campaigns. "When you bring something in—whether it's a candidate, a script or a business opportunity—and they sign off on it, it's a big deal."

Decades ago, studio executives were the main Hollywood players in industry relations with Washington. But the relationships are now so diverse and strong that it isn't unusual to see movie stars at the White House correspondents' dinner or at a witness table in a congressional hearing — the old joke about Washington being Hollywood for ugly people notwithstanding.

DOJ_NMG_0134692

Along with the financial capital of New York, the lobbying community of Washington and the business services and manufacturing center of Chicago, Hollywood is one of the great sources of political money in the U.S. Republicans also make fundraising forays into the state where former actor and Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger now serves as governor, but Democrats are the primary beneficiaries of money from the entertainment industry.

Of the millions of dollars that the entertainment industry contributed to federal candidates and parties in the last presidential cycle, according to an analysis by the non-partisan watchdog Center for Responsive Politics, almost 70 percent went to Democrats.

"You can't run for president as a Democrat and not have a foothold in Hollywood," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), a key fundraiser for Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential election and head of the successful Democratic effort to retake the U.S. House in 2006. "It's such an important piece of the financial building blocks."

Emanuel's brother Ari is a top Hollywood talent agent who also has agreed to hold a future fundraiser for Obama.

Candidates of all political stripes come calling in those circles, and only partly because the pockets are so deep.

"Raising money in Hollywood is a two-fer," said Michael Toner, a Federal Election Commission member who was general counsel to the Bush 2000 presidential campaign. "First you raise the campaign money. And then you have the candidate associated with Hollywood celebrities, who are opinion-leaders in their own right."

Support from celebrities can sometimes be a negative, as when candidates denounce the West Coast contributions they didn't get by characterizing the donors as "out-of-touch" with working-class people.

"The implication is, 'They don't have our family values,'" said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst and senior scholar at the University of Southern California. "In general, it's that Hollywood doesn't lead the lifestyle of the heartland of America, so why listen to them?"

But industry leaders may actually have something to contribute when it comes to sizing up candidates, said Arianna Huffington, the founder of the political blog Huffingtonpost.com, who once ran against Schwarzenegger in the California governor's recall election. She remembers getting a phone call from producer, writer and director Norman Lear in 2004, inviting her to come over and meet a candidate running for the U.S. Senate in Illinois.

"I said, 'He's running for the Senate in Illinois, and you want me to come meet him?'" Huffington said, wondering why she should pay attention to a new candidate in a faraway state. Then she went anyway because she trusted Lear's instincts.

Barack Obama blew the room away, she said, just as Lear had predicted.

"Casting is what determines the success of a movie," she said in an interview. "Movies here don't get the green light if they don't have the right elements. To green light a campaign, you have to have the right leading man or leading woman ... It's about connecting. That cannot be taught."

For years, Bill and Hillary Clinton have been the political darlings of Hollywood, and their roots in the community run strong and deep. The senator's supporters include media mogul Haim Saban, producer Stephen Bing and actress Elizabeth Taylor. Billionaire Ron Burkle will hold a fundraiser for her in March.

"Sen. Clinton does not have to go on casting calls in Los Angeles," said Chad Griffin, a former Clinton White House aide and Hollywood-based political consultant whose clients include a number of high-profile entertainment industry figures. "She has the relationships and she has had them for 15 years ... The day she announced, most everyone I know maxed out to her and started making calls for her."

One jumps ship

But one of the Clintons' old friends is no longer on board. Two years ago, Geffen told a New York audience that Hillary Clinton can't win the presidency and declared her an "incredibly polarizing figure."

Much of Hollywood is deeply opposed to the war in Iraq, and Clinton not only voted to authorize the war but hasn't taken the kind of firm stance against it that many in the entertainment community would like to see.

One alternative is Democrat John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina, who was in Los Angeles for a small fundraiser just a few days ago. Another is Obama, who some think may pick up steam as a result of the SKG fundraiser.

"In Hollywood, they move in packs," said Dunsmore. The DreamWorks partners have effectively "told everybody it's OK to go with Barack instead of Hillary. It's OK to explore your options."

DOJ_NMG_0134693

In case things don't work out, there's also another figure waiting in the wings — former Vice President Al Gore. He's getting buzz right now for another reason — the film based on his book "An Inconvenient Truth" is up for an Oscar this weekend.

Mike Dorning reported from Beverly Hills and Christi Parsons from Washington, D.C.

Obama's Big Screen Test (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Hillary is not David Geffen's dreamgirl.

"Whoever is the nominee is going to win, so the stakes are very high," says Mr. Geffen, the Hollywood mogul and sultan of "Dreamgirls," as he sits by a crackling fire beneath a Jasper Johns flag and a matched pair of de Koonings in the house that Jack Warner built (which old-time Hollywood stars joked was the house that God would have built). "Not since the Vietnam War has there been this level of disappointment in the behavior of America throughout the world, and I don't think that another incredibly polarizing figure, no matter how smart she is and no matter how ambitious she is — and God knows, is there anybody more ambitious than Hillary Clinton? — can bring the country together.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family. Americans are dying every day in Iraq. And I'm tired of hearing James Carville on television."

Barack Obama has made an entrance in Hollywood unmatched since Scarlett O'Hara swept into the Twelve Oaks barbecue. Instead of the Tarleton twins, the Illinois senator is flirting with the Dreamworks trio: Mr. Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, who gave him a party last night that raised $1.3 million and Hillary's hackles.

She didn't stand outside the gates to the Geffen mansion, where glitterati wolfed down Wolfgang Puck savories, singing the Jennifer Hudson protest anthem "And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going." But she's not exactly Little Miss Sunshine, either. Hillary loyalists have hissed at defecting donors to remember the good old days of jumping on the Lincoln Bedroom bed.

"Hillary is livid that Obama's getting the first big fund-raiser here," one friend of hers said.

Who can pay attention to the Oscar battle between "The Queen" and "Dreamgirls" when you've got a political battle between a Queen and a Dreamboy?

Terry McAuliffe and First Groupie Bill have tried to hoard the best A.T.M. machine in politics for the Missus, but there's some Clinton fatigue among fatigued Clinton donors, who fret that Bill will "pull the focus" and shelve his wife's campaign.

"I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Mr. Geffen says, adding that if Republicans are digging up dirt, they'll wait until Hillary's the nominee to use it. "I think they believe she's the easiest to defeat."

She is overproduced and overscripted. "It's not a very big thing to say, 'I made a mistake' on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can't," Mr. Geffen says. "She's so advised by so many smart advisers who are covering every base. I think that America was better served when the candidates were chosen in smoke-filled rooms."

The babble here is not about "Babel"; it's about the battle of the billionaires. Not only have Ron Burkle and David Geffen been vying to buy The Los Angeles Times — they have been vying to raise money for competing candidates. Mr. Burkle, a supermarket magnate, is close to the Clintons, and is helping Hillary parry Barry Obama by arranging a fund-raiser for her in March, with a contribution from Mr. Spielberg.

Did Mr. Spielberg get in trouble with the Clintons for helping Senator Obama? "Yes," Mr. Geffen replies, slyly. Can Obambi stand up to Clinton Inc.? "I hope so," he says, "because that machine is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective."

Once, David Geffen and Bill Clinton were tight as ticks. Mr. Geffen helped raise some $18 million for Bill and slept in the Lincoln Bedroom twice. Bill chilled at Chateau Geffen. Now, the Dreamworks co-chairman calls the former president "a reckless guy" who "gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and to distract the country."

They fell out in 2000, when Mr. Clinton gave a pardon to Marc Rich after rebuffing Mr. Geffen's request for one for Leonard Peltier. "Marc Rich getting pardoned? An oil-profiteer expatriate who left the country rather than pay taxes or face justice?" Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0134694

Geffen says. “Yet another time when the Clintons were unwilling to stand for the things that they genuinely believe in. Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it’s troubling.”

The mogul knows it’s easy to mock Hollywood — “people with Priuses and private planes” — and agrees with George Clooney that it’s probably not helpful for stars to campaign for candidates, given the caricatures of Hollywood.

I ask what he will say if he ever runs into Bill Clinton again. “ ‘Hi,’ ” he replies. And will he be upset if Hillary wins and he never gets to sleep in the Lincoln Bedroom again?

“No,” he says with a puckish smile. “It’s not as nice as my bedroom.”

Obama And The Old Racial Bind (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Marcus Smith was working as a waiter at a Democratic fundraiser here the other night when Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) took to the podium. Smith, with dishes in both hands, stopped to listen. "I'd really like to see Obama become the first black president of the United States," he said later. Asked what made Obama black, he replied, "That little taste his father gave him was all it takes."

There it was again, a near reflexive need to categorize and assess by race.

Is Obama black enough for the black vote? Is he too black for the white vote? With a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, can he expect to take the mixed-race vote? It's as if the "color line" had been encoded into the American DNA.

Obama was doing what he could not to get boxed in.

"It's time to turn the page on division," he said. "What brings us together as Americans is that sense of hope, the audacity to believe that the way the world is today is not the way it has to be."

A "mixed" audience of 1,400 -- the largest ever for the state's annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner (named for presidents Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson) -- applauded uproariously. But the truth of the matter is, each time the country has turned the page on division, more of it showed up on the next page.

"Will his race be a factor? Absolutely," said Tonza Ruffin, a lawyer from Windsor, N.C., who came to hear Obama. "He will have to go above and beyond to prove that he is capable of doing the job, more so than some of his white counterparts."

When asked the same question, Delthema Allen, a registered nurse also from Windsor, declared: "Absolutely not. Skin color is superficial." When asked what she thought of those who have questioned whether Obama is "black enough," she said, "He's black enough for me."

What happened to just being human? Virginia certainly had a hand in crushing that notion, enacting in 1691, for instance, legislation to ban marriages between free people of African descent and those of European descent. When human nature refused to cooperate, Virginia found a way to keep the social fiction going. In 1924, state officials passed the Virginia Racial Integrity Act, which relied on quackery in the form of the "one-drop rule." Anybody with "one drop of black blood" was black, according to the law, and was prohibited from marrying a "pure white." The color line had become a Gordian knot of racism.

According to a recent survey by Zogby International, a majority of whites, 55 percent, classified Obama as "biracial," and 66 percent of blacks classified him as black. To some, it was ridiculous to question whether Obama was "authentically black" when he was embraced by so many black people. But assigning him to that category only tightens the knot.

Otis Lucas, who manages a group home in Richmond, tried this approach: "It's a very exciting dynamic. He's black and he's white and he's right." But that doesn't cut it, either.

Obama hinted at the crux of the problem when he paid homage to civil rights pioneers. "I stand on the shoulders of hundreds of giants, thousands of people who fought the good fight for so long," he said. And just what were they fighting? A category called white -- and the presumption of racial superiority that came with it. That left blacks with two choices: embrace their skin color with pride or accept it as a mark of racial inferiority. But both options were biological fraud. There is simply no such thing as race.

DOJ_NMG_0134695

In 1989, Virginians elected L. Douglas Wilder the nation's "first black" governor since Reconstruction. As the grandson of slaves, the silver-haired statesman epitomized the quantum leaps that black people have made in their trek from slavery to freedom. Wilder demonstrated how far we had come.

Now Obama is showing us how far we have to go.

During a visit to the Virginia Capitol, Obama gazed at the restored White House of the Confederacy just a few blocks away and said, "This reminds us that the country has an enormous capacity for change."

But nearly 400 years after the first Africans arrived in Jamestown and were put to work as slaves, Obama is being shackled by racial categories.

And the color line stretches on.

Clinton Seeks Aid For Minority Students (AP)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton on Tuesday criticized President Bush's education policy as doing little to help minorities and acknowledged that she is still searching for ways to raise minority student test scores.

More needs to be done to prepare children for school and to get parents involved in their education, Clinton said while visiting a historic black neighborhood during her first campaign trip to Florida since announcing her candidacy. She said Bush's No Child Left Behind Act isn't providing a solution for raising test scores.

"This achievement gap is deeply troubling to me," Clinton said. "If we don't invest in our children, our society and our economy will decline. This is not just something nice to do, this is something that we have to do."

Clinton, a New York senator and former first lady, spoke and took questions for an hour from the mostly black audience of 300 in the Liberty City neighborhood. The event was sandwiched between fundraisers in Tampa, Miami and Hollywood that were closed to the press.

The federal government can do more to help minority businesses by writing a road map for banks' roles in the communities, Clinton said.

"We've got to change our laws so that they inspire and motivate more lending institutions to look at how they can serve the entire community again," she said. "We've got to get them to look at a community even if they are multinational banks and we can do that through regulation and law."

Clinton also called for microlending programs and helping business owners to develop stronger business plans so they are more credit worthy.

The Liberty City event was a signal that Clinton is going to fight hard to keep black voters on her side in a primary race in which Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who is black, is gaining popularity.

"The black community is betwixt and between. We all love Clinton, but at the same time Obama has a lot of people who love him in the community, too," said Hans Ottinot, a 38-year-old Haitian-American lawyer who grew up in the neighborhood.

"She's showing us, 'Look, the black community has been a major supporter and I want to keep you as a major supporter.' It's a clear message. I don't think it was subtle," Ottinot said.

After the community meeting, Clinton attended a $100-per-ticket cocktail reception in Hollywood, which was followed by a reception at $2,500 per person.

Her campaign announced endorsements from Florida Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz and Alcee Hastings, whose Broward County district is predominantly black.

The Mononym Platform (NYT)

By Peter Funt

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

THERE'S something missing in Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's recently unveiled presidential campaign, something so conspicuous in its absence that it's certain to set off debate — not on Pennsylvania Avenue, but on Madison Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0134696

What's missing is her surname. Someone has apparently decided that Mrs. Clinton will be the first major single-name candidate since 1952, when Ike's P.R. gurus realized that "Eisenhower" was tough to fit on a bumper sticker.

Mrs. Clinton announced her intentions via the Internet on a Web site called "Hillary for President." Incredibly, on the day of her announcement, the name "Clinton" did not appear anywhere in the long text on the site's home page — except when linking to articles from The Associated Press and The Washington Post, and at the very bottom in the obligatory fine print: "Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President Exploratory Committee."

In an apparent attempt to model her marketing on the likes of Madonna, Beyoncé and Cher, Mrs. Clinton's site proclaimed: "Today, Hillary took the first step ..." and "Send Hillary a message of support ..." and "Hillary is the Democrats' best shot."

As New Yorkers may recall, Mrs. Clinton gradually became comfortable presenting herself as simply "Hillary" in both of her Senate campaigns. But what works in New York, where tabloid newspapers are fond of calling her "Hill," may not play on the national stage. A close inspection of the site reveals how determined its designers were to cleanse the campaign of the Clinton name. In the senator's 1,937-word biography, the name "Clinton" appears just once, halfway in ("she followed her heart and a man named Bill Clinton to Arkansas"). That's it. "Hillary" appears 38 times.

Mrs. Clinton had little choice but to use her full name in her Web address, yet she meticulously avoided it in the actual title. Why? Is it because she doesn't wish to draw attention to her marriage to the former president? (Doubtful, her husband is now a draw.) More likely it's because she knows that she's the only candidate whose name lends itself to Oprah-ization.

Organizers for John Edwards and John McCain presumably considered, and rejected, naming their sites "John for President." And it's hard to imagine that President Bush would have gotten much traction from a site titled "George for President."

The real genius in Mrs. Clinton's approach is that it trumps Senator Barack Obama. He can't possibly win with a "Barack for President" site. The only thing less compelling would be a site that made use of his middle name: Hussein for President.

If nothing else, Mrs. Clinton has shifted attention away from the nagging question of whether America is ready for a female president. She clearly prefers to have voters wonder whether America is ready for a president who wishes to be known exclusively by her first name.

Democrats Turn Nevada Into Political Boomtown (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 21, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. — It all came down to Nevada in the presidential election on NBC's The West Wing last year. Now Nevada is politics central in real life, overrun with Democratic White House candidates hoping to win the state's new early caucuses next year.

With eight prospects participating in a forum today, this small state capital is experiencing a crush of attention usually reserved for places like Keene, N.H. or Davenport, Iowa. "This is a whole new ballgame," says D. Taylor, president of the 60,000-member Culinary Union. He goes by his first initial.

Nevada's sudden clout arises from its new Jan. 19 slot on the Democratic primary calendar, between the Iowa caucuses (Jan. 14) and the New Hampshire primary that start the nomination season. Two questions surround Nevada: Can the state pull it off? Will New Hampshire, now slated for Jan. 22, move earlier to stay second?

The Democrats' elevation of Nevada reflects their rising hopes for political success in Western states. President Bush won Nevada by less than 3 percentage points in 2004.

"If they want to be elected president … they have to win the West now," says Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "That's why the caucuses are here and the convention will be in Denver."

Nevada adds diversity to the crucial early phase of the Democratic nomination process in ways that go well beyond geography. It is fast-growing — it fell to second place last year in growth rate after spending 19 years in first, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. It is nearly one-quarter Hispanic. The state also has more than 166,000 union members — nearly 15% of the Nevada workforce, compared with 12% nationally. Unions are growing. One example: The Culinary Union has tripled in the past 15 years.

DOJ_NMG_0134697

Jean Hessburg, who ran the Iowa caucuses in 2004, now is managing the Nevada caucuses and says she expects them to be as big a draw for candidates as Iowa. "None of them is secure enough to skip a state" early on, she says. "They'll all play. You can tell that even now."

Today's forum, sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, is the first of at least five multicandidate events between now and the caucuses. With the exception of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, all of the Democratic prospects RSVP'd yes. Obama pleaded a scheduling conflict and, warding off hard feelings, campaigned in the state last weekend.

State Senate Minority Leader Dina Titus gets a taste of her new powerbroker role this morning. She scheduled back-to-back, 45-minute meet-and-greets, complete with coffee and Danish, for New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd. Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden had breakfast with legislators Tuesday.

"We're very excited," Titus says. "The Republicans are regretting they didn't do something like this."

Actually not, says Zac Moyle, executive director of the Nevada GOP, which holds a primary in April 2008. He says Republican presidential candidates visit the state often while Democrats are just showing up now. Furthermore, he says, they're playing catch-up because "over the last 10 years, Republicans have had the better grass-roots organization."

Still, he says, "Any time Nevada gets attention, that's a good thing."

Reid and other Western Democrats say they expect candidates will be talking more about Western issues such as land and water use. Nevada Democrats plan to use the caucuses to strengthen their party.

Eric Herzik, a political scientist at the University of Nevada in Reno, says they could be on the right track. "Anything they can do to get the mobilization started should help them," he says.

Jon Ralston, a columnist and commentator on state politics, says Democrats "failed miserably at outreach" in the last two elections and wonders if they can overcome a huge vote deficit in rural Nevada, where turnout is high.

Overall turnout in general elections here is weak, dragged down by low turnout in urban areas such as Las Vegas. In 2000, less than 44% of the voting-age population turned out — one of the lowest rates in the nation. In 2004, when Nevada's mid-February caucuses drew no special attention, about 10,000 Democrats showed.

"This is a big experiment," says Titus. "Everybody works around the clock. People don't belong to organizations much. They don't have neighborhood coffee shops." But there are other ways to reach potential voters, she says, such as through their unions and during shift changes at hotels and casinos.

The shift work causes concerns about participation on caucus day, says Hessburg. In Iowa, caucuses are held on a single evening in libraries, high schools, living rooms and firehouses.

Here, she says, Democrats are discussing ways to make the Nevada caucuses more accessible to shift workers. One idea would be to create a "precinct" that consists of workers at a certain hotel on a certain shift, then holding a caucus in the hotel ballroom at lunch hour.

Another challenge for Democrats is to register and activate Hispanics. Titus says their turnout is "notoriously low." She says help may come from the Southwest Voter Registration and Education Project and the campaign of New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who is Hispanic.

Titus and other top Democrats say they will endorse a candidate at some point. Reid, however, says he doubts he will: "I have to work with four of these folks running."

Three Questions On Iraq War Must Be Put To Obama, Edwards (HILL)

By Lanny Davis

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Who won the issue of whether a vote for the 2002 Iraq war resolution was or was not a “mistake” at the time, I have three questions for former Democratic North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Democratic Illinois Sen. Barack Obama that, for some reason, at least as far as I know, no one in the press has yet asked:

First, did you believe in October 2002 that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction — at least chemical and biological weapons, and possibly the beginnings of a nuclear program?

DOJ_NMG_0134698

If the answer is yes (which I am assuming, since virtually everyone else did, including the majority of Senate Democrats who voted for the war resolution), then the second question is:

Do you still say it would have been a mistake to vote for the authorization even if you believed that Saddam in fact had WMD?

If the answer to that question is yes — and that appears to be the case as of now — then the third question must be asked and answered:

What would you have done to cause Saddam to dismantle and give up the WMD, once and for all?

A realistic, concrete answer is called for — especially because Mr. Edwards implicitly, if not explicitly, has criticized Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) for not stating she made a "mistake" in voting for the resolution. (Obama, it must be said, has not taken any shots directly at Clinton on this issue — as contrasted to John Edwards, although he reminds audiences that he was opposed to the war resolution, albeit while he was an Illinois state, not U.S., Senator.)

If their answer is to keep the U.N. inspection in place and to not worry about Saddam's ability to hide the WMD in a hole in the desert or sell them to al Qaeda, then they should at least admit that that is a fairly major gamble in the case they turn out to be wrong. And they should at least concede to someone else making the good-faith judgment that Saddam needed to be taken out to avoid this danger. To repeat — a majority of U.S. Democratic senators made the same judgment, and only two — Sens. Edwards and John Kerry (D-Mass.) — have said their vote was a "mistake" — but without being forced to answer these three follow-up questions.

It isn't really credible for Mr. Edwards and Sen. Obama to say now that they never believed Saddam had WMD back then. That must be deemed wisdom gained by hindsight — since neither one said so at the time (Obama as a state senator not facing the reality of having to cast the October 2002 Senate war authorization vote and John Edwards voting for it).

They can't duck these questions if they are allowing (or encouraging) the anti-war Democratic electorate to pressure candidates to admit they made a "mistake."

Although I am an ardent Iraq war critic and from the earliest days had serious doubts about granting the president discretionary authority to go to preemptive war in October 2002, I believe Sen. Clinton (whom I am supporting for president) has shown integrity and courage in refusing to pander to state that the vote at the time was a "mistake" — given the information and belief she had concerning Saddam's WMD AND the clear conditions she set in her Senate speech explaining her vote. First she stated her belief that Saddam had WMD and was ready to use them.

"It is clear … that if left unchecked," she said on the Senate floor, "Saddam Hussein will continue to increase his capacity to wage biological and chemical warfare, and will keep trying to develop nuclear weapons."

Second, she said she trusted President Bush to comply with two understandings about his use of the authorization power — that he wouldn't "rush to war" without allies and international support and that he would go to war only as a "last resort."

As she said on the Senate floor prior to her vote:

"A vote for the [the resolution] is not a vote to rush to war; it is a vote that puts awesome responsibility in the hands of our president and we say to him: Use these powers wisely and as a last resort …"

If she (and a majority of her Democratic senatorial colleagues) made a mistake, it was not the vote to authorize, based as it was on a belief in Saddam's WMD, but in trusting President Bush to comply with both of those understandings.

When she was in New Hampshire several weeks ago she stated, now with the benefit of hindsight, that she would not have voted for the resolution had she known then what she knows now — indeed, she notes that there would have been no vote at all, meaning the Democrats would and could have blocked a vote.

So the next time Mr. Edwards and Sen. Obama are in New Hampshire, the same questioner who insisted on Sen. Clinton admitting to the vote as a "mistake" in fairness should ask them these three questions.

The irony here is that Sen. Clinton is often criticized for seeming to be too calculating and opportunistic in taking positions on issues. Yet here she is standing on the truth and the facts known at the time, and refusing to pander and rewrite history.

Will Sen. Obama and Mr. Edwards at least grant her position as one of consistency, taken in good faith?

DOJ_NMG_0134699

Lanny Davis writes for The Hill website's Pundits Blog (pundits.thehill.com). He is a partner in the Washington, D.C. office of the law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe. A resident of Potomac, Md., he has authored several books and been a commentator on many TV political programs.

The Latino Revolution (HILL)

The Hill, February 21, 2007

A revolution is underway among America's Latino population that will have profound implications for the future of American politics. Of the 41.3 million Hispanics in the United States today, 37 percent identify themselves as "born-again" or "evangelical." Just 10 years ago, the proportion that did so was about 15 percent. All told, there are now about 11 million Evangelical Protestant and 3 million Evangelical or Charismatic Catholic Latinos in the United States. In 1996, there were only 4 million.

This explosive growth in Evangelical religious affiliation among Latinos — about 1 million converts annually — portends huge changes for American politics. With the Latino population swelling from 22 million in 1990 to 41 million in 2004, any change of these proportions in the beliefs of Hispanic-Americans will have a momentous impact on politics.

Evangelicals, of any race or ethnicity, are fertile ground for Republicans and may provide a huge opening to swing the formerly Democratic Hispanic vote toward a more even-handed stance or even make it a core element of an emerging Republican majority.

I recently met with Rev. Sam Rodriquez, the leader of the national association of Evangelical Latino churches. He's a Republican dream: pro-life, anti-gay marriage, and a Bush voter. He notes that the growing religious faith and the increase in Evangelical enrollment — particularly in the Pentecostal Church — may presage a sea change in Hispanic political affiliations.

Unfortunately, the hostile reception immigration reform has received from the GOP side of the aisle in Washington is turning off the very voters the Republicans can now, for the first time, hope to attract to their side. Based on a fear of Democratic domination of the Hispanic vote, Republican insistence on barring the way to citizenship and voting rights for undocumented or illegal immigrants may drive these very potential Republican supporters back into Democratic arms.

The Latino population is clearly the jump ball in American politics. While now only 8 percent of the registered voters — but 14 percent of the population — the Hispanic vote is going to swell in the coming decade and tip the 50-50 balance now prevailing between the two parties. Red states like Texas, Arizona and Florida may become sharply and suddenly blue when Hispanic voting reaches its full potential among those currently here, not to count those who will come in the future. Texas, for example, is now a majority-minority state in population. Its GOP affiliation is an artifact of the past if the Hispanic vote goes Democratic.

But the fervent religiosity and increasing support for Evangelical positions and thinking among Hispanics may be the saving grace for the GOP if they let it happen. According to the Rev. Rodriquez, half of Evangelical conversions among American Latinos occur in their home country; half take place after they enter the United States. The handwriting is clearly on the wall — traditional Catholicism is on the wane among America's Hispanics. Can Democratic affiliation be similarly in danger?

In 2000, Gore carried America's Hispanics by 30 points. But Bush's ardent cultivation of the Latino vote paid off in 2004 and Kerry carried them by only 10 points. However, the best efforts of Republican congressmen like Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) succeeded only in driving Latinos back into the arms of Democrats: They voted Democratic in 2006 by 47 points.

It's time for the Republican Party to start thinking of its future and embrace the basic tenets of immigration reform to win the inevitably increasing proportion of the U.S. vote cast by Hispanics.

It is pure folly to say that we will force 11 million people back across the border in order to obtain legal entry. Such a forced population movement would be unparalleled in American history and would be reminiscent of German-Polish-Russian forced migrations during the years right before, during, and after World War II.

Immigration reform calls for an earned path to citizenship that most Americans can and should support. If Latinos work, pay taxes, do not commit crimes, and learn English for several years, they should be able to become citizens. These requirements are not applied to any other immigrants and are due penance for illegal entry into the United States.

It's time Republicans awakened to the political opportunities of Evangelical Hispanic conversions and got with the program.

DOJ_NMG_0134700

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race." To get all of Dick Morris's and Eileen McGann's columns for free by email, go to www.dickmorris.com.

Biden's Son Sues Ex-Partner (WP/BLOOM)

By Jenny Strasburg And Thom Weidlich

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

R. Hunter Biden, a Washington lobbyist, accused a former business partner of lying about his professional credentials and finances after they agreed to buy a hedge fund investment firm in 2006, according to a complaint in New York state court.

Biden, son of Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), and James Biden, the senator's brother, countersued Anthony Lotito Jr. on Feb. 13, saying he hid debts and falsely claimed he held securities licenses to lure them as partners in the planned $21.3 million acquisition. Lotito also persuaded the Bidens to hire a lawyer who had been convicted of fraud, according to the complaint.

"Had James and Hunter Biden known the truth about Anthony Lotito, they never would have gone into business with him," says the complaint, which accuses Lotito of fraud and seeks at least $10 million.

Lotito, 49, sued the Bidens on Jan. 5, claiming that they illegally excluded him from a takeover of New York-based Paradigm Cos. while negotiating a better deal for themselves. The Bidens now control Paradigm. The dispute highlights Hunter Biden's unusual dual roles as lobbyist and investment executive at a time when hedge funds face greater regulatory scrutiny.

Hunter Biden, 37, stepped down last month from daily oversight of Paradigm Global Advisors, a unit of Paradigm, which has about $500 million in client money invested in hedge funds. Biden became chairman of the firm, founded in 1991. He remains a lobbyist with Oldaker, Biden & Belair of the District, where he is partner and founder. James Biden, 57, is not involved in Paradigm's management.

Last year, the Bidens agreed to a partnership with Lotito that would pay him $25,000 a month to find investors for the Paradigm buyout, with an Oct. 31 deadline to close the transaction. Lotito "failed to secure even one investor" and all agreed in September to end the partnership, LBB Holdings USA, according to the Bidens' complaint.

They also claim that Lotito "fraudulently induced them" to hire John Fasciana, a New York lawyer, to represent the partnership in negotiations with Paradigm. Fasciana had been convicted in July 2005 on federal charges of conspiracy and wire and mail fraud related to a scheme to steal millions of dollars from Electronic Data Systems of Plano, Tex., the world's second-largest computer-services company. Fasciana was sentenced in November to four years in prison. He has appealed.

Separately, Fasciana sued the Bidens and Lotito in August, seeking $198,000 in legal fees he says they owe him. The Bidens denied the claim in November and countersued Fasciana, saying he overbilled and defrauded them by hiding his conviction.

In his lawsuit, Lotito is seeking at least $100 million on claims of fraud and breach of fiduciary duty. He says the Bidens lied to him while agreeing Aug. 11 to take over Paradigm for an $8.1 million promissory note, or guarantee of payment.

Lotito says the Bidens, as his partners in LBB, were obligated to inform him of their competing bid for Paradigm. Instead, Lotito claims, they told him that the firm had "substantial liabilities" and little chance of success.

Lotito claims that he introduced Hunter Biden to Paradigm executives in January 2006 to help Biden find work outside of lobbying. According to Lotito's complaint, Sen. Biden said he was concerned that Hunter Biden's lobbying might affect his planned presidential campaign.

"It is apparent that Mr. Lotito is only invoking Senator Biden's name to garner media attention," Alan Hoffman, the senator's chief of staff, said in an e-mail yesterday. The senator is not a defendant in Lotito's complaint.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Any allies left?

DOJ_NMG_0134701

A White House pool report described yesterday's arrival of Vice President Dick Cheney in Tokyo, where he was "greeted by some extremely loud sound trucks" and "one unmistakable chant blaring from one of the trucks in a Japanese-accented male voice, chanting in English: 'Yankee go home, Yankee go home.' "

Stretched thin

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee that FBI referrals for counterterrorism cases increased a whopping 671 percent between 2001 and 2003 -- and to this day require "difficult choices in determining how to most effectively use the available agents" -- did not go unheeded.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware has introduced legislation to add 1,000 FBI agents to the bureau's roster, all to focus exclusively on traditional criminal cases. Estimated cost: $160 million per year.

Gone private

Ambassador Cofer Black, the former ambassador-at-large and coordinator for counterterrorism at the State Department, and Rob Richer, who was the CIA's No. 2 for counterintelligence, will create a new "CIA-type" organization to address intelligence needs in the private sector.

"Terror attacks," "political instability," "avian-flu outbreaks," and even severe weather events will be on the radar of the company, which the pair names Total Intelligence Solutions.

Don't slurp

One-hundred guests at Teatro Goldoni's "Carnevale" last night were certainly watching their manners.

Judith Martin, aka "Miss Manners," was honorary queen at the lavish Save Venice Benefit, seated alongside honorary king Eric Denker, curator and senior lecturer at the National Gallery of Art.

The popular etiquette columnist and author of 12 books, who spent part of her youth in Europe, has a new release due out next month, "No Vulgar Hotel: The Desire And Pursuit of Venice." Considered the definitive manual for the hopeless Venetophile, she emphasizes:

"Love of Venice can strike anyone, not just romantic [weaklings]. Among the toughies with serious cases were Lord Byron, Richard Wagner, Ezra Pound and Ernest Hemingway. There is no cure for this affliction."

After an evening of Venetian cuisine and wine presented by Teatro's chef-owner Fabrizio Aielli and Marco Bolla, owner of Ristorante Lineadombra in Venice, guests were indeed "stricken" with Venetian charm.

Stone by stone

It's some two years behind schedule and about double the anticipated cost, but the much-anticipated underground U.S. Capitol Visitor Center just about has its final stone in place.

At nearly 580,000 square feet, or three-quarters the size of the U.S. Capitol itself, this $600 million polished cellar features a Great Hall, Exhibition Hall, congressional auditorium and Senate and House theaters, accented with marble, granite, solid wood, bronze and glass -- both floor panels and skylights.

Stone masons have placed the Tennessee Valley marble in basket-weave patterns, while on the Rotunda level the last stones are now being set at a pace of 70 per day.

Major construction should wrap up in the next few weeks, with a likely grand opening in early 2008.

Beats checkers

Jim Martin, president of the 60 Plus Association, the nonpartisan seniors advocacy group in Washington, is sitting at home convalescing from neck surgery 10 days ago.

"Who says basketball is not a contact sport?" Mr. Martin said when reached yesterday. "I'm wearing a neck brace for four more weeks, but this is the price I pay to be able to play in the Senior Olympics in mid-June in Louisville, Kentucky."

Mr. Martin's squad of seniors are the Virginia state basketball champions, and play three-on-three.

Professor Norton

That was Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, D.C. Democrat, bragging about the 100th anniversary of Hoyas basketball at Georgetown University, which is in the midst of another exciting season under head coach John Thompson III.

Mrs. Norton, many don't know, is a tenured faculty member of Georgetown University Law Center.

DOJ_NMG_0134702

•John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

What Does One Woman's Death Say About The Rest Of Us? (USAT)

By Douglas MacKinnon

USA Today, February 21, 2007

As our nation and world seemingly spin out of control, it's easy to understand why the passing of a proud, incredibly decent 65-year-old woman living alone would escape our attention.

Our somewhat fragile and overloaded minds can process only so much negative news at a time. With Iraq, Iran, the constant threat of terrorism, declining health care and global warming claiming center stage, we can certainly be excused if the death of one lonely individual went unnoticed.

But how this woman died should be of interest to us all.

On Jan. 17, Bessie Sanders of Washington was killed in a house fire. It was determined by the fire department that "Ms. Bessie," as she was known to neighbors, lost her life when the candle she was using for illumination in her bedroom accidentally started a fire. During the coldest part of the year, Ms. Bessie was using a candle for light because her electricity, gas and water had all been shut off.

In this country, the last remaining superpower, an elderly woman needlessly perished when her government failed her. Even as friends and neighbors alerted the District of Columbia that Ms. Bessie's utilities needed to be reactivated, according to The Washington Post, the bureaucracy apparently failed to do so because she did not personally make the call, and a Social Security number was not provided. District officials said they had no record of her asking for assistance.

Every winter, in most major cold-weather cities, stories such as Ms. Bessie's can be found. Of course, I'm willing to concede that I am sensitive to such news because most of my childhood was spent without electricity, gas, heating oil, water or phones. I grew up in abject poverty, living in Boston and parts of New England, and every winter was a crisis for my family. If my parents had no money for heating oil, we would use the gas stove to heat our home. If the gas was turned off, but we still had electricity, we would use space heaters. If all were shut off, my brother, sister and I often would go to sleep on the same mattress, covered by a thin blanket, watching our breath frost as we tried to stop shivering.

Like Ms. Bessie, we had to endure this pain because my parents refused to ask friends or family for help. Because of pride, shame or ignorance, three kids many years ago suffered, and an elderly woman of today died.

Iraq, terrorism, natural disasters and gang violence continue to fill our TV screens while, make no mistake, many of our fellow Americans go to sleep each winter night with no heat. How many of them, like Ms. Bessie, don't survive the experience? Clearly it happens, clearly it's preventable, and clearly it's a disgrace.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimate that about 600 Americans die each year from exposure to the cold. Many of them have incomes that fall below the poverty line, and many are elderly. Keep in mind, those 600 deaths do not include people such as Ms. Bessie, who lose their lives to the cold because of fire or carbon monoxide-related accidents.

After the loss of Ms. Bessie, Terry Lynch, executive director of the non-profit Downtown Clusters of Congregations, told The Washington Post that instead of sending letters offering help to those whose utilities have been shut off, maybe government officials should go door to door. Better than the government, neighbors and families need to go door to door. If not us, who?

In today's world, it's more crucial than ever to hold tightly to family and friends. Let the bad news we cannot control wash over our overloaded senses, and let us instead focus on the individual just down the street who may literally live or die based on our actions.

Ms. Bessie did not make it, but there are thousands like her who still need our help.

What's it going to be?

Douglas MacKinnon is a former White House and Pentagon official and author of America's Last Days.

Cheney Reassures Japan On NKorea (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

AFP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134703

US Vice President Dick Cheney reassured Japan that the breakthrough North Korea nuclear deal was a "good first step" after a worried Tokyo refused to fund the pact.

Cheney opened talks here at the start of a Pacific visit to close US allies Japan and Australia meant to step up cooperation over North Korea and war-torn Iraq.

Japan was one of six nations involved in marathon talks in Beijing last week that led to an agreement for North Korea to shut key nuclear facilities in exchange for badly needed fuel oil.

But Japan has refused to provide energy aid to the nuclear-armed communist regime until it resolves an emotionally charged row over the past kidnappings of Japanese nationals.

The vice president discussed the kidnappings among other issues in a breakfast meeting with Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki, said Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride.

Cheney told the Japanese government's number-two that the North Korea deal was "a good first step," McBride said. "They agreed to work together to watch North Korea."

The conservative vice president was due to meet later Wednesday with Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who has built his career on the abduction issue, and Foreign Minister Taro Aso.

Cheney was later welcomed at the palace by Emperor Akihito, who bowed and then shook his hand and said their meeting would strengthen the US-Japan alliance.

He was due later to address US troops onboard the USS Kitty Hawk which is docked south of Tokyo.

At Japan's request, the vice president added a last-minute meeting Thursday with Sakie and Shigeru Yokota, the parents of the most famous abduction victim, Megumi Yokota.

Megumi was a 13-year-old schoolgirl when she was bundled aboard a North Korean ship off Japan's western coast in 1977. Pyongyang has admitted kidnapping her but says she is dead.

Her case has triggered an outpouring of sympathy in Japan and growing international attention, including a song about her plight released Wednesday by Paul Stookey of famed US folk trio Peter, Paul and Mary.

Her mother met President George W. Bush at the White House last year.

On the eve of his meeting with Cheney, Abe met the families of the abduction victims and vowed never to establish diplomatic ties with North Korea until the cases are settled.

Japan sees itself as a top target of North Korea, which fired a missile over the country's main island in 1998, and has championed a hard line against the isolated regime.

But since his Republican Party was trounced in November elections, Bush has increasingly backed diplomacy to resolve problems with North Korea, which in 2002 he said was part of an "axis of evil" with Iran and Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

Cheney is not scheduled to meet Japanese Defence Minister Fumio Kyuma, who caused a stir in January when he said Bush was "wrong" to invade Iraq. He also accused Washington of failing to address local concerns in Okinawa, which is home to half the 40,000 US troops in Japan.

Cheney will later head to Australia, where Prime Minister John Howard has talked of sending up to 70 additional military instructors to Iraq and deploying more troops in Afghanistan.

He will also meet opposition leader Kevin Rudd, who has refused to back any increase in troops to Iraq. Rudd overtook Howard in an opinion poll last week.

Cheney's Visit To Japan Exposes Tensions (FT)

By David Pilling

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Fumio Kyuma, Japan' s outspoken defence minister, on Tuesday felt obliged to explain why he would not be meeting Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, who on Wednesday begins a visit to Japan during which security will take centre stage.

Mr Cheney, Mr Kyuma explained, could not be expected to meet a mere defence minister. "There is a difference in rank. It is a matter that pertains to the [Japanese] prime minister," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134704

Behind Mr Kyuma's humble remarks lie an awkward diplomatic moment. Earlier this month he lashed out at US foreign policy, saying Washington was wrong to invade Iraq and lambasting its arrogant attitude towards Okinawa, the island where the bulk of US troops in Japan are stationed.

Tokyo remains Washington's main regional ally, and the relationship is ro-bust enough to survive minor disagreements, analysts say. Yet Mr Kyuma's remarks provoked outrage among Japan-handlers in the Bush administration and the embarrassment that has followed is one of several points of contention.

Japan continues to support US policy in Iraq, a point recently underlined by Shinzo Abe, prime minister, in a speech to Nato and again in parliament.

However, Taro Aso, foreign minister, suggested that Washington's post-invasion strategy had been naive.

Tokyo has begun to pull out 550 ground troops stationed in Iraq to help reconstruction. It has also, however, stepped up the activity of its air self-defence force, which helps to supply US troops in Iraq.

There has also been concern in Japan about the deal struck with North Korea to shut down its main nuclear facility in exchange for oil. Some Japanese officials have, sotto voce, criticised Washington for conceding too much to Pyongyang.

Robert Dujarric, a security expert at the National Institute for Public Policy in the US, said: "The impression is that the deal was hammered out between the US, China and North Korea and that no one asked the Japanese what they thought."

In particular, Mr Abe's government has been embarrassed by the fact that the deal did not address North Korean abductions of Japanese citizens, although a senior foreign ministry official has countered claims Japan had been sidelined.

"I don't think it is the policy of the US to speed ahead at 100 miles per hour and leave behind all the other issues, including the abduction issue," the official said. "All the other five parties, including North Korea, know there needs to be a huge participation by Japan."

US Visit To Asia Likely To Shore Up N-deal (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

John Negroponte's first mission as US deputy secretary of state is expected to take him to Asia next week to shore up last week's breakthrough deal with North Korea, under which Pyongyang is to close its nuclear bomb-making facilities in return for aid and peace talks.

Mr Negroponte, the former national director of intelligence who took up his new post last week, would visit China, South Korea and Japan, officials said.

One said Mr Negroponte also planned to add Pyongyang to his itinerary, though others either denied this or said such a trip was unlikely at this stage. A US state department spokesman said only: "We have nothing to announce at this time."

Mr Negroponte would be the most senior US official to visit Pyongyang since Madeleine Albright, then secretary of state, in October 2000.

Last month the Bush administration abandoned its opposition to bilateral talks with North Korea by allowing Christopher Hill, its chief negotiator, to engage directly his North Korean counterpart in talks in Berlin.

That led to the breakthrough at Chinese-brokered talks in Beijing on February 13, after nearly 18 months of impasse.

The Bush administration, in particular Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has been fiercely criticised by Washington hawks over last week's deal. Officials admitted that a high-level visit to Pyongyang would be controversial internally.

David Frum, analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, wrote that the deal with North Korea contained no more safeguards against cheating than the failed agreement between Pyongyang and the US in 1994.

Under that deal, North Korea agreed to freeze its Yongbyon nuclear facility but the deal fell apart in 2002 when the Bush administration accused the communist regime of secretly enriching uranium. Pyongyang then expelled United Nations inspectors and resumed operations at Yongbyon, which culminated in its first nuclear test last October.

Mr Frum warned that the current deal, which involves the US removing North Korea from its list of state sponsors of terrorism, would harm close relations with Japan, which has an unresolved issue over citizens kidnapped by North Korea.

Meanwhile, Dick Cheney, US vice-president, arrived in Japan yesterday on an Asian trip that will take him on to Australia.

DOJ_NMG_0134705

John Howard, the Australian prime minister, said on Tuesday that George W. Bush had phoned him for a lengthy discussion on North Korea. “The president is realistically optimistic,” Mr Howard said of the prospects for the deal with North Korea.

Robert Einhorn, a proliferation expert who was part of the US delegation to Pyongyang in 2000, said a high-level visit to North Korea was important to sustain momentum. But he thought Mr Hill would be more likely than Mr Negroponte to become the first senior US official to visit Pyongyang.

Mr Einhorn described some of the actions required of North Korea in the first 60 days of the agreement as “textbook” measures, including the return of UN inspectors and installation of fresh seals on equipment. at the Yongbyon facility.

But he said other steps, namely that North Korea list all its nuclear programmes, were likely to be more contentious.

Iran Sets Condition To Halt Nuke Program (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, February 21, 2007

Iran's chief nuclear envoy said Tuesday his country wants to negotiate over its uranium enrichment program, on the eve of a U.N. Security Council deadline that carries the threat of harsher sanctions. But the country's hard-line president said Iran will halt enrichment only if Western nations do the same.

Sanctions could be triggered by a report from Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, to his agency's 35 board-member nations, expected Wednesday. That report is expected to say Iran has expanded enrichment activities instead of freezing them.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, speaking to a crowd of thousands in Iran, said his country was ready to stop its enrichment program, but only if Western nations do the same — something the United States and others with similar programs are unlikely to even consider.

"Justice demands that those who want to hold talks with us shut down their nuclear fuel cycle program too," he said. "Then, we can hold dialogue under a fair atmosphere."

The White House dismissed Ahmadinejad's call.

"Do you believe that's a serious offer?" White House press secretary Tony Snow asked. "It's pretty clear that the international community has said to the Iranians, `You can have nuclear power but we don't want you to have the ability to build nuclear weapons.' And that is an offer we continue to make."

Nevertheless, Ahmadinejad's speech was unusually conciliatory, avoiding fiery denunciations of the West. Iran's call for talks — voiced separately on Tuesday by Ahmadinejad, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and senior nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani — suggested an attempt to convey flexibility on the eve of the deadline.

Mottaki, in Turkey, said talks on the nuclear dispute should try to achieve an agreement allowing "Iran to achieve its rights" while eliminating "concerns" about its nuclear ambitions. Larijani, in Vienna, said his country was "looking for ways and means to start negotiations."

But the officials did not offer what the Security Council is demanding — an immediate and unconditional stop to enrichment. Iran has long insisted that it will not stop its nuclear activities as a condition for negotiations to start.

The United States and its allies suspect that Iran is using its nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel, but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb.

Asked what Iran was seeking, Larijani said: "Constructive dialogue that could ... address the concerns" of both Tehran, which insists on enrichment as its right, and the world powers that fear the program would be used to develop nuclear arms.

While telling reporters his country was prepared to deliver "assurances that there would be no deviation ... toward a nuclear weapons program," he offered no new suggestions — and indirectly ruled out suspending enrichment, saying that was just a "pretext" to put political pressure on his country.

Larijani was even more direct in rejecting an enrichment freeze as a precondition for negotiations in talks with ElBaradei, according to diplomats familiar with the substance of their conversation.

DOJ_NMG_0134706

"He ruled out suspension and said Iran was not afraid of (U.N.) sanctions," one of the diplomats told The Associated Press, speaking on condition of anonymity because his information was confidential. The diplomat said Larijani told ElBaradei that Iran could consider an enrichment freeze only as a result of talks — and not before sitting down at the negotiating table.

Iran has rejected the Security Council resolution as "illegal," and said it would not give up its right to enrich under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Tehran's refusal to freeze all its enrichment-related activities prompted the U.N. Security Council on Dec. 23 to impose sanctions targeting its nuclear and missile programs and persons involved in them. Back then, it gave the country 60 days to halt enrichment or face additional measures — a deadline that expires Wednesday.

Still, no sanctions were expected immediately.

Discussions on a new resolution aimed at stepping up pressure on Iran to suspend enrichment are expected to start next week, a Security Council diplomat said in New York, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

The council debate will focus on what new nonmilitary sanctions to include in a resolution, the European diplomat said. Possible new sanctions could include a travel ban against individuals on the U.N. list, an expansion of the list, economic measures such as a ban on export guarantees to Iran, and an expansion of the nuclear embargo to an arms embargo, the council diplomat said.

But Russia and China, both veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran, are likely to oppose economic sanctions or weapons bans. A travel ban was dropped from the initial resolution because of Moscow's opposition, so tough negotiations are expected, the diplomat said.

Striking a combative note after meeting ElBaradei, Larijani warned the United States against opting for force instead of negotiations over the issue of enrichment.

"If they ... move into the boxing ring, they would have problems," Larijani told reporters in response to a question about U.S. pressure on Iran to give up enrichment. "But if they sit at the chess table, then both sides would come to a result."

With the U.S. recently moving against Iranians whom it accuses of helping Shiite militias in Iraq and beefing up its naval presence in the Persian Gulf, Larijani's comments were seen as veiled warnings that any additional U.S. weight on his country would be met in kind.

"Anybody interested in ... irrational moves ... would definitely receive an appropriate response," he said.

Iran has brought its war games maneuvers over the past year into busy shipping lanes in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow mouth of the Persian Gulf through which two-fifths of the world's oil supplies pass, the top U.S. Navy commander in the Mideast said.

The moves have alarmed U.S. officials about possible accidental confrontations that could boil over into war, and led to the recent buildup of Navy forces in the Gulf, Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh said in an interview with the AP and other reporters in Bahrain.

The carrier USS John C. Stennis — backed by a strike group with more than 6,500 sailors and Marines and with additional minesweeping ships — arrived in the region Monday. It joined the carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower after President Bush ordered the buildup as a show of strength to Iran.

U.S. Rebuffs Iran On Eve Of Deadline (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Bush administration officials dismissed Iran's unusually conciliatory comments made on the eve of a United Nations deadline to suspend uranium enrichment. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in a speech he would halt enrichment and enter "fair talks" so long as the West took similar measures. Iran's foreign minister and its main nuclear negotiator also called for talks. White House spokesman Tony Snow called Mr. Ahmadinejad's pledge a "false offer." The administration hopes to push for new sanctions next month.

Tehran Defiant As Deadline Nears (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134707

Iranian leaders yesterday vowed to defy international pressure on the eve of a United Nations deadline demanding that Tehran halt its suspect nuclear programs or face new, harsher sanctions.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the U.N. nuclear monitoring arm, is expected to announce today that Iran has failed to meet a 60-day deadline set by the U.N. Security Council to suspend enrichment of uranium, a key step in the development of nuclear weapons.

The Bush administration dismissed a new offer from hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to shut down Iran's nuclear facilities if the United States and the West do the same.

"Do you believe that's a serious offer?" said White House press secretary Tony Snow. Added State Department spokesman Tom Casey, "I'm afraid what we're seeing so far is just more of the same defiance."

Iran insists that it has the right to pursue a nuclear program for civilian power needs, but the United States and European Union say past Iranian efforts to hide the extent of its program show that Tehran is secretly pursuing nuclear weapons.

The U.N. Security Council in December approved a series of targeted sanctions on Iran's nuclear research programs. The council held out the prospect of broader sanctions if Iran did not cooperate, but stopped short of threatening military action.

No action is expected today by the Security Council. Mr. Casey said intensive negotiations are already under way among the five permanent members of the Security Council -- the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China -- about a new resolution imposing new penalties and restrictions on Iran.

Moscow and Beijing have been reluctant to back the Bush administration's hard line on Iran and successfully held out against any mention of military action against Tehran in the nuclear dispute. But U.S. officials were encouraged by reports this week that Russia may delay the delivery of fuel for a planned nuclear plant it is building for Iran in the southern city of Bushehr. A spokesman for the Russian atomic energy agency said yesterday the possible delay is because of problems in receiving payment.

"I do think it's very clear to us that the Russians share our concerns about Iran's nuclear program," Mr. Casey said.

The United States has refused to rule out military action against Iran, but President Bush has said repeatedly that he wants to solve the conflict through diplomacy.

Mr. Ahmadinejad told a gathering in northern Iran yesterday that Tehran would halt its uranium enrichment activities, but only if the United States and other nuclear powers did the same.

"If you want to speak from a position of power and make use of the oppressing leverage of some international institutions, you have to know that you will fail against the unity and resistance of the Iranian nation," he said.

Nevertheless, Mr. Ahmadinejad's speech was considered unusually conciliatory, avoiding fiery denunciations of the West.

In Vienna, Austria, Iran's chief nuclear envoy said yesterday his country wants to negotiate over its uranium enrichment program.

Ali Larijani said the impasse over Iran's nuclear programs "cannot by resolved through force and pressure."

Mr. Larijani met with IAEA Director Mohamed ElBaradei ahead of the release of today's report.

In Turkey, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said talks on the nuclear dispute should try to achieve an agreement allowing "Iran to achieve its rights" while eliminating "concerns" about its nuclear ambitions.

Iran's call for talks -- voiced separately by Mr. Ahmadinejad, Mr. Mottaki and Mr. Larijani -- suggested an attempt to convey flexibility on the eve of the deadline.

Duke University political scientist Bruce W. Jentleson, in an analysis for the Century Foundation, said it was "virtually certain" that the United Nations will stop short of a total embargo of Iran, which boasts some of the world's largest oil and natural gas reserves.

But he said more limited options are on the table, including: tougher restrictions on Iran's nuclear programs; limits of investment in Iran's energy sector; a freeze on Iranian assets abroad; a cutoff of military sales; targeted sanctions on top Iranian leaders; and general economic sanctions such as boycotting key Iranian exports, banning international flights and opposing Iran's World Trade Organization membership.

International Pressure Mounts On Iran (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0134708

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Iran was on Tuesday struggling to stave off further a fresh round of international censure as controversy over its nuclear programme continued to mount.

In Vienna, Ali Larijani, the Islamic Republic's top nuclear negotiator, met Mohamed ElBaradei, the United Nations' chief nuclear inspector, who will is due to pronounce on Tehran's nuclear activities today.

Speaking to the Financial Times this week, Mr ElBaradei did not bother to hide his near-conviction that Iran would fail to meet UN demands to curb uranium enrichment, a process that can generate both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

His observations indicate that Tehran is stepping up its commitment to a nuclear programme. Iran says its purposes are purely peaceful, but its claims protestations are viewed with increasing scepticism and disbelief. in Europe and are downright disbelieved in the US.

Yesterday, in a rhetorical flourish, Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, challenged the west to suspend its own uranium enrichment. sidestepping the argument that Tehran should not be allowed permitted such activities because it had hidden its nuclear programme. in the past.

Many western diplomats question why Iran is accelerating its enrichment activities while Bushehr, the nuclear power plant the uranium is intended to feed, is behind schedule and was delayed further this week because of Iran's alleged failure to pay its Russian contractors.

"Iran sees enrichment . . . as a strategic goal because they feel that this will bring them power, prestige and influence," Mr ElBaradei told the FT. "They feel that this will bring them into the company of some of the large and influential [states], the 12, 13 countries with enrichment processing, even if they don't have a weapon."

One common argument is that countries with an extensive enrichment infrastructure can are able to "break out to become nuclear weapon states in a matter of months.

Last year Ernst Uhrlau, the head of German intelligence, said Tehran could not would not be able to produce enough material for a nuclear bomb before 2010 and could would only be able to only make it into a weapon by only about 2015.

Mr ElBaradei's last report, issued in November, said that since August Tehran had used two "cascades" of 164 centrifuges apiece to enrich uranium in a research facility at its Tehran plants.

Spinning uranium in a system of centrifuges increases the levels of the isotope uranium 235. A level of about 3 per cent serves as nuclear fuel; a level of above 90 per cent constitutes weapons grade material.

Mr ElBaradei suggested Iran's test centrifuges were now functioning smoothly after early teething pains. He added that Iran had installed a further 164-centrifuge cascade in the subterranean facility in Natanz, and that the country could be six months to a year away from operating an industrial size cascade of 3,000 centrifuges.

If 3,000 centrifuges ran smoothly for a year, they could produce enough material for a bomb.

But Iran uses "P-1" centrifuges it acquired from the black market network of AQ Khan, the father of Pakistan's bomb. They centrifuges are copies of a copy of a Dutch model. They crash and are much flimsier and hence slower than their modern day equivalents. "Using P1s in this way is like competing at Le Mans with a Model T Ford," said a western diplomat. "You will get around in the end, but it will take much much longer."And one malfunctioning centrifuge within the cascade is enough to bring the whole cascade down.

If Iran did acquires enough fissile material with the intent to weaponise it, other stages are would still be necessary. The uranium must would have need to be cast into metal, packed into an explosive device and if it were to be targeted at other countries, fitted into a missile warhead.

Meir Dagan, the head of Israel's Mossad, the Israeli intelligence agency, in December told the Knesset that by 2008, Iran would be able to develop 25kg of highly enriched uranium – enough for a bomb – and a weapon the following year.

His calculations seem appear to assume that Iran will be able to spin the uranium without technical hitches from almost the moment that the centrifuges are installed and that Tehran will ould be able to use its mixture of imported Pakistani and North Korean technology to weaponise the material in a matter of months.

DOJ_NMG_0134709

The technical shortcomings of Iran's programme might mean it that Iran will take much longer to develop nuclear capacity. But even after today's report nobody will be able to know for sure.

Table Talk (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin And Danielle Pletka

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Iran faces a deadline today to suspend its enrichment of uranium or, according to the terms of a U.N. Security Council resolution unanimously adopted last December, face further sanctions. While it is only proper that the world wait for the deadline to pass before responding, Tehran's answer is already clear. Gholam Reza Aghzadeh, head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, has said that "Iran will not comply with the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1737."

How will the West respond? Earlier this month Sir Richard Dalton, until recently Britain's ambassador in Tehran, called for direct talks between U.S. and Iranian officials and suggested the West modify demands that the Islamic Republic suspend uranium enrichment. Unfortunately, his eagerness for dialogue is being echoed and amplified elsewhere, especially in the wake of the Bush administration's deal to pay North Korea for similar disarmament. Needless to say, former luminaries such as ex-Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and President Jimmy Carter think sitting down with the mullahs is a very good idea, Security Council resolutions notwithstanding.

Why not talk? The logic of engagement sounds good. But experience shows that engagement means something different in Iran than in the West.

In May 1992, for example, then German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel launched a "critical dialogue" with Tehran. Berlin sought to use trade and incentives to encourage the Islamic Republic to alter its behavior. And, indeed, it did. But not in the way Mr. Kinkel expected.

On Sept. 17, 1992, Iranian hit men assassinated three Iranian dissidents and their translator in a Berlin restaurant. The subsequent German investigation determined that Iranian Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei, President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and Foreign Minister Ali Velayati ordered the murders. What about the dialogue? "We don't give a damn about your ending the critical dialogue," said Supreme Leader Khamenei upon hearing the German court ruling. "We never sought such a dialogue."

Neither Iran's terrorism nor intelligence indications of an accelerating nuclear weapons program dampened European enthusiasm for engagement, however, especially after the election of President Muhammad Khatami and his subsequent call for a "dialogue of civilizations." "There is more to be said for trying to engage and to draw these societies into the international community than to cut them off," EU External Affairs Commissioner Chris Patten explained in February 2002. And engage they did.

Between 2000 and 2005, EU trade with Iran almost tripled. Officials from both sides of the Atlantic fawned on the "reformist" Mr. Khatami. But the rapprochement -- including an embarrassing "apology" for past American sins against Iran from Ms. Albright -- did not stop Mr. Khatami from flying to Moscow in March 2001 to sign a $7 billion arms and nuclear technology deal. Indeed, under Mr. Khatami, Tehran spent more on arms than it had under Hashemi Rafsanjani.

Iran's exploitation of engagement to advance its agenda is the rule rather than the exception. In December 2001, in the midst of what many cite as the heyday of Iran-U.S. cooperation in Afghanistan, Iranian forces dispatched 50 tons of weaponry to Palestinian militiamen to derail a U.S.- and European-brokered ceasefire between Israeli and Palestinian forces. On June 8, 2002, three days after a Palestinian Islamic Jihad suicide bus bomber killed 17 Israelis, the Islamic Republic announced a 70% increase in that group's funding.

Western efforts to game the Iranian system, in short, misunderstand the nature of politics in the Islamic Republic. Politicians rise and fall, but the supreme leader's authority remains supreme. Rhetoric notwithstanding, the president is more figurehead than commander. Factional differences add color to the Iranian scene, and there are nuances in economic and social policies. But politicians do not alter the regime's ideological underpinnings.

DOJ_NMG_0134710

Upon his accession to supreme leader, analysts labeled Mr. Khamenei a weak compromise candidate. They underestimated him, and all who have attempted to encroach upon his power have found themselves marginalized. Iranians once speculated upon Tehran mayor Gholamhossein Karbaschi's meteoric rise. A stint in prison ended that.

In 2005, Mr. Khamenei rigged elections to teach frontrunner Mr. Rafsanjani a lesson. The result was Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. And as Mr. Ahmadinejad himself has proven obstreperous, Mr. Khamenei has built alternative institutions to undercut him.

Still, the Iranian government is not monolithic, and many academics argue that outreach to more pragmatic factions might encourage them at the hardliners' expense. This is American mirror imaging at its worst: Mr. Ahmadinejad may be a bad guy, but that doesn't make Mr. Rafsanjani a pragmatist or Mr. Khatami a reformer. On key issues relating to nuclear enrichment and terror sponsorship, their differences are rhetorical, not substantive. Thus the "pragmatic" Mr. Rafsanjani on Feb. 1, 2007, dismissing U.N. demands to throttle back nuclear enrichment: "We will break the [international] consensus through wisdom and bravery and foil U.S. conspiracies against Iran."

Despite the Iranian government's unified commitment to forge ahead with the nuclear program, some Western observers persist in their belief that the Islamic Republic is searching for a graceful way back from the brink. They point to mounting economic hardship inside Iran and a backlash against President Ahmadinejad's demagoguery. Couldn't engagement empower his critics?

This makes no sense. Dialogue and the attendant relaxation of U.N. sanctions will strengthen and validate the Ahmadinejad regime.

Far from being susceptible to Western machinations, the Iranians have proven adept at manipulating us. Consider that, since the beginning of the current tensions, the West has retreated from demands that Iran cease conversion of yellowcake to uranium gas and end enrichment entirely to the current demand for nothing more than a temporary suspension of uranium enrichment activities. And all this while Iran funneled weapons to Hezbollah, shipped explosives into Iraq and defied Security Council resolutions.

Proposals for renewed engagement may be well-intentioned, but they are naïve and dangerous, and indeed will undercut any possibility of a diplomatic solution. Let's review the current situation.

On Sept. 24, 2005, the International Atomic Energy Agency determined that Iran was in violation of its nuclear non-proliferation safeguards agreement. Still, the IAEA deferred referral to the U.N. Security Council to give diplomacy a chance. After consulting with her European partners, on May 31, 2006, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice offered Tehran two ways forward: Either Iran could defy its international commitments and "incur only great costs," or it could suspend enrichment and enjoy "real benefit and longer-term security." The Iranian regime chose to forego the benefit. On Dec. 23, 2006, the U.N. Security Council unanimously imposed sanctions.

The 60-day deadline to comply with U.N. demands is up, so what next? Those eager to sit down with Tehran say that dialogue does not mean abandoning sanctions. This is hardly serious. Washington has already offered and delivered inducements to the regime -- a clear path to World Trade Organization accession and spare aircraft parts -- in exchange for behavior modification. In response, Tehran has offered no confidence-building measures. All that remains are direct talks, and even there, Washington has dropped the price from ending Iran's nuclear program to a temporary suspension of enrichment.

The Security Council has spoken. To change course now would signal the impotence of international institutions and multilateral diplomacy. History shows that when the supreme leader believes Western resolve is faltering, Iran will be more defiant and dangerous. Now is not the time to talk. If Washington and Europe truly believe in the primacy of multilateralism and diplomacy, now is the time to ratchet up the pressure.

Ms. Pletka and Mr. Rubin are, respectively, vice president for foreign policy and defense studies and resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

U.S. Navy Buildup Came After Iran Moves (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134711

Iran has brought its war games maneuvers over the past year into busy shipping lanes in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow mouth of the Persian Gulf through which two-fifths of the world's oil supplies pass, the top U.S. Navy commander in the Mideast said.

The moves have alarmed U.S. officials about possible accidental confrontations that could boil over into war, and led to a recent build-up of Navy forces in the Gulf, Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh said in an interview with The Associated Press and other reporters.

During maneuvers, Iranian sailors have loaded mines onto small minelaying boats and test-fired a Shahab-3 ballistic missile into international waters, he said.

"The Shahab-3 most recently went into waters very close to the traffic separation scheme in the straits themselves. This gives us concern because innocent passage of vessels now is threatened," Walsh said in the interview Monday on the base of the Navy's Fifth Fleet in the Gulf island kingdom of Bahrain.

Iran tested the Shahab during November maneuvers, which it said were in response to U.S. maneuvers in the Gulf it called "adventurist." Iran also showed off an array of new torpedoes in war games in April.

The carrier USS John C. Stennis — backed by a strike group with more than 6,500 sailors and Marines and with additional minesweeping ships — arrived in the region Monday. It joined the carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower after President Bush ordered the build-up as a show of strength to Iran.

The additional U.S. firepower has ratcheted up tensions with Iran. But Walsh said the increase aims to reassure Arab allies in the Gulf and prevent misunderstandings that could escalate into outright conflict.

"That's certainly what we're trying to avoid, a mistake that then boils over into a war," said Walsh, who departs his command of the Fifth Fleet this month to become vice chief of naval operations at the Pentagon, the Navy's No. 2 post.

Walsh said the Navy was responding to "more instability than we've seen in years" in the Fifth Fleet's region — with conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan and Somalia, tensions in Lebanon and the standoff with Iran.

The Navy has grown increasingly alarmed at what Walsh called Iran's "provocations." Once cordial Navy ship-to-ship relations with Iran in the Gulf have disintegrated over the past 18 months as Iranian vessels made "probing" incursions into Iraqi waters, he said.

"They threaten to use oil as a weapon. They threaten to close the Straits of Hormuz," Walsh said. "And so it is the combination of the rhetoric, the tone, and the aggressive exercises in very constrained waters that gives us concern."

Since the Stennis was ordered to the region, Iranian leaders have increasingly warned that they would respond to any attack by closing off oil shipping lanes or attacking U.S. interests.

The Straits of Hormuz are 34 miles across, but its shipping lanes are only about six miles wide.

Walsh said it was doubtful that Iran could physically block the entire six-mile lanes with mines — but hitting only a few vessels with missiles and mines would "terrorize" shipping and have the same effect.

"It's more the threat of mines than the threat of closing the straits. That would have dramatic effects on markets around the world," he said.

Walsh said his biggest worry was that Iran would underestimate U.S. resolve to protect its interests in the world's richest oil region. He said the tone of Iranian leaders could make their commanders on the ground more reckless. "It's a mix and a formulation where you can have misunderstanding," he said.

Asked whether the U.S. Navy would launch an attack on Iran if Iranian involvement were confirmed in a deadly incident in Iraq, Walsh said he was unable to discuss the Navy's rules of engagement. But he added, "There are events on land that can spill over onto the sea."

At the same time, Walsh said he understood that U.S.-allied Gulf nations feared that any U.S.-Iranian military conflict could bring attacks on their soil.

Walsh said he was aware that a University of Maryland/Zogby International poll of Arab public opinion this month showed residents of the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia and other allies believe Iran is far less a threat than the U.S. and Israel.

"I'm trying to talk to those in the region, to give them assurances that the reason we're here is to stand by them," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134712

Rice Seeks Arab Backing For Moderate Palestinians (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 21, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was holding talks in Jordan with intelligence chiefs of four Arab states seen as crucial in backing Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas in his power struggle with the radical Islamic group Hamas.

Rice also briefed Jordan's King Abdullah II on her joint meeting Monday in Jerusalem with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, a summit billed as the launch of a new US push to revive peace efforts but which failed to make any significant breakthrough.

After seeing Rice, Abdullah was to meet Abbas, who is in Jordan en route for Europe to seek support for a unity government deal between his secular Fatah party and Hamas, boycotted by the West as a terror group.

Rice's initiative has been undermined by the power-sharing deal brokered by Saudi Arabia earlier this month which caught the US administration by surprise, according to a senior US official.

Since Hamas gained control of the Palestinian government after a shock election win in January 2006, Washington has led international efforts to isolate the administration with an embargo on critical aid and diplomatic ties.

Washington backed a bid by Abbas to call new elections in hopes of sidelining Hamas, but the initiative led to deadly factional clashes -- bloodshed which the power-sharing deal has managed to stem.

The unity government deal, which will see officials from Abbas's secular Fatah party serve alongside Hamas leaders -- infuriated Israel and almost torpedoed Monday's summit, officials said.

While Rice succeeded in bringing the meeting off and gaining a pledge by Olmert and Abbas to continue talking, tensions were apparent when neither man appeared at her side for the reading of a joint statement.

She also used the meeting to reaffirm US and Israeli insistence that the boycott against the Palestinian government will continue unless it pledge respect for three conditions -- recognise Israeli's right to exist, renounce violence and accept previous peace agreements with Israel.

Abbas argued in Monday's meeting that the deal includes implicit recognition of these conditions and formally authorises him to negotiate with Israel.

During her five-hour visit to Jordan, Rice will seek an explanation of the unity government deal from the Saudi national security adviser Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the senior US official said.

She will also discuss ways the four Arab states can help deal with security issues raised in Monday's Israeli-Palestinian meeting, the official said.

These include putting an end to arms smuggling from Egypt into the Gaza Strip, Hamas's stronghold, and boosting the presence of security forces loyal to Abbas in northern Gaza, from where militants have been firing home-made rockets into Israel.

The official said Washington considers the four Arab nations "critical backers" of Abbas in his showdown with the Iranian-supported Hamas.

The United States initially engaged the so-called "Arab Quartet" as part of efforts to urge Iraqi Sunnis not to boycott the US-backed Shiite-led government in Iraq.

"Then it evolved into the most effective means of supporting responsible Palestinians," the US official said, referring to Abbas and his Fatah party.

Also attending the meeting will be Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman -- a key mediator between Israel and the Palestinians -- and his counterparts from Jordan and the United Arab Emirates.

Rice said she would also be pushing the Arabs to take a more active role in reviving peace efforts embodied in a 2002 "Arab initiative" that offered Israel diplomatic recognition if it would give up territory occupied since the 1967 Arab war.

"I hope that the Arab states also understand that they have a role to play in this," she said in Jerusalem Monday.

Rice flies from Amman to Berlin for a meeting Wednesday of the Middle East Quartet which comprises the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Abbas is pressing the Quartet to end its aid boycott when the unity government takes office, but Rice will argue forcefully to stay the course during Wednesday's gathering, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0134713

Rice Looks Back For A Way Forward On Mideast Peace (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 20 -- Over Christmas vacation, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took home a three-foot stack of reports written by the State Department historian on previous efforts by the United States to forge Middle East peace. Rice had read memoirs by her predecessors, but as she embarked on her own effort to help end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, she decided she needed to study a day-by-day diplomatic narrative of what had gone wrong in the past.

Her conclusion: A diplomat needs to quietly build support behind the scenes in informal talks between the Israelis and Palestinians, seeking the right combination of leverage and circumstance to make an impact. In her mind, Rice and her aides say, the moment is now.

But the lackluster outcome of the Israeli-Palestinian summit brokered by Rice in Jerusalem on Monday suggests her optimism may be misplaced. Diplomats and Middle East experts applaud her willingness to invest her prestige in trying to solve an intractable problem, but some wonder whether her efforts are six years too late.

Rice is pushing the Israelis and Palestinians to sketch the contours of a Palestinian state, much as President Bill Clinton did before he left office. But diplomats say the prospects have dimmed with years of violence, weak leadership in both camps and the rise of the militant group Hamas, which is dedicated to Israel's destruction and won Palestinian legislative elections last year.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Tuesday described the summit as "tense and difficult," while the Israeli government ruled out discussions on the diplomatic endgame if Abbas goes through with plans to form a unity government with Hamas.

Rice -- who arrived here Tuesday night for talks with European officials after meeting earlier in the day with Arab diplomats and security chiefs in Amman, Jordan -- insists that the conditions have never been better for peace.

This confidence reflects her central role in developing and implementing U.S. policy toward the conflict for the past six years. "I think on paper there was a lot that was close" in 2000, Rice said last month. "But the underlying circumstances, I think, those conditions are better now."

The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was never going to accept a peace deal, Rice argues, but he has been replaced by Abbas. She adds that the Likud Party was not going to support Clinton's proposals, but now much of the Israeli right accepts the idea of a Palestinian state after a Likud-led government, under Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, took the dramatic step of withdrawing from the Gaza Strip. "The breadth of the Israeli political system that is actually united behind a two-state solution is very different than in 2000," Rice said.

Rice's slant on the Middle East has been shaped in part by Israelis, first by Sharon and more recently by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, U.S. officials say.

Rice, for instance, adopted the phrase "political horizon" from Livni, which is intended to illustrate the endgame discussions, though it is not a new concept; then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell used it in 2002. Rice's division of the region into "moderate" elements (Israel, Abbas, Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia) and "extremist" forces (Iran, Syria, Hezbollah, Hamas) was also first articulated by Livni a few weeks before it became part of Rice's rhetoric.

Arabs and Europeans chafe at such clear-cut distinctions. "The Middle East is the Middle East," said Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit. "You have different trends, and you have different interests" that vary from day to day.

Aboul Gheit's view would explain why Abbas, supposedly a member of Rice's moderate camp, would join with the extremists. Abbas said the power-sharing arrangement is intended to stop Palestinian factional violence that has killed scores of people in recent months.

As national security adviser in President Bush's first term, Rice -- not Powell -- generally had control of Israeli-Palestinian policy because of a largely unpublicized back channel with Sharon's chief of staff, Dov Weisglass, according to U.S. and Israeli officials.

The most sensitive issues in the U.S.-Israeli relationship were handled through the Rice-Weisglass partnership. In a tense meeting with Weisglass in September 2002, Rice demanded that Sharon abandon an assault on Arafat's compound, U.S. and Israeli officials say. Rice, through the Weisglass channel, also encouraged in 2003 the development of Israel's plan to withdraw from Gaza -- in part to thwart European demands to push the two sides to begin final negotiations on a peace deal because the plan known as the "road map" was faltering.

DOJ_NMG_0134714

Early in her tenure as secretary of state, Rice encouraged the Palestinians to hold legislative elections, even if Hamas participated, despite deep misgivings by Israeli officials. U.S. officials had assumed that Abbas's Fatah party would win, but Hamas unexpectedly prevailed. Rice then decided to push international donors to cut off all but humanitarian aid to the Palestinian government until Hamas renounced violence, accepted Israel and agreed to abide by previous Palestinian accords with Israel.

Although the Hamas victory halted peace efforts, Rice now says the election led to good because it forced the militant group to confront the challenges of governing. But U.S. officials concede that they were surprised when Abbas, with Saudi prodding, reached the unity accord with Hamas.

"She has a personal commitment to be involved now," said former Middle East envoy Dennis Ross. "But the nature of what she is involved in is in greater flux."

Rice's push follows a succession of administration initiatives that quickly faded, including a security plan by then-CIA chief George J. Tenet in 2001, the appointment of special envoy Anthony C. Zinni in 2002 and Bush's inauguration of the road map plan at a 2003 summit in Aqaba, Jordan. Within months, all were largely abandoned.

In one irony, the United States in 2003 had pushed for the creation of a powerful prime minister because it wanted a way to sidestep then-President Arafat; now, the administration wants to bolster the Abbas presidency as a way of undercutting the Hamas prime minister.

The administration has intervened in the Palestinian factional struggle, funneling money to bolster Fatah's image before the elections and now pushing a plan to train and supply security forces loyal to Abbas.

One Rice aide conceded that there is "diplomatic risk" to Rice forging ahead, but European officials are thrilled that she is now trying ideas they have long urged. A senior European official said Tuesday that just the fact that Rice did not cancel the meeting in the face of Israeli resistance was a signal, because the administration has had a pattern of halting peace efforts at the first sign of trouble. "To us, that is proof the United States is really engaged," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Israel Threatens To Ignore Abbas (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 21, 2007

Israel said Tuesday it would stop dealing with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas if he goes ahead with plans to join Hamas in a new government, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Arab allies sought a way to break the Hamas logjam and push forward the stalled peace process.

Jordan's King Abdullah II, after separate meetings with Rice and Abbas, urged the United States to continue seeking to broker an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord. But Israel said it would stop dealing with Abbas on larger peace issues if he went ahead and formed the coalition government with Hamas.

After the meetings Abbas acknowledged for the first time that sessions on Monday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Rice had been "tense and difficult" but said "it was not a failure and it will be followed by other meetings."

Abbas said Israel may have "misunderstood" the agreement reached in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, between his moderate Fatah faction and the militant Hamas group, according to Jordan's official Petra news agency.

"We told Israel that this agreement was made to protect the unity of the Palestinian people and its national interests," Abbas was quoted as saying. "The agreement is an expression of support for Palestinian interests, but Israel may have misunderstood it."

But in Israel, Miri Eisin, spokeswoman for Olmert, ruled out any talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he went ahead with plans to form a new Cabinet including Hamas.

Israeli talks with Abbas would be limited to matters such as improving living conditions for the Palestinians and ending Palestinian attacks against Israel. "We're not talking about negotiations on final status issues," Eisin said.

DOJ_NMG_0134715

The planned Palestinian coalition government fell far short of what the United States and Israel wanted, and also disappointed Sunni Arab states — many of them U.S. allies — that had hoped Hamas would soften anti-Israeli policies enough to satisfy the West and restart the flow of vital international aid.

Rice invited security and intelligence chiefs from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates to Amman for the talks to ask their advice on what, if anything, can be done further to persuade Hamas to back down.

Tuesday's session at the government security headquarters in Amman included some of the region's wiliest and best-connected heavies, fixers and go-betweens, including Saudi national security adviser Prince Bandar bin Sultan and Egyptian intelligence head Omar Suleiman.

Suleiman has deep ties across Palestinian politics, including with Hamas. Rice has been meeting with him regularly since Hamas won Palestinian parliamentary elections 13 months ago.

Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the Emirates have all, in turn, tried their hand in recent months at convincing Hamas to moderate enough to meet Western conditions, with little success.

Rice and Abbas both met with Abdullah but their sessions were separate. Both were reporting on progress from their three-way summit Monday with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. For Abbas, that meant explaining that he had failed to persuade Israel and Rice that the incoming Palestinian government would fulfill conditions for the restoration of foreign aid.

Abdullah and other Sunni Arab allies have strongly urged the Bush administration to energize peace efforts between Israel and the Palestinians, partly to improve the Palestinians' lot, partly to tamp down Islamic extremism that those government see as a threat and partly to counter the influence of Shiite Iran.

After the meetings, Abdullah issued a statement saying, "The longer the time passes without a framework that would help Palestinians and Israelis move forward, the greater the risk of an escalation of tensions."

Abbas also was headed to Germany along with stops in Britain and France in a campaign to convince skeptical Western leaders that the deal he forged earlier this month with the ruling Islamic Hamas reflects his moderate stand.

At stake is about $1 billion in foreign aid for the Palestinian government cut off after Hamas defeated Abbas' secular Fatah party and took power last year. Abbas was elected separately and retains power, but the two-headed government structure was unwieldy and unable to deliver services or security.

Israel, the U.S. and the European Union label Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction and has killed hundreds of people in suicide attacks, a terror group.

The U.S. and European Union insist that any Palestinian government must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept past peace accords. Hamas has rejected those conditions. The unity accord pledges only to "respect" past agreements.

No Peace Talks With Abbas If Fatah Joins Cabinet (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Israel yesterday ruled out any peace talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas if his Fatah faction joins Hamas in a new Cabinet, in spite of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's appeal for continued talks with Mr. Abbas as the legitimate Palestinian leader.

A day after Miss Rice's inconclusive meeting in Jerusalem with Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Mr. Olmert's aides said future contacts would be limited to daily issues such as improving living conditions for the Palestinians and ending attacks against Israel.

"We are not talking about negotiations on final-status issues," said Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin.

The United States and Israel both have said they will not deal with the proposed unity government unless it meets three international demands -- that it renounce violence, recognize Israel and honor past Palestinian commitments.

"The agreements between Hamas and Abu Mazen disappoint all who supported separating the extremists from the moderates and creating an alternative government in the Palestinian Authority," Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said yesterday, using Mr. Abbas' nickname.

DOJ_NMG_0134716

Although Miss Rice agreed that a government that does not recognize Israel cannot be part of any peace negotiations leading to a two-state solution, she has repeatedly said that Mr. Abbas is the only Palestinian leader worth talking to.

"He heads [the Palestinian Authority] with his own authority and his own legitimacy, having been elected to that position on the basis of principles that he went to the Palestinian people on when he was elected in 2005," the secretary said on Monday.

"He is the chairman of the [Palestine Liberation Organization] and discussions, negotiations, whatever, work with Israel, is in the hands of the chairman of the PLO," she said.

Miss Rice also said Mr. Abbas had assured her in several meetings that he is committed to the three international demands, which have been endorsed by the Quartet -- the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

But with a Hamas majority in both the parliament and the Cabinet, Mr. Abbas cannot deliver when it comes to final-status issues, said David Schenker, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

"We shouldn't abandon him, because for the most part he continues to say the right things," Mr. Schenker said of Mr. Abbas. "But it's getting harder to deal with him."

Mr. Schenker said it is "impossible to talk about a political horizon," the term U.S. and Israeli officials have been using for the past couple of months, given the Fatah-Hamas agreement, which was reached on Feb. 8 in Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

"That agreement threw a ratchet in U.S. policy," he said. "There were not many concessions from Hamas."

The deal ended a cycle of factional violence in the Palestinian territories that left dozens dead and many more wounded.

"We told Israel that this agreement was made to protect the unity of the Palestinian people and its national interests," Mr. Abbas was quoted as saying by Jordan's official Petra news agency. "The agreement is an expression of support for Palestinian interests, but Israel may have misunderstood it."

He also said that his Monday meeting with Mr. Olmert and Miss Rice had been "tense and difficult."

Miss Rice met with King Abdullah II of Jordan in Amman yesterday before flying to Berlin for a Quartet meeting today.

Mr. Abbas also headed to Germany, Britain and France to lobby for the release of millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinian government, which has been frozen since Hamas came to power just over a year ago.

In Amman, Miss Rice also met with security and intelligence chiefs from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates to discuss what can be done to get Hamas to accept the Quartet principles.

Palestinian Factions Labor To Sustain Truce (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Abu Mujahad and Yasser Said are trying to hold together a fragile Palestinian peace here -- via cellphone.

Mr. Mujahad is loyal to the Executive Force led by Hamas, while Mr. Said reports to its rival faction, Fatah. The two groups, responsible for fighting that has left hundreds of Palestinians dead in the past year, are coordinating a peace accord reached Feb. 8 in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, through what they call a "joint operations center."

In reality, it is more like a speed-dial list as rival commanders, ensconced in their separate redoubts, keep in near-constant contact when the smallest trouble flares in the Gaza Strip. An estimated 1.4 million Palestinians share the patch of land spanning about 140 square miles.

Both sides acknowledged in separate interviews yesterday that tensions remain high and that there have been multiple breaches of their accord. Still, they said their fears about open warfare erupting anew were based on political and diplomatic processes far beyond the streets where their men maintain a tense standoff. "We are sure we will have problems in the future, but cooperation between all the parties to solve them will be much easier if they have an agreement at the top," Mr. Said said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left the Middle East yesterday without openly accepting or rejecting the Mecca deal that brought the tentative peace. Her departure followed three days of talks -- including the first three-way summit since 2003 featuring American, Israeli and Palestinian leaders. There were few tangible results. And no one wants to predict how long after her departure the agreement will last.

DOJ_NMG_0134717

In addition to ending the fighting, the Mecca accord calls for the formation of a unity government between Hamas, the Islamist movement that won U.S.-backed elections in the Palestinian territories a year ago, and the secular Fatah movement, which is headed by the separately elected Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas.

Fatah, which was founded by the late Yasser Arafat, had controlled the Palestinian territories since the Oslo peace accords of the 1990s. Since Hamas's rise to power, fighting between the two sides has left more than 400 Palestinians dead, the vast majority of them in Gaza, where Hamas is generally believed to be stronger. While there were no breakthroughs during Ms. Rice's visit, Mr. Abbas, who is trying to navigate between Hamas on one side and Israel and the U.S. on the other, in some ways walked away victorious by maintaining his diplomatic relevance -- at least for now.

But Israel and the U.S. are deeply troubled by the unity-government plan because Hamas still hasn't openly endorsed their demands that any government including the Islamist movement abide by previous peace agreements, reject violence and accept Israel's right to exist. So far, Hamas has only acceded to giving its tacit backing to prior peace accords.

Senior U.S. officials said Mr. Abbas now has a little more time -- probably no longer than six months -- to make something happen. They envision three possible scenarios.

In the most optimistic, Mr. Abbas can continue to gain slow progress in nudging Hamas closer to a more overt acceptance of the international community's conditions. The second scenario would be maintenance of the status quo: The U.S. continues to shun the Hamas-dominated government, even though Mr. Abbas's party is now part of that government, but continues dealing on a personal level with Mr. Abbas. His presidential office is still separate from the Hamas-Fatah government that would be formed under the Mecca accord. This scenario includes continuing military support to Mr. Abbas and his chief strongmen in order to keep pressure on Hamas. The third scenario amounts to giving Mr. Abbas and Hamas enough space to allow their own internal differences to bring about the collapse of the Mecca deal and the unity government.

One key factor, which remains unclear, is whether Saudi Arabia will abide by its pledge to supply $1 billion to the new unity government. If it does, it is possible Mr. Abbas could continue to press ahead with Hamas even if the U.S. and Israel shun the Palestinian government. U.S. officials also have declined to say whether they are pressuring the Saudi regime to freeze that pledge.

Ms. Rice is in a precarious position. If she pushes too hard, she could create an even greater backlash across the region and beyond, since the deal has brought an end to Palestinian bloodshed. Mr. Mujahad, the deputy commander of the Executive Force in northern Gaza, left little doubt whom he would blame if fighting begins anew. "We hold Israel and the Americans responsible for the tensions between Palestinians," he said.

He is based in an armed Executive Force camp on the edge of Jabalya. He sits behind a desk within a small office building behind freshly erected cinderblock walls and mounds of earth plowed high like barricades. The camp is directly across the street from a pile of rubble that used to be the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated military-intelligence command in this part of Gaza, a sign of how powerful the Executive Force became here in the days leading up to the Mecca accord.

Mr. Mujahad said the mechanism for maintaining the peace -- having commanders from the warring sides stay in constant contact -- is so far holding. "We work day and night with those who have intentions in Fatah to make this agreement stick," he said.

Mr. Said, who works from inside his home a few miles away, is the key coordinator for Fatah. He said there are few rules beyond talking. For breaches of the peace, which both sides acknowledge occur nearly every day, there are no proscribed punishments. Creating a stronger deal with a better chance of holding will depend on the quick creation of a unity government, he said.

But he fears the political differences -- between the factions, within the factions themselves and from the U.S. and Israel -- don't give them much time, no matter how hard they work to keep the peace. "It's not enough to have good intentions," he said.

After The Mecca Accord, Clouded Horizons (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134718

BERLIN, Feb. 20 — With Iran steadily gaining power in the Middle East, the United States recently made a strategic decision to encourage Saudi Arabia to take a more active role in diplomacy in the region. Two weeks ago, the Saudis took a bold step, mediating an accord between warring Palestinian factions whose battles in Gaza had left more than 100 dead.

But that agreement, signed in the holy city of Mecca, brought Hamas — which the United States and Israel consider a terrorist organization — into a unity government without requiring that it recognize Israel or forswear violence against it. And that added to the already formidable challenge the United States faces as it tries to accomplish another strategic goal: getting the Palestinians and Israelis back to the negotiating table for peace talks for the first time in six years.

The Saudi-brokered pact largely torpedoed the American-sponsored meeting on Monday between the Israelis and the Palestinians that was meant to jump-start peace talks.

The crosscurrent is a case study in how the divergent worldviews of America and Saudi Arabia, its closest Arab ally, will color the two countries' attempts to quell violence in the region and put a brake on Iran's ambitions, analysts say.

To be sure, both the United States and its Sunni Arab allies, particularly Saudi Arabia, say they want peace between Palestinians and Israelis and the creation of a Palestinian state. For the Saudis, the end of Israeli-Palestinian hostilities would mute a rallying cry for militants, intent on upending the status quo in the region, who say Arab leaders have done too little to help Palestinians.

So why did Saudi Arabia broker a power-sharing agreement between Hamas and the moderate Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and his Fatah faction at the same time that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had decided to try to revive peace talks?

One reason, no doubt, is that Saudi Arabia — as a leader in the Arab world — wanted to help end the Palestinian-on-Palestinian violence by Hamas and Fatah. But another big reason, analysts said, is that the war in Iraq has intensified the split between Sunnis and Shiites, and deepened a power struggle between the Sunni royal family of Saudi Arabia, and Iran, which is largely Shiite.

Although the United States is rooting for the Saudis in that power struggle, the two countries have some distinctly different ideas about how Saudi Arabia should fight for its leadership role in the region.

The Bush administration has a view that pits America, its Arab allies, Israel and Europe against Iran, Syria and groups, including Hamas, that the United States considers terrorists.

While that alignment may work for the Bush administration, it is not necessarily how America's Sunni Arab allies view the world. In the battle for influence in the Middle East, Hamas is a prize Saudi Arabia is willing to fight for.

Put simply, in the past year, Iran has been wooing Hamas, which is Sunni. The Saudis did not like that. So they fought to get Hamas back.

"The Saudis did a switcheroo," said Martin Indyk, the United States ambassador to Israel in the Clinton administration. "The U.S. views the Middle East as a battle between the moderates against the Iranian-led extremists. But our regional allies see this as a divide between Sunnis and Shiites, and Sunni extremists like Hamas may be extremists, but they are Sunnis first."

"The Saudis," he said, "don't want Hamas on the Shia side, on the Iranian side."

The fight over Hamas began in earnest last year when the United States and Europe cut off most of the $1 billion in direct aid to the Palestinian government after Hamas took control by besting Fatah in legislative elections. Unable to cover its bills — or even to meet payroll for many of its civil servants — Hamas turned to Iran, which provided it with $120 million. Saudi Arabia meanwhile, shied away from giving much aid to Hamas.

On Dec. 7, the Hamas leader, Ismail Haniya, in his first tour abroad as Palestinian prime minister, went to Tehran, where he met with Iranian leaders, including President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia responded quickly to the deepening ties between Hamas and Iran. On Dec. 29, he sent a plane provided by the Saudi royal family to carry Mr. Haniya and other Hamas leaders to Saudi Arabia, where Mr. Haniya had a private audience with the Saudi king, according to Palestinian officials.

As all of this was going on, Ms. Rice was working with Tzipi Livni, Israel's foreign minister, to organize peace talks between Mr. Abbas and Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, to present Mr. Abbas as the only leader capable of leading the Palestinians to their own state.

DOJ_NMG_0134719

It was a complicated set-up; the American-Israeli hope was that Mr. Abbas, empowered by peace negotiations, could call for new elections and see his Fatah party beat Hamas. Mr. Abbas had threatened several times to call the elections because talks on a unity government were stalled.

But less than two weeks before the scheduled Israeli-Palestinian meeting, Saudi Arabia brokered the power-sharing pact: Hamas and Mr. Abbas would politically cohabitate in a national unity government.

In announcing the agreement, Saudi Arabia promised $1 billion in aid to the Palestinians. The Saudis pressured both sides to reach a pact; Mr. Abbas said he did so because he could not stand to witness intra-Palestinian bloodshed.

The pact put an end, at least temporarily, to the bloodletting. It also put an end, at least temporarily, to Ms. Rice's attempt to restart peace talks. Ms. Rice flew to Jerusalem for the scheduled meeting anyway, which began on Monday morning with a stilted three-way handshake between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert at Ms. Rice's hotel, with Ms. Rice standing in the middle. After about an hour of discussions about the Mecca accord, Ms. Rice tried to move the discussion to the peace agenda.

"Let's go upstairs and talk about your future," she said, according to a senior Bush administration official. The three went up to her 10th-floor suite, overlooking Jerusalem's Old City, where she broached what she has termed the "political horizon" — diplomatic speak for the contours of an eventual Palestinian state.

"She pushed for it in the meeting, but Olmert was adamant about not going for it," said a Palestinian official familiar with the talks.

The reason: the Saudi-brokered Mecca accord. In the end, the Israelis said they refused to open peace negotiations with a unity government that includes Hamas.

Congress Puts Palestinian Funds In Limbo (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congress is holding up $86 million that the Bush administration is seeking to strengthen the security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, in a new setback for the administration's efforts in the region.

Administration officials say they want the money to ensure that the moderate Palestinian leader's security forces will not be overwhelmed by rivals from the militant movement Hamas, which has received pledges of $250 million in aid from Iran.

But Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), chairwoman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, has put a hold on the funding, saying she is not convinced the money will go to train and equip Abbas' security forces, as promised. Other lawmakers, including Democrats and Republicans, have voiced concern that the money could end up in the hands of Hamas.

The United States and other Western nations have cut off direct aid to the Palestinian Authority after the January 2006 parliamentary election victory of Hamas. The group does not recognize the state of Israel, has not renounced violence and has not fully committed to respecting past agreements between Palestinians and the Jewish state.

Further complicating the issue is a deal announced in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Feb. 8 under which Hamas and Fatah will share power in a new Palestinian "unity" government. Some lawmakers fear that shifting lines of authority in the Palestinian government could make it difficult for the U.S. to earmark money for the exclusive use of forces under Abbas' control.

The U.S. aid package is to go toward communications gear, uniforms and other equipment considered nonlethal, and toward hiring private contractors to train the forces. The aid will benefit both the 4,000-member Presidential Guard, and several thousand members of the larger national security forces, which also have been under Abbas' control.

Meanwhile, Egypt and Jordan are rounding out the needs of forces from Abbas' Fatah faction with ammunition and weapons.

The Israeli government, which plays a critical role, originally supported the idea of the aid program. Since the Mecca agreement, however, Israeli officials have become worried that some of the aid could end up helping Hamas.

Lowey began pressing the State Department for more details of the spending program in December, and placed a hold on the grant last month, because she believed she had not received the assurances she needed, aides say.

"It is imperative that we have a fuller understanding of exactly what the funding is for and what the situation is on the ground," Lowey said in a statement.

DOJ_NMG_0134720

Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.) said at a House hearing last week that the subcommittee had "deep concern" about approving the money, because the Feb. 8 agreement to form a new government had made Hamas and Fatah a "joint venture."

"I would find it impossible to support any expenditure of funds without knowing how we make sure that those funds stay in the right hands and don't fall into the wrong hands," he said.

Other critics have complained that U.S. assistance might only intensify the fighting between the Hamas and Fatah forces. About 100 Palestinians have been killed in that fighting since December.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice argued that it was important not to halt support for Abbas.

"Hamas is going to continue to build its forces. I don't think we want to be in a position in which Hamas continues to build its forces and [Abbas] doesn't build his, because I don't know ultimately what will become of the Palestinian unity government," she told the panel last week. "I do know that if Hamas has strong forces and Mahmoud Abbas does not, that's not good for the United States, that's not good for the Palestinians, and it's most certainly not good for Israel."

Speaking Sunday in Israel, Rice said the U.S. wanted to continue cooperation with Abbas, but also recognized that it would need to prove to taxpayers that it would not be spending money on a government of which the United States disapproves.

Charade In Jerusalem (NYT)

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

It speaks volumes when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flies to Jerusalem to try to revive peace talks between Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority and cannot even get the two to show up when she reads out the content-free joint statement to which they have grudgingly agreed.

Volume 1 reminds us of the six feckless years during which the Bush administration has squandered America's once commanding prestige in the region. Volume 2 portrays a secretary of state who clearly arrived with no new ideas — and no idea of how to wheedle or pressure either side into making any of the compromises needed to stimulate the dangerously moribund peace effort.

Ms. Rice's diplomatic default was all the keener since this just might have been a moment for breaking the stalemate that has prevailed since Hamas won control of the Palestinian Parliament last year.

Hamas's refusal to accept Israel's right to exist and its people's right to live free from terrorism is undeniably the biggest single obstacle to peace. But Mr. Abbas and his more moderate Fatah movement already accept both points. And the imperfect agreement Mr. Abbas reached with Hamas this month on a cease-fire between the two groups (reeling them back from civil war) and a coalition government gave him more authority, after months of flailing, to bargain on behalf of the Palestinians.

Israel could have reinforced Mr. Abbas's position and increased the chances for progress with a series of low-risk steps: committing to serious negotiations, freezing the expansion of settlements and easing restrictions on civilians' movements in the West Bank. Those steps would have given new hope to Palestinian moderates and thereby increased the political pressure on Hamas to abandon terrorism.

Instead, Ms. Rice indulged Mr. Olmert's inherent caution and his own political weakness, settling for an agreement that the two leaders will meet again some (still to be determined) day. Israel further qualified that promise yesterday, threatening to stop talking to Mr. Abbas altogether if he forms a coalition government with Hamas. With Palestinian frustrations rising — and demographers predicting an eventual Palestinian majority between the Mediterranean and the Jordan — just saying no is not a viable option for Israel. The responsibility of the United States, as Israel's most vital ally, is to keep that uncomfortable reality firmly in Israel's sight.

Going Nowhere Fast (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

DOHA, Qatar -- "Are you on the road, or in the ditch?" Back when I covered labor negotiations 30 years ago, that was the question reporters would ask to get a sense of how contract talks were going. The phrase came back to me last weekend as I listened to a series of relentlessly negative presentations at a conference here on America's relations with the Muslim world.

DOJ_NMG_0134721

We are in the ditch in the Middle East. As bad as you think it is watching TV, it's worse. It's not just Iraq but the whole pattern of America's dealings with the Arab world. People aren't just angry at America -- they've been that way to varying degrees since I first came here 27 years ago. What's worse is that they're giving up on us -- on our ability to make good decisions, to solve problems, to play the role of honest broker.

Let's start with some poll numbers presented at the Doha conference by Shibley Telhami, a University of Maryland professor and a fellow of the Saban Center at the Brookings Institution, which co-sponsored the conference with the Qatari foreign ministry. The polling was done last year by Zogby International in six countries that are usually regarded as pro-American: Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates.

In these six "friendly" countries, only 12 percent of those surveyed expressed favorable attitudes toward the United States. America's leaders have surpassed Israel's as objects of anger. Asked which foreign leader they disliked most, 38 percent named George Bush; Ariel Sharon was a distant second at 11 percent; and Ehud Olmert was third with 7 percent.

The poll data show a deep suspicion of American motives: 65 percent of those surveyed said they didn't think democracy was a real U.S. objective in the Middle East. Asked to name two countries that had the most freedom and democracy, only 14 percent said America, putting it far behind France and Germany. And remember, folks, this is coming from our friends.

During the Doha conference, speakers put into words the attitudes summarized by the poll numbers. Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a fiery Sunni preacher who appears regularly on al-Jazeera, said that America acted as if "some people were created to lead and others to be led," and that America had "lost the trust and confidence" of Muslims. Well, okay, he's notorious for his anti-American and anti-Israeli views. But I heard the same thing from Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League, who said Arabs were "losing confidence in the U.S. role" as a peace broker.

And my friend Rami Khouri, who is one of most balanced journalists in the Arab world, warned that a broad popular front is emerging to challenge American hegemony. Iraq "discredits what America tries to do in the Mideast," he said. Khouri explained that Arabs admire Hezbollah because it represents "the end of docility, the end of acquiescence."

You don't have to agree with these Muslim critics to recognize that the anger they express represents a serious national security problem for the United States. That's what President Bush seems not to understand in his surge of troops into Iraq, his bromides about democracy and his strategy of confrontation with Iran. It isn't a tiny handful of people in the Arab world who oppose what America is doing. It's nearly everyone.

To get out of the ditch, America must change its Iraq policy, soon. That doesn't mean pulling out of Iraq quickly, as many Democrats in Washington seem to favor. I found few people here who thought a quick American pullout made sense. But it does mean shifting the American focus -- so that we are talking with Iraq's neighbors and negotiating with the Iraqis on a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops. Tellingly, the one American who got loud, sustained applause here was Chris Kojm, a senior adviser on the Baker-Hamilton report.

And to get back on the road, for real, America must broker a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. I winced when I heard Prime Minister Olmert say last weekend in Jerusalem that "the American and Israeli positions are totally identical" on the terms for recognizing a Palestinian unity government. The Israelis are right in insisting that Hamas must recognize Israel's right to exist. But how to get there? What if Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had responded: America is a mediator in this conflict. Its positions are independent of either side, and it is willing to talk to all parties to achieve peace.

I would have loved to see the looks of astonishment from the America-bashers here.

The 'Crime' Of Blogging In Egypt (WP)

By Raja M. Kamal And Tom G. Palmer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

A former college student, Abdelkareem Nabil Soliman, is sitting in an Egyptian prison, awaiting sentencing tomorrow. His alleged "crime": expressing his opinions on a blog. His mistake: having the courage to do so under his own name.

Soliman, 22, was expelled from Al-Azhar University last spring for sharply criticizing the university's rigid curriculum and faulting religious extremism on his blog. He was ordered to appear before a public prosecutor on Nov. 7 on charges of "spreading information disruptive of public order," "incitement to hate Muslims" and "insulting the President." Soliman was detained pending an investigation, and the detention has been renewed four times. He has not had consistent access to lawyers or to his family.

DOJ_NMG_0134722

Egyptian authorities have made a mistake in prosecuting Soliman. It is Egypt that will be hurt if he is convicted and sent to prison. That's why sincere friends of Egypt call on the government to drop the charges against him. It is the right thing to do, and it is the best thing for Egypt's standing in the modern world.

The case has gained attention in newspapers the world over and from human rights organizations such as Amnesty International. Informal networks of bloggers have spread the word, notably through http://www.freekareem.org. Last Thursday, bloggers and human rights activists around the globe gathered to call on Egyptian authorities to respect freedom of speech. We echo this call.

Soliman has criticized Egyptian authorities as failing to protect the rights of religious minorities and women. He has expressed his views about religious extremism in very strong terms. He is the first Egyptian blogger to be prosecuted for the content of his remarks. Remarkably, the legal complaint originated with the university that had expelled him; once, it was a great center of learning in the Arab world, but it has been reduced to informing on students for their dissent from orthodoxy.

One of us, Tom Palmer, met Soliman at a conference for bloggers in the Middle East last year. In person, Soliman seemed quiet and shy but very committed to championing women's rights and the rights of minorities.

We kept in touch by G-mail chat. Despite occasional admonitions to be careful about what he posted online and to think about possible consequences of public dissent, Soliman said that he was not afraid to express his views.

Last October, Soliman instant-messaged that he had been ordered to attend an interview with prosecutors the next day. Friends at organizations such as Hands Across the Middle East Support Alliance and the Arabic Network for Human Rights Information quickly found Soliman a lawyer. Word spread when he had been detained, and protests were organized at Egyptian embassies. Soliman had no organized movement or group behind him, but his case came to be known around the world.

We find it shocking that a university would turn a student over to the authorities to be prosecuted for voicing his views. The future of learning and science is at risk when dissenting views are punished rather than debated. Jointly, we have contacted Egyptian authorities to ask that they correct a clear mistake and release Soliman.

Egypt is a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which guarantees the "freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media." The exceptions allowed are narrowly drawn and require proof of "necessity" before restrictions can be imposed. The posting of opinions on a student's personal blog hardly qualifies as a threat to national security, to the reputation of the president or to public order.

Soliman is not a threat to Egypt, but this prosecution is.

Whether or not we agree with the opinions that Abdelkareem Nabil Soliman expressed is not the issue. What matters is a principle: People should be free to express their opinions without fear of being imprisoned or killed. Blogging should not be a crime.

Raja M. Kamal is associate dean for resource development at the Harris School of Public Policy at the University of Chicago. Tom G. Palmer is a senior fellow at the Cato Institute and director of the Byrne Project on Middle East Liberty.

2 Leaders Rebuff Russia's Nuclear Threats (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 20 — Officials in the Czech Republic and Poland vowed Tuesday that they would not be intimidated by Russia, a day after a general in Moscow declared that nuclear weapons could be aimed at their countries if they allowed the Bush administration to build ballistic missile defenses within their borders.

Russia has reacted with open hostility to the plan, which comes on the heels of further NATO expansion onto the territory of the former Soviet Union.

On Monday, the commander of Russia's missile forces said he was ready to re-aim nuclear weapons so they would be trained on the missile defense sites chosen in Eastern Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0134723

"It is clearly an attempt to intimidate," Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski, said on Polish radio.

The Czech foreign minister, Karel Schwarzenberg, said, "The Czechs will now think the shield is even more necessary," according to a [news] report.

"We have quite an experience with Russians," he said. "You have to make clear to them you won't succumb to blackmail. Once you give in to blackmail, there's no going back."

The American plan calls for a radar site in the Czech Republic and a missile battery in Poland, with the stated aim of countering threats from rogue states like Iran or North Korea. Mr. Kaczynski and his Czech counterpart, Mirek Topolanek, said Monday that they were prepared to accept the offer from the United States.

The dispute is another sign of how quickly relations between Russia and Eastern Europe have been disrupted, descending this week and last into ominous talk of nuclear and military leverage reminiscent of the cold war.

The Russian missile commander, Gen. Nikolai Y. Solovtsov, speaking of the Czech Republic and Poland's consideration of the American plan, said, "If the government of Poland, the Czech Republic and other countries make this decision — and I think mutual consultations that have been held and will be held will allow avoiding this — the strategic missile troops will be able to have those facilities as targets.

"Consequences in case of hostilities will be very grave for both sides," he said.

A NATO spokesman, James Appathurai, called the general's threat "uncalled for."

"The days of talk of targeting NATO territory or vice versa are long past us." he said, Radio Free Europe reported. "This kind of extreme language is out of date."

Just last week, Russia's top general, Yuri N. Baluyevsky, the chief of the general staff, declared that Russia could withdraw from the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, negotiated by Ronald Reagan and Mikhail S. Gorbachev in 1987.

On Tuesday, General Solovtsov noted that while those missiles were scrapped under the treaty, Russia could quickly resume production. President Vladimir V. Putin set the tone in a speech on Feb. 10 in Munich, denouncing the projection of American power as "the world of one master, one sovereign."

In the 1990s, Russia bristled, but always backed down, as NATO expanded. But under Mr. Putin, Russia has executed a more forceful foreign policy in Eastern Europe, though one focused on opening markets for Russian commodity exports and maintaining political influence in the former Soviet states.

Antimissile Plan By U.S. Strains Ties With Russia (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 20 -- An increasingly angry dispute over U.S. plans to deploy a missile defense system in Central Europe is adding strain to already fragile U.S.-Russian relations.

Under the proposal, the United States would build silos in Poland to hold 10 interceptor rockets that could destroy intercontinental ballistic missiles fired at the United States or even command sites in Europe. The accompanying radar system would be located in the Czech Republic.

U.S. officials say the system is not directed against Russia, but at the potential threat posed by missiles being developed by Iran.

That argument has been dismissed in Russia as spurious. Senior military officials, who have begun to drive the debate here, have responded with rhetoric rarely heard since the end of the Cold War.

"If the governments of Poland and the Czech Republic take such a step, the strategic missile forces will be capable of targeting these facilities if a relevant decision is made," Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov, commander of Russian missile forces, said at a news conference Monday.

Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski said Tuesday that Solovtsov's statement "was obviously an attempt at intimidation."

DOJ_NMG_0134724

"To make it clear, this is not about Russian security; these installations do not in any way threaten Russia," Kaczynski said on Polish radio. "We are talking about the status of Poland and Russia's hopes that Poland will once again come under its sphere of influence."

Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg told [a] news agency in Warsaw that his nation would not give in to Russian "blackmail."

Relations between the United States and Russia had already taken a hit this month when Russian President Vladimir Putin lashed out at Washington for its unilateral approach. "The United States has overstepped its national borders in every way," Putin said. He also said U.S. plans for an antimissile system could upset the international balance of power. His remarks drew rebukes from the White House.

Russian officials have said that Iran has no missiles capable of reaching the United States or even Western Europe and that Iran is incapable of developing them any time soon. Sergei Ivanov, then defense minister, told the German newspaper Die Welt this month that it would take "at least 20 years" for Iran to develop missiles that could reach Central Europe.

"I think you can draw your own conclusions about which missiles this system actually targets," Solovtsov said. "This is why we are watching the situation with anxiety and concern."

Solovtsov said it would take Russia less than six years to build and deploy upgraded missiles to counter what it sees as a threat. And Putin warned this month that "we need to respond asymmetrically, so that everyone understands that yes, there is an antimissile system, but it's useless against Russia."

If the United States goes ahead with its plans, Russian officials have threatened to pull out of the 1987 Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, which eliminated shorter-range missiles. As precedent, Russian officials cite the Bush administration's withdrawal from the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

"It is possible for a party to abandon the treaty if it provides convincing evidence that it is necessary to do so," Gen. Yury Baluyevsky said this month. "We have such evidence at present."

Irina Kobrinskaya, an analyst at the Institute of World Economy and International Relations in Moscow, said the Russian military might have grudgingly accepted the system if it were deployed on NATO's southern rim in Turkey, Romania or Bulgaria. But its placement to the north -- in the Czech Republic and Poland, which shares a land border with the Russian region of Kaliningrad -- has raised deep suspicion here.

"Elements of this new system can present a threat to Russia and that's the logic of the military," Kobrinskaya said in an interview.

For Russians, the system is part of a deeper pattern of what they see as U.S. encirclement, particularly through the continuing expansion of NATO. From its first expansion into the former Soviet bloc in 1998, when Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic joined, NATO now includes the three Baltic states, Slovakia, Romania and Bulgaria. The former Soviet republic of Georgia also wishes to join. Some politicians in Ukraine, including President Viktor Yushchenko, have advocated membership.

Some Russian analysts contend that part of the rhetoric is driven by domestic political concerns and efforts to build a nationalist consensus before parliamentary and presidential elections.

"I think the whole episode is being used by the Russian government to substantiate its critical approach to what the U.S. is doing internationally," said Viktor Kremenyuk, of Institute of the United States and Canada in Moscow, in an interview.

U.S. officials have said they accept that Russia could easily overwhelm the antimissile system -- further proof, they say, that it is not directed against Russia.

U.S. Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, head of the Missile Defense Agency, told reporters last month that the interceptors "are directed toward rogue nations' capabilities, not an obviously sophisticated ballistic missile fleet such as the Russians have."

Russian Sabre Rattling Pushes Poles And Czechs Closer To The US (FT)

By Jan Cienski And Robert Anderson

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134725

Russia has warned Poland and the Czech Republic against hosting elements of a US anti-missile defence shield. For the former Soviet satellites Moscow's sabre rattling underlines the need to forge strong military links with the US.

The missile defence system is designed to protect the eastern US seaboard against a nuclear attack from the Middle East. Poland and the Czech Republic stand to gain little direct security from the shield bases on their territory but they see the US presence as a bulwark against Russian influence and repayment for the US's role in defeating the Soviet Union.

"Considering the relative weakness of the EU's common foreign and defence policies, it comes down to a single question, 'Do we want the Americans in or do we want the Americans out?'" said Eugeniusz Smolar, president of the Centre for International Studies, a Polish foreign policy think-tank.

The 10 missile silos to be located in Poland, and the radar tracking system to be built in the Czech Republic will commit the US to an area where no US bases were located following Poland and the Czech Republic's 1999 Nato accession.

"These installations in no way endanger Russia," said Jaroslaw Kaczynski, Polish prime minister, in a radio interview yesterday. "It's simply about Poland's status and about Russia's hopes that Poland will again in one way or another . . . find itself in the sphere of Russian influence."

Although no one foresees Russian tanks clanking westwards any time soon, Warsaw is apprehensive about overdependence on Russian energy.

For years warnings about Russian intentions were treated as Polish paranoia by west Europeans, who had no experience of Soviet occupation. But the recent murder in London of Alexander Litvinenko, the former Russian spy, and cuts in oil and gas supplies have tarnished Moscow's image in the west.

Russian warnings that it may pull out of the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty and this week's threat to point its weapons at the US anti-missile bases in Poland and the Czech Republic are adding to fears about Russia.

Like Poland, the Czech Republic has been a firm ally of the US since the collapse of the Warsaw Pact. The foreign policy establishment regards the bases as a way of cementing trans-atlantic links and repaying the US for its role in ending Soviet domination.

Tomas Pojar, the deputy Czech foreign minister told the Financial Times that the bases would strengthen co-operation within Nato and erase the rift between the US and Europe. "Any [future] Nato missile defence will have to be integrated with this system. This should be the the beginning of the building of real protection for the European continent."

Alexandr Vondra, the Czech vice-premier for Europe, said in an interview with Hospodarske Noviny, the business daily, this week: "Being in alliances also means that we do not only take - we also have to offer to give back. Should we turn our back on this request, there is a threat that the USA will back off from Europe. Should the Poles and the Czechs reject this base, the Americans will act accordingly."

While the right-of centre governments in Warsaw and Prague are keen to begin negotiations with Washington, opinion polls show opponents of the the US bases significantly outnumber supporters.

Sweeteners could come in the form of a US decision to waive visas for Poles and Czechs, as well as money to modernise the countries armed forces.

"The system itself doesn't actually help Poland's security. In fact it creates additional problems by angering the Russians," says Dariusz Rosati, a former Polish foreign minister. "But it's always good to protect an ally and the US wants this."

Missile sites chosen for geography

The reason for the proposed siting of facilities in Poland and the Czech Republic is simple: geography, writes Stephen Fidler in London.

The proposed interceptor sites in Poland, near the Baltic Sea, are on a direct line drawn between northern Iran and New York or Washington.

The proposed siting near Jince in the Czech Republic of the powerful X-Band radar that would home the interceptors on to the US-bound missiles is, according to some scientists, to the west of its ideal location. Other suitable radar locations, from a geographical standpoint, would include Lithuania, Belarus, Russia, Ukraine and Georgia.

Philip Coyle, a missile defence expert with the Center for Defense Information in the US, says in practical terms the system poses no threat to Russia since it could not cope with either the number of Russian missiles or their sophisticated decoys and countermeasures. he said the system "has not demonstrated the capability to defend the United States under likely battlefield conditions".

DOJ_NMG_0134726

One question is whether the countries concerned have increased risks to themselves by agreeing to site these missiles there. Theodore Postol, a scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has argued that the curvature of the earth would prevent the US early warning radar at Fylingdales in the UK from seeing missiles from Iran aimed at the Czech or Polish sites. Mr Coyle says that, for this reason, US statements that the system would protect people in the Czech Republic and Poland from Iranian missiles are "misleading".

US Envoy Dispatched After Putin Charge (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- President's Bush's national security adviser is embarking on a high-level mission to Moscow and other European capitals, just over a week after incendiary remarks about Bush and the United States by Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Stephen Hadley was departing Washington Tuesday for a four-day trip to Brussels, Moscow and Berlin, said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for Hadley and Bush's National Security Council.

In Brussels, Hadley planned to meet with NATO and European Union officials. In Moscow and Berlin, he was scheduled to sit down with his counterparts in the Russian and German governments.

"This is part of ongoing discussions that will cover a full range of issues," Johndroe said.

The trip has been planned for weeks. But it comes at a particularly delicate time in the Washington-Moscow relationship, meaning the Russian portion of his travels would be the most closely watched.

Putin surprised the White House on Feb. 10 by angrily accusing the United States of inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend them from an "almost uncontained use of military force." At a security conference in Germany, the Russian leader said that "one state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

It was Putin's harshest criticism yet of the United States. Bush, at a news conference several days later, said there was a "complicated relationship" between the United States and Russia, but that Putin was "the same strong-willed person" he has known since 2001.

"We have areas of cooperation with the Russians, particularly on our common desire to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction and our approach to fight terrorism," Johndroe said.

At the State Department, deputy spokesman Tom Casey said that "on the broad range of issues, Russia is an important partner" and "a partner that we can have very open and frank discussions with." He dismissed any suggestion that the two countries are moving back "toward some kind of renewed Cold War."

Somalia Plan Adopted (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 20 — The Security Council on Tuesday authorized the dispatch of an African Union peacekeeping force to Somalia to help stabilize the country so a United Nations operation can take over in six months.

The British-drafted resolution, passed 15 to 0, urges African countries to furnish troops. The numbers pledged total less than half of the 8,000 needed, officials said.

It also demanded guarantees of safety and access for international aid workers.

Shelling In Somali Capital Kills 15 (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Feb. 20 -- Mortar rounds and rockets hit Somalia's capital early Tuesday in a series of attacks that killed 15 people and wounded more than 40, doctors and witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0134727

The violence was among the worst since a two-week war in December, in which Ethiopian troops helped government forces drive out an Islamic militia that had taken over much of the country. Somalia's weak interim government then moved into the capital.

The presidential palace and seaport were targeted in Tuesday's attacks. Ethiopian troops returned fire with artillery and heavy machine-gun fire. Families have begun fleeing the city in recent days as violence has escalated.

Mogadishu's mayor blamed the attacks on remnants of the Islamic Courts movement. U.S. and Ethiopian officials have accused the group of maintaining ties with al-Qaeda, an allegation the group denies.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Tuesday to authorize an African Union force to help stabilize Somalia and set the stage for U.N. peacekeepers to take over the long-term job.

The resolution urges the 53 African nations to contribute troops to an 8,000-strong force and urges other U.N. member states to provide financial support.

The New Somalia: A Grimly Familiar Rerun (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Feb. 20 — Fierce mortar attacks killed at least 15 civilians in Somalia on Tuesday, and for a country that had seemed on the verge of ending 16 years of chaotic violence this is the new status quo.

Nearly every day, government forces and insurgents shell each other across Mogadishu's already dilapidated neighborhoods, scattering bodies and any remaining traces of hope. Gun prices are soaring and more clans are joining the underground, while an outbreak of cholera sweeps the countryside.

"To tell you the truth, I'm pretty worried," said Mohammed Ali Mahdi, a top clan elder. When the government came to Mogadishu, "I felt we were going the right way. Unfortunately, that's not the case anymore and soon it's going to be too late."

It is hard to believe, but Somalia is actually becoming a more violent and chaotic place. That is not how it was supposed to be. Nearly two months ago, an internationally-supported transitional government ousted the Islamist forces and steamed into Mogadishu, the capital, with great expectations. But confidence in the government — never very high — is rapidly bleeding away.

Somalia seems to be just shy of total collapse — again — because the Ethiopian troops who provided the muscle to throw out the Islamists are withdrawing, yet none of the peacekeepers promised from other African countries have arrived.

Hundreds of families are streaming out of Mogadishu, hoisting mattresses on their backs and following pitted roads to villages where there is no electricity, medicine or even the faintest hint of government, but at least no warfare. At least, not yet.

"We can't stand the shelling anymore," said Hassan Mohammed, a father of four, who was headed to a village in the south.

There was a burst of optimism beginning Dec. 28, when government troops, with Ethiopian firepower behind them, marched into Mogadishu and planted the hope that the anarchy was ending. Cheering crowds poured into ruined streets. Aid experts in Nairobi circulated ambitious reconstruction plans. Ethiopian and American officials, who had worked together to overthrow the Islamists, breathed a mutual sigh of relief.

But what has happened in the past few weeks has killed that mood. A deadly insurgency has started, beginning with a few clans connected to the Islamists and now expanding to several more. Many government troops refuse to get involved. "We're not going out there," said Dahir Hassan, a police captain, from the confines of his police station. "If we get hurt, who's going to take care of us?"

All analysts agree that the violence will continue and probably intensify unless the government reconciles with clan leaders, who control, as much as anyone controls, what happens in Somalia.

But so far, there's been very little of that. Instead of reaching out to truly influential figures, analysts say the government has picked ministers not because they have any substantial support among their clans but because they will do the government's bidding. The result is an increasingly isolated, authoritarian and unpopular government in which the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, is accused of behaving more like a clan warlord — which he was — than a national leader.

"Where this government is heading is so far from where the international community wants it to go," said Ali Iman Sharmarke, one of the owners of the HornAfrik radio station in Mogadishu.

DOJ_NMG_0134728

A common complaint is that the transitional government — transitional being the operative word — is not working itself out of a job as promised. Donor nations agreed to pay the salaries of Somali officials with the understanding that those men and handful of women would shepherd the country to democratic elections in 2009. But there has been almost no progress toward setting up an election commission, let alone taking a census. Many Somalis say they would be more inclined to support, or at least tolerate, the transitional government if they thought it was indeed transitional.

To be fair, ruling Somalia, which has not had a functioning central government since 1991, is no easy task. Thirteen previous governments have been formed and 13 previous governments have failed.

Abdirahman Dinari, the government's chief spokesman, said the criticism about the government's selection of ministers was just an excuse. "These people wouldn't be happy with anyone in power," he said, conceding that the government, on its own, did not have the skills to pull the country together. "We need help."

But Mr. Dinari said help had been slow to arrive, partly because international organizations were spending millions of dollars on a staff based in Kenya, which is deemed a much safer place to work, instead of investing those resources in Somalia.

But many say that argument rings hollow. Security in Somalia does not depend on foreign troops or foreign aid. At least, it never has. In the early 1990s, the United States and the United Nations poured hundreds of millions of dollars into stabilizing Somalia and they failed notoriously, leaving the country as capriciously violent and hopeless as ever.

Then along came the Islamists, who during their six-month reign last year pacified the hornet's nest of Mogadishu by persuading clans to voluntarily disarm their militias and persuading Somalis, most of whom are Sunni Muslims, to buy into their Islam-is-the-answer solution.

One Western diplomat laughed when asked if a modest force of peacekeepers — the African Union is proposing around 8,000 — could deliver the level of stability that the Islamists had delivered on their own.

"No way," he said, speaking anonymously under diplomatic rules. "And the government's urgency for peacekeepers shows you just how badly they've done with reconciliation."

Europeans Agree To Cut Emissions Sharply If U.S. And Others Follow Suit (NYT)

By James Kanter

New York Times, February 21, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 20 — Seeking to persuade other nations to curb greenhouse gas emissions, European Union ministers pledged Tuesday to raise their own targets if industrialized countries like the United States made similar efforts.

European governments would be ready to cut emissions 30 percent below 1990 levels by 2020, from a current pledge of 20 percent, but only if other heavy polluters joined in, said Sigmar Gabriel, the German environment minister, who led a meeting in Brussels that formally endorsed the European targets.

Germany, the biggest European economy, was already prepared to cut its emissions even further if there was a broader agreement, Mr. Gabriel said, noting that the German Parliament had supported a 40 percent target.

The pledges, which match a proposal made by the European Commission last month, are signs that nations are gearing up for new negotiations on a global climate accord after 2012, when the first period covered by the Kyoto Protocol expires.

The issue is expected to be on the agenda when Germany serves as host of a meeting in June of the Group of 8 nations. European countries are hoping to win pledges from big developing countries as well, including China and India.

"You get a deadlock in international negotiations when there's the attitude that, 'We're not going to do anything until someone goes first,' so it's good that the ministers committed to 20 percent," said Kirsty Hamilton, a policy consultant for the UK Business Council for Sustainable Energy, a group representing British utilities.

But environmentalists were disappointed that governments postponed a more ambitious goal of 30 percent, unless other countries adopted similar policies.

Choosing a lower target "will send the wrong signal to the international community, casting a dubious light on how serious the European Union is about fighting climate change," said Jan Kowalzig, a climate and energy campaigner for Friends of the Earth in Brussels.

DOJ_NMG_0134729

European officials want other parts of the world, including the United States, to adopt European-style restrictions on emissions to fight climate change, thus helping European businesses compete globally at a time when the European Union is toughening regulation in sectors like air travel, car manufacturing and construction.

But splits among member states over how much more Europe can afford to cut back on pollutants have emerged as obstacles to reaching firm targets.

Last week, European Union energy ministers backed away from approving a binding proposal that 20 percent of all energy must come from renewable sources, like wind and solar power, by 2020.

According to Friends of the Earth, Finland, Poland and Hungary resisted the 20 percent target, and only Sweden and Denmark supported a unilateral 30 percent target.

A European diplomat said Finland, Poland and Hungary had expressed reservations about how the burden would be shared so that poorer and more energy-intensive parts of Europe could develop their economies.

Such differences could foreshadow a showdown in March, when political leaders are to meet in Brussels and reach a final position.

Skeptics Emerge On Technologies For Cleaner Coal (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Within the next few years, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants to meet growing electricity demands. Despite expectations that global warming rules are coming, almost none of the plants will be built to capture the thousands of tons of carbon dioxide that burning coal spews into the atmosphere.

Environmentalists are worried, but they put their faith in a technology that gasifies the coal before burning. Such plants are designed, they say, to be more adaptable to separating the carbon and storing it underground.

Most utility officials counter that the gasification approach is more expensive and less reliable, but they say there is no need to worry because their tried-and-true method, known as pulverized coal, can also be equipped later with hardware to capture the global warming gas.

But now, influential technical experts are casting doubts on both approaches.

"The phrases 'capture ready' and 'capture capable' are somewhat controversial," said Revis James, the director of the energy technology assessment center at the Electric Power Research Institute. "It's not like you just leave a footprint for some new equipment."

Many experts outside the industry share his concerns.

A major new study by faculty members at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, scheduled for release soon, concludes in a draft version that it is not clear which technology — the so-called integrated gasification combined cycle or pulverized coal — will allow for the easiest carbon capture, because so much engineering work remains to be done.

"Other than recommending that new coal combustion units should be built with the highest efficiency that is economically justifiable, we do not believe that a clear preference for one technology or the other can be justified," the draft concludes. The M.I.T. study said it was critical that the government "not fall into the trap of picking a technology 'winner.' "

The study leader, Ernest J. Moniz, a former assistant secretary of energy in the Clinton administration, was more blunt. "Clearly in a lot of discussions, I.G.C.C. has been anointed as the solution," he said referring to integrated gasification combined cycle. He made his comments at a symposium organized by the Aspen Institute in Washington last fall. "We certainly don't agree with that."

Retrofitting either a gasification or pulverized coal power plant is not just a matter of adding new equipment and it might be impractical, the experts say. Temperatures and pressures would be designed to be in one range for a plant that captured its carbon, and another if it merely produced electricity with minimum use of fuel. Less fuel means less carbon dioxide production.

Adding carbon capture later also has implications for power supply. Early estimates are that carbon capture will require so much energy that it could reduce plant output by 10 to 30 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0134730

Some experts say that the best choice may vary according to the type of coal used. Coal with high moisture content may be less suitable for gasification.

The technical assessment is certainly at odds with the hopes expressed by environmentalists. The TXU Corporation of Dallas is planning a fleet of huge new coal plants of the pulverized variety. In Austin, Tex., Tom Smith, a researcher at Public Citizen, who is helping lead the opposition, said, "It's clear that coal gasification is by far preferable to building traditional pulverized coal plants." On Tuesday a Texas District court judge blocked a plan by the governor to "fast track" TXU's application.

Getting carbon out of the gas stream before combustion must be easier, Mr. Smith said, because the post-combustion gases in a pulverized coal plant are 160 times as great.

Some utility executives agree. David Crane, the chief executive of NRG Energy, said that at some point engineers might work out an economical way to capture carbon after combustion in a pulverized coal plant, but that does not exist now.

Because carbon regulation is coming, he said, gasification plants will be needed.

"For the next generation, it's clear to me that rather than build a bunch of pulverized coal plants, with their 50-year life, the country is much better off if we go to I.G.C.C.," he said. The company is planning such a plant in Tonawanda, N.Y.

Others point out that carbon capture from gas made from coal has proved workable, at least at a relatively small nonpower plant that manufactures methane, but that it is still unproved at a large power plant. They say the only way to prove its feasibility is to go ahead now, rather than simply build plants to be modified later.

"There is no reason to wait," Robert H. Socolow, a professor at Princeton who is an expert on carbon capture, said in an e-mail message. "We are going to learn on the job."

Some environmentalists dispute the need for new coal plants, but unless there is very rapid progress soon in realizing energy efficiencies or developing the ability to extract and store huge amounts of wind and solar power at reasonable cost, more coal plants seem certain. Compared with cleaner fossil fuels, like natural gas and oil, coal is cheaper and more widely available. So finding a way to capture the greenhouse gases from these plants is critical.

At American Electric Power, which plans to build two gasification plants and add carbon separation later, Bruce H. Braine, the vice president for strategic policy analysis, acknowledged that there was a "retrofit factor" that would raise the price of such a plant above the cost of waiting a few years and building in the separation technology from the start. But because there is demonstrable evidence that separating carbon from gasified coal would work better than at a pulverized coal plant, he said, "we think it's the right thing to do to move the I.G.C.C. technology forward."

Engineers agree that it is easier to remove sulfur, mercury, particles and other conventional pollutants from plants that use gasification. But they are more expensive to build, and the industry has little experience with their reliability. Even the manufacturers concede this.

"It will work," Randy Zwirn, the chief executive of Siemens Power Generation, said of the ability to separate carbon from a gasified coal plant. "The question is, Can it be done economically?"

Power companies need to start getting experience in this field, he said, but they will need subsidies or agreements with state regulators to avoid being unfairly penalized for testing designs that turned out not to run very well, at least not at first. Otherwise, he said, they would stick with tried-and-true methods and the early steps to a truly revolutionary technology might never be taken.

John Thompson, director of the Coal Transition Program at the Clean Air Task Force, an environmental group, argued that coal gasification was superior because it allowed far better control of conventional pollutants, like mercury, and because it offered new ways of making money from coal-fired plants. For example, he said, they might use a gasifier that made fuel for a power generator during peak hours, and in off-peak hours made gas that could be turned into liquid fuel for vehicles or other valuable chemicals.

But at the Electric Power Research Institute, which surveys the technologies for low-carbon generation, Steve Specker, the president, refers to a "horse race" between pulverized coal and combined cycle.

For all the questions about the coal technologies, any new plant should at least be an improvement on what is operating now. The reason is that many plants now running require about 10,000 B.T.U.'s of heat to make a kilowatt-hour. But newer designs, called "supercritical," use hotter steam, with no moisture, and get more work out of it.

DOJ_NMG_0134731

The newest designs, which the industry calls "ultra supercritical," push down the amount of heat needed to make a kilowatt-hour; engineers expect to reach the range of 7,500 B.T.U.

This will be small consolation, however, if the total number of kilowatt-hours rises sharply at the same time that reducing carbon emissions becomes a national goal.

A Battle Over The Costs Of Global Warming (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

New York Times, February 21, 2007

New Haven

There is an unofficial code of conduct that dictates how intellectuals should behave when they're jousting with each other, a sort of Geneva Convention for the ivory tower.

Before they attack somebody else's work, they first need to praise their opponent. A typical way to do so is to describe another professor as a distinguished scholar who has made an important contribution to the research literature. When you hear that, you can be pretty sure things are about to get nasty.

The rest of us can usually ignore these spats, but once in a while there is an academic fight that really matters. The economics profession is engaged in one of those right now and, as luck would have it, it's even more entertaining than most.

Last week, Sir Nicholas Stern, a top adviser to the British government, came to the United States to talk about climate change. In October, a commission he led released a 700-page report calling for "urgent action" against global warming to prevent economic damage that could rival that of the world wars and the Great Depression. Given its source and its tone, the Stern Review has nudged people to talk more seriously about climate change.

In the minds of a lot of American economists, however, the review is a badly flawed piece of work. These economists don't doubt that earth is getting hotter, that human activity is the cause and that the results could be bad. But they think that Sir Nicholas may have exaggerated the likely speed of warming, among other things, and overstated the case for big, quick action.

The epicenter of the opposition has been here at Yale, and so last week, after stopping in Washington to testify before Congress, Sir Nicholas came to New Haven for a public debate with his critics. With a couple of hundred students and professors in the audience — and a sculpture of an angry Zeus-like figure looming above the stage — the two sides went at it in the dignified, vicious way that academics do.

Sir Nicholas spoke during the morning, and his case is really quite simple. The carbon dioxide that has already been pumped into the atmosphere guarantees that the planet will keep getting warmer. But the decisions that people make over the next couple of decades will determine how much warmer — and, in all likelihood, how many floods, droughts, hurricanes, crop failures and species extinctions occur. The surest way to reduce emissions is a big economic deterrent, like a carbon tax.

"The later we leave it, the more difficult it will be," he said, "and the more risks you run."

The Stern Review's most influential critic has probably been William Nordhaus, a 65-year-old Yale professor who is as mainstream as economists come. Jeffrey D. Sachs, the anti-poverty advocate, calls Mr. Nordhaus "about the most reasonable man I know."

He was the first speaker after lunch, and, of course, he had some very nice things to say about Sir Nicholas. The report "was presented here very eloquently by a distinguished scholar," Mr. Nordhaus said. But then came the juicy stuff: the Stern Review "commits cruel and unusual punishment on the English language," Mr. Nordhaus said, and the British government's opinion on climate change is no more infallible than was its prewar view about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

This was fairly tame compared with the comments of another Yale economist, Robert O. Mendelsohn. "I was awestruck," he said, comparing Sir Nicholas to "The Wizard of Oz." But "my job is to be Toto," he added, in the same good-humored tone Mr. Nordhaus used. "Is it in fact The Wizard of Oz, or is it nothing at all?"

The two professors raised some questions about the science in the Stern Review. Mr. Nordhaus wondered if carbon emissions and temperatures would rise as quickly as the report suggests, and Mr. Mendelsohn predicted that people would learn to adapt to climate change, reducing its ultimate cost.

DOJ_NMG_0134732

But their main objection revolved around something called the discount rate. The Stern Review assumed that a dollar of economic damage prevented a century from now (adjusted for inflation) is roughly as valuable as a dollar spent reducing emissions today. In effect, the report argues for spending the money to cut emissions because future generations have as much claim on resources as current generations. "I've still not heard a decent ethical argument" for believing otherwise, Sir Nicholas said at the debate.

I'm guessing that your instinct is to agree with him. Mine certainly was. The problem is that none of us actually behave this way. If we really thought that our great-grandchild deserved our money as much as we do, we would never go out to dinner again. Instead, we would invest the $50 we would have spent on dinner, confident that it would grow over time and become perhaps $1,000 for our great-grandchild to put toward health care, education or a supercomputer. Any of that is preferable to our measly dinner.

But a dollar today truly is more valuable than a dollar a century from now. For one thing, your great-grandchild will almost certainly be richer than you are and won't need your money as much as you do. So spending a dollar on carbon reduction today to avoid a dollar's worth of economic damage in 2107 doesn't make sense. We would be better off putting the money toward something likely to have a higher return than alternative energy, like education.

Technically, then, Sir Nicholas's opponents win the debate. But in practical terms, their argument has a weak link. They are assuming that the economic gains from, say, education will make future generations rich enough to make up for any damage caused by climate change. Sea walls will be able to protect cities; technology can allow crops to grow in new ways; better medicines can stop the spread of disease.

No one knows whether this is true, let alone desirable, because no one knows what life will be like on a planet that is five degrees hotter. "If ever there was an example where there was uncertainty, this is it," said Martin L. Weitzman, a Harvard economist who attended the debate.

While sitting there, I was reminded of the speeches that Alan Greenspan gave a few years ago about the risks of deflation. It wasn't the most likely outcome, he said, but the consequences of it could be so bad that policy makers had to take steps to prevent it. Focusing attention on this point — the catastrophic risks of climate change — is Sir Nicholas's biggest accomplishment, whatever you think of his math.

As Mr. Weitzman puts it, the Stern Review is "right for the wrong reasons."

Even its critics seem open to this idea. When Mr. Nordhaus and Sir Nicholas were exchanging e-mail messages before the debate — to their credit, some academics keep their arguments from becoming personal — Mr. Nordhaus sent a note that summed up his view. "I think it's a great study, but it's 50 years ahead of its time," he recalled writing. "Since everybody else is 50 years behind the times, if you average the two, you might come out just right."

In other words, it's time for a tax on carbon emissions.

Where Warming Hits Home (LAT)

By Henry Chu

Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

In Bangladesh, rising oceans are surging up rivers, making life difficult — and salty — for residents of the low-lying region.

Bhamia, Bangladesh

Global warming has a taste in this village. It is the taste of salt.

Only a few years ago, water from the local pond was fresh and sweet on Samit Biswas' tongue. It quenched his family's thirst and cleansed their bodies.

But drinking a cupful now leaves a briny flavor in his mouth. Tiny white crystals sprout on Biswas' skin after he bathes and in his clothes after his wife washes them.

The change, international scientists say, is the result of intensified flooding caused by shifting climate patterns. Warmer weather and rising oceans are sending seawater surging up Bangladesh's rivers in greater volume and frequency than ever before, experts say, overflowing and seeping into the soil and water supply of thousands of people.

DOJ_NMG_0134733

Their lives are being squeezed by distant lands they have seen only on television — America, China and Russia at the top of the list — whose carbon emissions are pushing temperatures and sea levels upward. Earlier this month, a long-awaited report by the United Nations said global warming fueled by human activity could lift temperatures by 8 degrees and the ocean's surface by 23 inches by 2100.

Here in southwestern Bangladesh, the bleak future forecast by the report is already becoming reality, bringing misery along with it.

The heavier than usual floods have wiped out homes and paddy fields. They have increased the salinity of the water, which is contaminating wells, killing trees and slowly poisoning the jungle that forms a natural barrier against the Bay of Bengal.

If sea levels continue to rise at their present rate, by the time Biswas, 35, retires from his job as a teacher, the only home he has known will be swamped, overrun by the ocean with the force of an unstoppable army. That, in turn, will trigger another kind of flood: millions of displaced residents desperate for a place to live.

"It will be a disaster," Biswas said.

Bangladesh, a densely crowded and painfully poor nation, contributes only a minuscule amount to the greenhouse gases slowly smothering the planet. But a combination of geography and demography puts it among the countries experts predict will be hit hardest as Earth heats up.

Nearly 150 million people, the equivalent of about half the U.S. population, live packed in an area the size of Iowa and about as flat. Home to where the mighty Brahmaputra, Ganges and Meghna rivers meet, most of Bangladesh is a vast delta of alluvial plains that are barely above sea level, making it prone to flooding from waterways swollen by rain, snowmelt from the Himalayas and increased infiltration of the ocean.

Global warming trends have already exacerbated that, and the situation will probably get worse, scientists say.

"A little increase in temperature, a little climate change, has a magnified impact here," said A. Atiq Rahman, director of the Bangladesh Center for Advanced Studies — the country's leading environmental research group — in Dhaka, the capital. "That's what makes the population here so vulnerable."

Other low-lying countries also are at risk, including the Netherlands and tiny islands in the South Pacific that could eventually be swallowed by the expanding oceans. But the population of these countries is only a fraction of that of Bangladesh.

If the sea here rises by a foot, which some researchers say could happen by 2040, the resulting damage would set back Bangladesh's progress by 30 years, Rahman said. As much as 12% of the population would be made homeless.

A 3-foot rise by century's end — a possible scenario if the polar ice caps melt at a more rapid pace — would wreak havoc in Bangladesh on an apocalyptic, Atlantis-like scale, according to scientific projections and models.

A quarter of the country would be submerged. Dhaka, now in the center of the nation, would sit within 60 miles of the coast, where boats would float above the underwater remnants of countless town squares, markets, houses and schools. As many as 30 million people would become refugees in their own land, many of them subsistence farmers with nothing left to subsist on.

"Tomorrow's poverty will be far worse than today's," Rahman said.

For years, the government here either denied or downplayed the danger posed by global warming. Bangladesh is hardly unique in that regard; many accuse the U.S. of doing the same. Rahman recalls overhearing officials ridicule him as a madman when he warned that Bangladesh risked being inundated.

But the weight of scientific opinion has grown, as has evidence that climate patterns are already shifting and producing harmful effects in this region. Politicians who had previously dismissed global warming as a far-off problem are starting to see it as a clear and present danger.

"Part of it is sheer reality hitting you on the head — there's stronger floods, more frequent floods," Rahman said. "Now the game is much clearer. The connection ... has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt."

Three years ago, the government set up a climate-change unit in its Environment Ministry, but it employs only a handful of staff and depends largely on the British government for funding.

Lately officials have also begun appealing to wealthy, fossil-fuel-consuming nations such as Japan and the countries of the European Union to help Bangladesh prepare for a catastrophe it has few resources to combat.

DOJ_NMG_0134734

"Lives in Bangladesh will be devastated through no fault of the people concerned," Sabihuddin Ahmed, the ambassador to Britain and a former Environment Ministry official, wrote in the Guardian newspaper in September.

For people in the West, Ahmed said, the onslaught of global warming may seem decades away. In Bangladesh, "the future has arrived."

Here in the coastal southwest, in an area called Munshiganj close to the Indian border and the famed Sundarbans mangrove forest, grizzled farmers describe the relentless encroachment of the sea.

Thirty years ago, an embankment built to hem in the tidal rivers around them was sufficient to protect villagers from major inundations. Now they estimate that the high-tide mark has climbed 10 feet, and breaches such as one that happened in September, which swamped hundreds of homes, have become depressingly common.

"The water came up to here," said Iman Ali Gain, sweeping his hand up to his chest as scores of men behind him hauled baskets of gloppy gray soil to repair the dike. "We were afraid when we saw it."

Like many, perhaps most, Munshiganj residents, Gain, 65, does not understand concepts such as carbon footprints, greenhouse gases, the ozone layer or melting icecaps. The vast majority of the people in this area are illiterate; only one in five has finished primary school.

But Gain knows how his life has changed over the last several years because of new environmental conditions. He once grew rice to support himself and his family, but his harvests started shrinking as the salinity of the water increased. To cope, he followed the example of many of his neighbors and switched to shrimp farming, a way to take advantage of the salty water washing over the fields.

For the first time in Munshiganj, shrimp farming occupies more of the cultivable land than do traditional crops.

Though the shift has enabled some villagers to survive, it has created other headaches. Because it is less labor-intensive, shrimp farming has boosted unemployment. Thousands of residents have migrated to other parts of Bangladesh or India in search of work.

Worse yet, deliberately trapping so much briny water to raise shrimp has increased the sodium concentration in the soil, which aggravates the salinity creeping into drinking-water supplies.

"From ancient times, our people used [local] ponds for drinking water. Now they need to go four to five kilometers to collect sweet water," said Mohon Kumar Mondal, a local environmental activist who is trying to promote awareness of and adaptation to climate change.

The small pond here in the village of Bhamia draws women with their jars from several surrounding villages that used to have their own, or closer, sources of drinking water. But Bhamia's pond is becoming more saline, and the nearest abundant source of untainted fresh water is nearly fives miles away.

Residents report an increase in health problems such as diarrhea, skin diseases and dysentery. The salty water has also killed many of the palm and date trees that once lent a fecund beauty to the sunbaked landscape.

Those here who are strongly religious, a mix of Muslims and Hindus, have tended to ascribe the changes in climate and the natural disasters befalling them to God, Mondal said.

Perhaps it is punishment for their impiety, the people murmur; perhaps, with repentance and prayer, God will relent and spare them the heavier floods, the stronger cyclones and the hotter summers they are experiencing. And perhaps there will be more fresh water to slake their thirst.

A geographer with a master's degree, Mondal, 31, knows humans are responsible for the problem that is making life more difficult here — and threatens to make it impossible if the temperatures and the oceans keep rising.

And so it is to humans, especially those in developed societies, that he issues his plea.

"I request people, please understand the situation of the Earth. Please make your decisions according to the situation," Mondal said. "And please think of poor people like us, who have not created greenhouse gases. Please think of our situation."

New Fight, Old Foe: Slavery (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134735

Zach Hunter was only 12 years old when he became an abolitionist. During Black History Month three years ago, as he read about Harriet Tubman and Frederick Douglass, he thought he, too, would have fought against slavery if he'd lived back then. But to his astonishment, Zach found soon afterward that people are still held as slaves today.

"When I learned there were about 27 million slaves in the world, it blew me away," says the high school freshman from Atlanta. "I wondered what I could do."

He noticed loose change lying around the house, and a project was born. He formed Loose Change to Loosen Chains, and with the help of friends, collected some $10,000 to fight modern-day slavery.

This year, Zach is part of a much broader antislavery initiative, serving as student spokesman for "The Amazing Change." Next month marks the 200th anniversary of the end of the British slave trade, which was spurred by a young parliamentarian and reformer, William Wilberforce. A feature film on Wilberforce, "Amazing Grace," opens in US theaters nationwide on Feb. 23. The filmmakers are partnering with modern antislavery organizations to enlist students and others in a contemporary abolitionist movement. (See: www.theamazingchange.com).

For his part, Zach has penned a book, "Be the Change," and travels across the country to speak to young people at music festivals, schools, and churches.

"I tell them they can channel their passion into something that makes a difference," he says. "Small groups of people have changed things all through history."

Slavery is illegal everywhere in the world, yet it persists. Zach finds inspiration in the courage of Wilberforce, who kept fighting under difficult circumstances. The reformer spent 20 years collecting evidence of the crimes of Britain's slave trade. He introduced bills that were repeatedly rejected by parliament before the trade was finally ended in 1807.

The Amazing Change campaign encourages people to sign a petition to end modern-day slavery, donate to the cause, and learn how they can take an active part in the movement. A percentage of funds donated will help four nonprofit groups (Free the Slaves, International Justice Mission, Rugmark, and Child Voice International) collect evidence, go to court to free people from current forms of slavery, and help former slaves establish a new life.

Last Sunday, churches in all 50 states and several countries participated in "Amazing Grace Sunday." Praying together for freedom, the congregations also joined in singing the well-known hymn written by John Newton, a former slave trader.

Newton wrote the beloved "Amazing Grace" around 1770 after a Christian conversion led him into the ministry; he was once Wilberforce's pastor.

While slavery takes different forms today, the impact remains devastating to lives around the globe, according to UN and US government statistics. An estimated 300,000 children have been forced to serve as child soldiers in more than 30 conflicts. Each year, human trafficking for sexual servitude or forced labor moves 800,000 people across international borders, including some 17,500 foreigners trafficked into the United States. Some 200,000 people are considered to live enslaved in the US.

The number of bonded slaves – men, women, and children who toil in agriculture or industries – has reached an estimated 20 million worldwide, says Free the Slaves.

While total figures for slaves vary (the International Labor Organization has used 12.3 million for forced labor and sexual servitude), the 27 million estimate Zach Hunter cites is widely supported.

Remarkably, many slaves are in the public eye, yet invisible. For example, Kim, a young teen from a family of Tibetan exiles, was surreptitiously sold by a relative to an American minister traveling in India. He brought her back to a rural town in Massachusetts in 1985, where she became his sex slave and household servant. The pastor told Kim her family would be thrown in jail if she told anyone, so while she attended school, she kept the secret for five years. Only when Kim learned her cousins were to share the same fate did she go to the police.

Kim's poignant story is told in "Not for Sale: The Return of the Global Slave Trade and How We Can Fight It," by David Batstone, one of three new books associated with the Amazing Change campaign.

A professor of ethics at the University of San Francisco, Dr. Batstone traveled to five continents last year to investigate the workings of modern slavery, including going undercover to gather evidence. He defines slavery as "forcing someone else's labor without compensation, and using violence to keep them in their position."

DOJ_NMG_0134736

Batstone's interest in the subject was first ignited, he says in an interview, when his favorite Indian restaurant, where he and his wife ate regularly, figured in an exposé by the San Francisco Chronicle. The story revealed that the young waitresses at the restaurant had been brought from India against their will and were also forced to perform sexual favors. The restaurant owner had trafficked in hundreds of young girls and boys.

"In the US, 47 percent of trafficking is in the commercial sex business," Batstone adds. The women are brought mostly from China, Mexico, and southeast Asia.

On his journeys, Batstone found that the most prevalent form of slavery globally is in agriculture, involving labor in rice mills or on plantations, as well as rock quarries and brick kilns. In some cases, people borrow small amounts of money from a local landowner to buy food or pay for a wedding, and the lender begins adding egregious levels of interest, requiring work until it's paid off.

"In India, I met a family of four generations of women," Batstone says, "great-grandmother to daughter, who had spent their entire lives under obligation to a landowner for a loan the great-grandfather had taken out for the equivalent of $10. This is illegal, but hardly enforced."

While exploring this dark side of the global economy, Batstone found a silver lining: "a rising tide of modern-day abolitionists who are building an underground railroad for the 21st century." So inspired was he by the efforts of many small, understaffed, and underfunded groups working to free people, that the focus of his book shifted to profiling these new abolitionists.

He decided to mount his own international advocacy and fundraising project, too: the "Not for Sale Campaign" (www.notforsalecampaign.org). The campaign enlists athletes, musicians, and others in "making whatever you love best an abolitionist activity."

Figure-skating star Brian Boitano, for instance, "has pledged to give $10 every time he does a triple loop," Batstone says. A "Concert to End Slavery" with top-notch artists has just been filmed in a Los Angeles recording studio, and a documentary related to the book will be ready for TV in March.

But more is needed than raising awareness and funds, Batstone says. "People who should be acting to stop slavery say they don't know where it is." So his students at the University of San Francisco have taken on the job: mapping slavery in the area – where it occurs in agriculture, the restaurant business, domestic servitude, etc. They are also creating a model for how to map slavery so that students and others could do the same in other cities.

"We'll take that report each year to the mayor's office, the chief of police, and the media, saying 'Here's where slavery can be found in our city,' " he says. "My students are unbelievably charged up."

Zach Hunter, too, is enthused about what young people can accomplish. "My vision is that my generation would be written about in the history books as a generation that really cared about others and brought about change," he says.

In Haiti, Abductions Hold Nation Hostage (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti -- Kidnappers came for Petit-FrÃ¨re Desilus in the early afternoon, as he was driving away from his office.

The street was busy and he was just 10 feet outside the gated compound where he worked as a billing clerk. But they got him anyway, Desilus recalled recently in a hushed voice, trying to steady his trembling hands.

Two young men, their faces hard but calm, flashed pistols at him. When he turned, he saw four more gun barrels behind him. Pedestrians did nothing, merely swerving around the unfolding scene, he said.

"Lie down, shut up," Desilus remembers being told. "Today you're going to get yours."

Pressed flat against the back seat, Desilus was about to begin a downward spiral that severed his tenuous hold on a working-class lifestyle, leaving him poor and depressed more than four months after his captors released him. His troubles have become commonplace here. One year after a presidential election that generated optimism and marked only the second peaceful handover of power in Haitian history, Port-au-Prince is a city of fear.

DOJ_NMG_0134737

Despite the presence of thousands of U.N. troops and a new military offensive to root out gangs, armed thugs still rule much of this hilly capital, where many of the 2 million residents live in tin or cinder-block shacks. A swarm of recent kidnappings is terrorizing residents and scaring away foreign investment.

Dozens of schools closed in December after students were kidnapped in a series of incidents and a school bus was hijacked. That month, at least 100 people were reported kidnapped, the most since August, when 115 were abducted. Victim advocates say the real numbers may be much higher; once freed, people often are afraid to go to the police.

Haiti's government has been powerless to stop the crisis. International advisers describe the police force and judicial system as critically dysfunctional and profoundly corrupt.

"We are a failed state -- our institutions are bad, they don't work," said Kesner F. Pharel, a Haitian economist who was trained in the United States and runs a business consulting firm in Port-au-Prince. "It is crucial for Haiti to solve the security problem if we have any hope of making progress."

The kidnapping plague, which began in 2004 after the ouster of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide and peaked during the past six months, is the latest horror in a long history of upheaval that has sealed Haiti's position as the Western Hemisphere's poorest nation. A hip destination for the adventurous rich in the 1970s -- a place where Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones hung out and where tourists lounged at the Club Med -- Haiti is now a barely functioning country, dependent on the largess of international donors for two-thirds of its budget. The United States, which provides $200 million a year, is Haiti's largest bilateral donor.

Decades of coups and political instability have ruined Haiti's economy and tourism industry, leaving factories closed and once-thriving beach resorts abandoned. According to the International Monetary Fund, 76 percent of Haitians live on less than $2 per day and 55 percent of those live on less than 44 cents a day.

Many here had hoped for stabilization after the election last February of President RenÃ© PrÃ©val, a soft-spoken agronomist who held the presidency from 1996 to 2001 and who promised reconciliation among 100 political parties. But crime has soared under PrÃ©val, exacting its heaviest toll on the poor and working class, who cannot afford ransoms or the bodyguards and bulletproof vehicles that shield every movement of Haiti's entrenched elite.

Desilus, 42, a slender man with big, sad eyes, was far from joining Haiti's elites. But he had scratched his way out of the slums and gotten a decent job. Before being kidnapped, he had managed to buy a tiny one-room apartment, where he lived with his wife and three of his six children.

The kidnappers, he said, took him to Cite Soleil, a 2 1/2 -square-mile seaside slum of more than 200,000 people that is ruled by gangs. The kidnappers beat him inside a second-story room that had been converted into a makeshift cell with heavy bars on the windows. They made him drink his own urine, he said.

Following a practice typical of kidnappers here, Desilus's abductors called all the numbers stored in the address book of his cellphone, each time threatening to kill him and demanding $100,000, the equivalent of 20 years' salary for Desilus. A day later, they settled for $4,800 and released him. But his troubles were just starting.

Traumatized by the experience, he asked his boss to let him switch to a job that would require moving around the city less. His boss responded by firing him.

Meanwhile, the friends and associates who had paid for Desilus's ransom were pushing to get their money back. Desilus said he sold his little apartment, as well as a small plot of land that he owned in the country, to pay off his debt. He drained his bank account.

Suddenly homeless, he was forced to move his family into a cousin's home. Jobless, he had to pull four of his children out of school, as even Haitian public schools charge tuition and require parents to buy materials.

"For me to build up what I had, it took me 10 years," he said. "I have to start all over. But being in this country, I don't see how I can."

Desilus desperately wanted someone to face justice. He tried repeatedly to get the Haitian police interested in his case. But each time the officers refused to write a report, he said.

It was a futile exercise that another kidnapping victim, a music vendor who goes by the nickname "Peaceful Michel," didn't even consider embarking upon. Michel, who was abducted in December, was seized in front of a police station and said he is certain the officers witnessed the kidnapping. Friends who have also been kidnapped told him they were "just laughed at" by police when they tried to file complaints, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134738

"Unless you're a millionaire, they're not listening to you," said Michel, who was deported from the United States after serving a four-year drug sentence and now is active in organizations that try to aid Haitian deportees.

The United Nations, which is engaged in background checks of police that officials believe could lead to the dismissal of 1,000 corrupt officers, is now overseeing the largest military operation to defeat gangs since being deployed here in 2004. U.N. officials hope to stem the flow of kidnap ransoms to gangs, some of which need as much as $70,000 a month to pay for their operations.

PrÃ©val initially opposed military intervention, opting to negotiate with the gangs, and invited several top gang leaders to the National Palace. Edmond Mulet, the U.N. special envoy to Haiti, described the talks as a "very strange" strategy.

"By mid-September PrÃ©val said, 'This is going to work. This will be over by October,' " Mulet recalled during an interview at his headquarters in the Hotel Christopher in Port-au-Prince. "I said, 'Okay, if you say so.' But I knew in my heart it would not work."

In the past year, kidnappers appear to have been targeting victims throughout the city rather than staying in the slums that are patrolled by the U.N. troops. Residents of neighborhoods once considered safe now feel anxious.

Christian Duvivier was nabbed after leaving Magdoo's, a hip hangout for Port-au-Prince's young, moneyed set in the prestigious hilltop neighborhood, Petionville.

Kidnappers rammed their car into Duvivier's vehicle, he recalled in an e-mail from the Dominican Republic, where he fled after a ransom was paid and he was released. They pulled out guns and told him they were "the devil's sons" and that "they kill for fun," Duvivier said.

Young people and professionals are pouring out of Haiti. By some estimates as many as 50,000 have left in the past several years, creating a massive "brain drain," according to Pharel, the economist.

But for some kidnapping victims, fleeing is not an option. Emmanuelle Poncet, a Port-au-Prince math teacher, has spent the five months since his kidnapping and release trying to get a visa to enter the United States so he can leave Haiti and "never come back." He finds his solace in chain-smoking and bottles of rum, a form of self-medication that he knows is ruining his health.

Poncet's brother, a Catholic priest, and a group of friends paid nearly $14,000 to free him. Like Desilus, Poncet has sold what little he had to pay off his debts. His car and a small farm were gone within days of his release, sold cheap because the buyers knew he was desperate.

One week after his release, Poncet got a phone call from another group of kidnappers. They were holding his brother-in-law, they told him. And they wanted money.

Weed's Biofuel Potential Sparks African Land Grab (WT)

By Karen Palmer

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

ACCRA, Ghana - Jatropha, a scruffy bush producing dry, black nuts, is triggering a scramble for land in Africa, with Norwegian, Indian and British companies looking to producing clean-burning biodiesel for cars and trucks.

It's not much in the looks department, but jatropha has a big advantage over alternatives. The nuts can't be eaten because they are poisonous.

Long used as nothing more than living fences meant to hold back the encroaching Sahara and Kalahari deserts, jatropha oil, the evidence shows, burns cleaner than fossil fuels.

That, in turn, has experimental plantations popping up in Africa from Kenya to Ghana to South Africa.

"You can't keep from winning on this one," said Jack Holden, director of GoldStar Biodiesel, a self-described "serial entrepreneur." He is one of a small number of businessmen, based in Ghana, who hope to profit from jatropha by helping investors find places for their money.

DOJ_NMG_0134739

As a natural defense against erosion and desertification, jatropha already is a darling of the development world. Plant it once and it will grow for 50 years, even in some of the poorest soil conditions on the planet.

When drought descends, jatropha bushes keep producing.

Thousands of rural African women's groups have been trained to hand crush the seeds, turning the resulting oil into soap and the organic waste into fertilizer cakes.

But the oil inside its seed also burns with one-fifth the emissions of conventional fuel.

With the growing attention of major oil distributors, jatropha is the little plant that could lift African farmers from lives of poverty and the continent into a fuel oil producer.

That's a lot of pressure on one lowly weed.

It could, however, go the way of the emu farm: just another expensive farming fad that went bust instead of boom.

"You would think the way people talk that it's very easy to go out there and plant jatropha, but we figure it will take about $6 million to do ," said Mr. Holden, whose company is promising to tie community development to biodiesel profits.

Scientists estimate that if even a quarter of the continent's arable land was ploughed into jatropha plantations, output would surpass 20 million barrels a day, almost enough to satisfy the U.S. appetite for oil.

But it's Europe that's driving the thirst for biodiesel. The European Union has said they will use 5.75 percent biodiesel in fuel products by 2010 and 20 percent by 2020, meaning that within four years, the EU will need billions of gallons of biodiesel.

European environment ministers said yesterday they plan to reduce carbon-dioxide emissions 20 percent by 2020, adding that they were ready to go to 30 percent if other industrialized nations matched their efforts. There was no agreement on how the cuts would be achieved or how they would be divvied up among member countries.

Ghana, an English-speaking West African nation, has earmarked $1.6 million in government funds to help establish jatropha plantations.

A Norwegian company has been running ads in the state-owned newspaper looking for land to use for jatropha crops, and Ghana recently received $35 million from the government of India for jatropha research.

A ton of crude jatropha sells for about $300, according to a report prepared for the Ghana Chamber of Mines, which is pushing jatropha production as an alternative to illegal, small-scale gold mining. Farmers could make about $150 per acre, a 50 percent increase over harvests of other cash crops such as tobacco.

Analysts predict that experienced workers can hand-pick more than 65 pounds of jatropha seed pods in an hour, translating into more than 13 pounds of pressed crude, or an hourly wage of nearly $2.

Considering that more than 300 million Africans live on less than a dollar a day, jatropha could help farmers lift themselves out of poverty, something the world has already spent billions trying to achieve with little success.

Still, Ghanaian farmers are not all that interested in jatropha.

"The way things are now, it has potential, but we haven't seen anything for now," said Anthony Mainoo, agricultural technical coordinator at Adventist Development and Relief Agency, which used a $50,000 U.N. Development Program grant to persuade 3,000 farmers to set aside an acre each for jatropha production three years ago.

When the time came to harvest, there was no one willing to buy the seeds.

"We have no real information on the yield in Ghana, no sense of how the money will flow, no idea," he said.

It's difficult to determine exactly how much African land is currently being cultivated with jatropha, but there are fields slated for planting in Benin, Mali, Senegal, Burkina Faso and Nigeria, plus acreage in Kenya, Malawi, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Namibia and South Africa.

"It's really like gold. You have to put money into it to make it," said Daniel Osei-Bonsu, environmental director of AngloGold Ashanti, a South African-owned gold mine operating on 160,000 acres in Ghana's lush central region.

A year ago, Mr. Osei-Bonsu and his team cleared 56 acres and planted jatropha into ground he compares to asphalt.

Four months later, it was producing its first seeds.

With all analyses pointing to the fact that the AngloGold Ashanti gold vein will be depleted by 2016, Mr. Osei-Bonsu said he is determined to find an alternate source of income for the mine's 3,000 workers.

DOJ_NMG_0134740

"If we can demonstrate it can give not big money, but satisfactory money on a regular basis, rather than on a seasonal basis, farmers will pick it up," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134741

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Court: Detainees Can't Challenge Cases (AP) ... 4
Court Rejects Detainees' Cases (WSJ) ... 5
Guantanamo Challenges Rejected (LAT) ... 6
Court Hands Bush Win In Gitmo Case (WT) ... 6
No Federal Court For Guantanamo Detainees (CSM) ... 7
Court Blow For Guantánamo Prisoners (FT) ... 8
Court Endorses Law's Curbs On Detainees (NYT) ... 9
Administration Backed On Detainees (USAT) ... 10
Guantanamo Detainees Lose Appeal (WP) ... 11
D.C. Circuit Denies Detainee Challenges (LAW) ... 12
Court Upholds Military Proceedings For Detainees (NPR) ... 12
EDITORIAL Restore Habeas Rights (LAT) ... 13
Audit: Anti-terror Case Data Flawed (AP) ... 14
Report: Feds Overstate Terrorism Cases (CHIT) ... 15
Justice Dept. Statistics On Terrorism Faulted (WP) ... 16
Terror Statistics Deemed Inaccurate (WT) ... 17
Audit Questions Accuracy Of Federal Terror Statistics (MCT) ... 17
Judge Rejects Delay Of Phone Wiretap Suits (SFC) ... 17
FBI Translating Over 1,000 Wiretap Conversations A Day (USNEWS) ... 18
American Faces Charges In Qaeda Case (NYT) ... 19
Houston Al-Qaida Case On Hold (HC) ... 20
Accused Terrorist From Houston Described As 'Militant' (KPRC) 20
GOP Donor Hit With Terror Charges (AP) ... 21
Terrorism Suspect Is Republican Donor (HILL) ... 21
Propagating Terror (WT) ... 22
Muslim Groups Fast For Jailed Al-Arian (WT) ... 23

Homeland Response:

Attorney General To Inspect Supermax (PUEBCH) ... 23
Gonzales Plans Supermax Tour (CANCDR) ... 24
Bush Swears In New Intelligence Director (USAT) ... 24
Retired Admiral Sworn In As Director Of Intelligence (WP) ... 25
U.S. Official Admits To Big Delay In Revamping No-Fly Program (NYT) ... 26
Park Police Survey Shows Doubt In Chief, Terror Readiness (WT) ... 26
Nichols Says Bombing Was FBI Op (DESERET) ... 27
FBI, DHS Launch Third Fingerprint System Data-sharing Pilot (GCN) ... 29
Spitzer Makes Switch Official: He Supports Freedom Tower (NYT) ... 29
NY, NJ Govs Sign Off On Freedom Tower (AP) ... 30
Spitzer Says There's Time To Resolve 9/11 Memorial Names Issue (NSDY/AP) ... 30
After 9/11, Ailing Residents Find A Place To Turn (NYT) ... 31
Screening For Unions (WSJ) ... 33
La. Levee Plan Leaves Some Helpless (USAT) ... 33

War News:

Sen. Reid Discusses Iraq Troop Strategy (AP) ... 34
For Democrats, War Is Front And Center (LAT) ... 35
Former Admiral Says All American Forces Should Pull Out By Year's End (MCT) ... 36
Cheney: U.S. Won't Relent In Iraq War (AP) ... 37
Vulnerable House Republicans Risk Ties To Bush On War Vote (HILL) ... 37
War Debate Fuels Advocacy Groups (WT) ... 38
The Woman In The Middle (WP) ... 39
Many House Members Cite, But Don't Read, Full NIE Iraq Report (HILL) ... 42
A Peaceful Death, Then The Blast (LAT) ... 43
Copter Attacks In Iraq May Indicate New Battle Strategy (WP) ... 44
Joint Force Weighs Move On Sadr City (LAT) ... 45
Beyond Baghdad, Grass-Roots Security (WP) ... 46
Rape Accusation Reinforces Fears In A Divided Iraq (NYT) ... 47
A Rape Case Goes Public, Igniting Political Fray (WP) ... 49
Britain To Announce Trimming Of Iraq Force, Reports Say (NYT) ... 50
Blair To Reveal 1,600 Cut In Iraq Troops (FT) ... 50
Blair Readies Timeline For British Cuts In Iraq Force (WT) ... 51
U.K. May Pull 1,500 Troops From Iraq (WSJ/AP) ... 52
Blair To Unveil British Troop Reduction From Iraq (LAT) ... 52
Blair To Announce Timetable For Pulling Troops From Iraq (USAT) ... 53
How Monument's Razing Might Preserve Iraqi Rift (WSJ) ... 54
Afghan Suicide Bomber Wounds 6 Soldiers (NYT) ... 55
A Problem Of Passivity (WP) ... 55

DOJ:

Interim U.S. Attorney For Northern California Sworn In (BAYCNS) ... 56
Editorial: Trading In U.S. Attorneys (PROJO) ... 56
Editorial: U.S. Attorneys Get No White House Respect (TRICH) 56

Study On Privacy Protections Finds Citizens Distrust Security Agencies (NJTECHD) ... 57

Corporate Scandals:

Oops! Orrick Associate Lets Slip Mercury Backdating Document (LAW) ... 58
Fannie Won't Pay $44.4 Million In Bonuses (WSJ) ... 59
Fannie Cancels Executive Bonuses (WP) ... 60

Criminal Law:

Jury To Deliberate In CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP) ... 61
Jurors To Begin Deliberations Today In Libby Perjury Trial (USAT) ... 62
Libby's Memory Is At The Heart Of The Case (LAT) ... 63
In Closing Pleas, Clashing Views On Libby's Role (NYT) ... 64
Scooter Jury Hears Of 'memory Lapse' (FT) ... 65
Libby 'Told A Dumb Lie,' Prosecutor Says In Closing Argument (WP) ... 65
The Defense Rests, And Not A Minute Too Soon (WP) ... 67
Ted Wells, Center Of The Defense (WP) ... 68
Justice Rebuffs Call For Berger Inquiry (WT) ... 70
Berger Case Still Roils Archives, Justice Dept. (WP) ... 70
Inquiry Of Campbell Staffers Wears On (HILL) ... 72
FBI, DOJ Continues Probe Of Wisc. Travel (AP) ... 73
Surprising New Evidence In The John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case (WREG) ... 74
John Ford Goes To Court Over Rolex Watch (WPTY) ... 74
Judge Mulls Decision After Ford's Rolex Hearing (WHBQ) ... 75
Memphis Developer Refuses Testimony On Ford Watch (WMC) 75
Sen. Cooper Intoxicated, Speeding, THP Charges (TENN) ... 76
One On Trial Blames Another: His Twin Brother (PHI) ... 76
Capano's U.S. Appeal Detailed (AP) ... 77
Elmira Man Admits To Child Porn Charge (ELMSG) ... 78
Investigator Pleads Guilty To Fraud Against Law Firms (LAW) .. 78
Lawyer Admits Stealing More Than $20 Million (AP) ... 79
Five Plead Guilty To Bilking Investors In Years-long Scam (SDUT) ... 79
Former Judge Collapses As He Is Sentenced For Child Porn Possession (LAT) ... 79
Owner Vows A Hassle In Escort-service Probe (WT) ... 81
Ex-ORNL Subcontractor Found Guilty In DOE Scheme (KNOXNS) ... 82
Pr. George's Official Opened Fire Unprovoked, Deliveryman Says (WP) ... 82
Body Found In Plaza Rubble Believed To Be Gunman (WP) ... 83
Why I Oppose The Death Penalty (WP) ... 84
Officer Charged With Molesting, Photographing Woman During Traffic Stop (WP) ... 85
For Youths, A Grim Tour On Magazine Crews (NYT) ... 86
Teen 'Sport Killings' Of Homeless On The Rise (CNN) ... 90
Half A Shield Is Better Than None (NYT) ... 92

Civil Law:

Supreme Court Tosses $79.5 Million Verdict Against Cigarette Company (USAT) ... 92
Supreme Court Voids $79.5 Million Award In A Tobacco Suit (MCT) ... 93
High Court Rejects $79.5 Million Award In Philip Morris Case (LAW) ... 94
Supreme Court Puts New Rules On Damage Awards (CSM) ... 95
Justices Overturn Tobacco Award (WP) ... 96
High Court Denies Altria Damages, Sets No Formula (WSJ) ... 97
Justices Overturn $79.5 Million Tobacco Ruling (NYT) ... 98
Reward To Smoker's Widow Nixed By Top Court (WT) ... 100
Shielding The Powerful (NYT) ... 101
Class Actions In Drag (WSJ) ... 101
Surgeon, Chiropractors Charged In $6 Million Fraud Schemes (ATLBIZ) ... 102
Nine Doctors Indicted For Billing Fraud (OCR) ... 102

Civil Rights:

AG Gonzales Touts Better Protection From Religious Discrimination (AP) ... 103
Gonzales Says Religious Freedoms A Priority (TENN) ... 104
Judge Sets Hearing On Kidnapping Charges In 1964 Killings Of 2 Black Men In Miss. (BSH) ... 105
Federal Grand Jury Indicts Two Chino Prison Officers (RPE) .. 105
Fighting For Access (APP) ... 106
Dallas Jail Settles Mistreatment Lawsuit (AP) ... 107
State Inmate Transfer Ruled Illegal (LAT) ... 107
Racism: What Do We Tell The Kids? (USAT) ... 108

Antitrust:

Justice Dept. Orders Sale Of Baltimore Steel Mill (WP) ... 109
Feds Order Mittal To Sell Mill To Settle Antitrust Issues (AP) ... 110
U.S. Orders Sale Of Sparrows Point (BSUN) ... 111
US DoJ Orders Arcelor Mittal To Divest Big Steel Mill (AFP) ... 112
Mittal Mill Expected To Draw Interest (WSJ) ... 113
Weirton Mill's Fate Unclear (WHEELINT) ... 113
Fate Of Weirton Mittal Steel Plant In Limbo (PTR) ... 114
Justice Department Ruling Sparing Weirton Disappoints Union (PPG) ... 115
Feds Add Twist To Chicago Steel Firm's Plans (CHIT) ... 116
Sirius-XM's Fate Hinges On Definitions (WSJ) ... 116
XM-Sirius Merger Hinges On FCC Ownership Rule (WP) ... 117
Sirius And XM Woo Regulators (FT) ... 118
Tough Antitrust Hurdles Seen For XM, Sirius Deal (MRKTWTCH) ... 119
FAQ: Serious Challenges For Sirius-XM Merger (CNET) ... 120
FCC Hurdles Loom For XM, Sirius Merger (AP) ... 121
New Climate May Benefit Radio Deal (NYT) ... 122
What Would A Satellite Radio Merger Mean? (USAT) ... 123
In The Same Orbit, But On Different Planets (WP) ... 124
US Radio Consolidation (FT) ... 125
Making Radio Waves (WSJ) ... 126
Supreme Court Overturns $79 Million Award Against Weyerhaeuser (AP) ... 127
High Court Limits Antitrust Suits In Weyerhaeuser Win (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 127
Weyerhaeuser Wins Supreme Court Appeal On 'Predatory Buying' (MRKTWTCH) ... 128

DOJ_NMG_0134743

Warner Is Closer To EMI Deal (WSJ) ... 128
Warner Truce Clears Way For EMI Bid (FT) ... 129
A Fair Price Would Put Nicoli On The Spot (FT) ... 130
Biomet Buyout Gets Antitrust Approval (AP) ... 130
Lift Manufacturers Face Brussels Rap (FT) ... 131
EU Clears Freeport-McMoRan To Buy Phelps (AP) ... 131
Korea Fines 9 Petrochemical Firms For Price Fixing (WSJ) ... 131

Environment:

Nuclear Plant Safety Is Called Into Question (LAT) ... 132
Md. House Approves Cut In Car Pollution (WP) ... 134

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 135
Border Agents Help Make Pot Seizure (CGVD) ... 136
Colombian Rebel Convicted On Drug Charge (AP) ... 136
Colombian Rebel Commander Found Guilty Of Drug-trafficking (MCT) ... 137
Jury Convicts FARC Leader (MH) ... 137
Ruleville Chief Sentenced On Extortion Charge (AP) ... 138
Robinson's Sentencing Scheduled (DDT) ... 138
Ruleville Police Chief Gets Prison Time (JCL) ... 139
Oxycodone Ringleader Gets 20 Years (HL) ... 139

Immigration:

Tougher Tactics Deter Migrants At U.S. Border (NYT) ... 139
Memo May Be Basis For New Trial Of Agents (SBS) ... 141
Policy Supports Agents (DB) ... 142

Tax:

Rapper Can't Evade Tax Charge (BOSH) ... 143

Congress-Administration:

Bush Presses Case For Health Plan (MRKTWTCH) ... 144
Bush's Pallid Health-Care Proposal (BSWK) ... 144
Many Americans Don't Trust Leaders To Reform Health Care, Poll Finds (WSJ) ... 145
Group To Protest Bush Visit To Chattanooga (CHA) ... 145
Medicare Benefit Appears To Slow Spending Growth On Drugs (WP) ... 146
Health Costs To Nearly Double In A Decade (LAT) ... 147
Roberts Launches Opposition To Bush's Health-care Proposals (WE) ... 148
Employer Groups Take Aim At Part Of Medical-leave Law (HILL) 148
Bush Friends, Loyal And Texan, Remain A Force (NYT) ... 149
Swift Action Promised At Walter Reed (WP) ... 151
Leadership Blamed For Shabby Army Hospital Building (CNN) 152
Walter Reed Probes Former Aid Director (KCS/AP) ... 153
Rotten Homecoming (WP) ... 153
US Deficit Is Shrinking, For Now (CSM) ... 154
Murtha Sees Security Threat In Trade Deal (HILL) ... 155
Inside Politics (WT) ... 156
VA Regains Access To Medical Records (WP) ... 158
Johnson Update (WP) ... 159
More And More, Retirees Are Finding That It Pays To Have Worked For The Government Instead Of The Private Sector (USAT) ... 159
FEDERAL DIARY: Thrift Savings Plan Hopes To Engage No-Shows (WP) ... 161
Helen Thomas Moving Back After 46 Years Down Front (POL) 162
That Sinking Feeling (NYT) ... 164
Making Amends (WP) ... 164

Other News:

Blue Chips Hit Another High, Aided By Wal-Mart, Oil's Fall (WSJ) ... 164
U.S. Stock Indexes Celebrate Milestones (USAT) ... 165
Falling Oil Prices Help Push Dow To Another Record Close (WP/AP) ... 166
Fed Buzz Advances Market (WT/AP) ... 166
Mistrial In Malpractice Case After Defendants Aid Juror (NYT) 167
Supreme Court Will Review The Way New York Selects Judicial Candidates (NYT) ... 167
Romney Mounting An Early Presidential Ad Campaign (NYT) . 168
Romney Goes Up On TV (POL) ... 169
The Abortion Wars (POL) ... 169
Mitt Romney's Extreme Makeover (WP) ... 170
McCain Defends Christian Outreach Effort (AP) ... 171
McCain Suffers In Polls Despite Iraq Stance (FT) ... 172
Dewine, Castle Endorse Mccain (HILL) ... 172
South Carolina To Test Rudy's Line On Judges (HILL) ... 173
Obama Attracts Celebrities And Cash (AP) ... 174
Hollywood Gives Obama Both Cash And Credibility (WP) ... 175
Obama Hat In Hand In La-la Land (CHIT) ... 175
Obama's Big Screen Test (NYT) ... 177
Obama And The Old Racial Bind (WP) ... 178
Clinton Seeks Aid For Minority Students (AP) ... 179
The Mononym Platform (NYT) ... 179
Democrats Turn Nevada Into Political Boomtown (USAT) ... 180
Three Questions On Iraq War Must Be Put To Obama, Edwards (HILL) ... 181
The Latino Revolution (HILL) ... 182
Biden's Son Sues Ex-Partner (WP/BLOOM) ... 183
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 184
What Does One Woman's Death Say About The Rest Of Us? (USAT) ... 185
Cheney Reassures Japan On NKorea (AFP) ... 185
Cheney's Visit To Japan Exposes Tensions (FT) ... 186
US Visit To Asia Likely To Shore Up N-deal (FT) ... 187
Iran Sets Condition To Halt Nuke Program (AP) ... 187
U.S. Rebuffs Iran On Eve Of Deadline (WSJ/AP) ... 189
Tehran Defiant As Deadline Nears (WT) ... 189
International Pressure Mounts On Iran (FT) ... 190
Table Talk (WSJ) ... 191
U.S. Navy Buildup Came After Iran Moves (AP) ... 192
Rice Seeks Arab Backing For Moderate Palestinians (AFP) ... 193
Rice Looks Back For A Way Forward On Mideast Peace (WP) 194
Israel Threatens To Ignore Abbas (AP) ... 196
No Peace Talks With Abbas If Fatah Joins Cabinet (WT) ... 197
Palestinian Factions Labor To Sustain Truce (WSJ) ... 197
After The Mecca Accord, Clouded Horizons (NYT) ... 199
Congress Puts Palestinian Funds In Limbo (LAT) ... 200

DOJ_NMG_0134744

Charade In Jerusalem (NYT) 201
Going Nowhere Fast (WP) 201
The 'Crime' Of Blogging In Egypt (WP) 202
2 Leaders Rebuff Russia's Nuclear Threats (NYT) 203
Antimissile Plan By U.S. Strains Ties With Russia (WP) 204
Russian Sabre Rattling Pushes Poles And Czechs Closer To The US (FT) 205
US Envoy Dispatched After Putin Charge (AP) 206
Somalia Plan Adopted (NYT) 206
Shelling In Somali Capital Kills 15 (WP/AP) 206
The New Somalia: A Grimly Familiar Rerun (NYT) 207
Europeans Agree To Cut Emissions Sharply If U.S. And Others Follow Suit (NYT) 208
Skeptics Emerge On Technologies For Cleaner Coal (NYT) 209
A Battle Over The Costs Of Global Warming (NYT) 210
Where Warming Hits Home (LAT) 211
New Fight, Old Foe: Slavery (CSM) 213
In Haiti, Abductions Hold Nation Hostage (WP) 215
Weed's Biofuel Potential Sparks African Land Grab (WT) 217

TERRORISM NEWS:

Court: Detainees Can't Challenge Cases (AP)

By Hope Yen, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

In a victory for President Bush, a divided federal appeals court ruled Tuesday that Guantanamo Bay detainees cannot use the U.S. court system to challenge their indefinite imprisonment. A Supreme Court appeal was promised.

The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit dismisses hundreds of cases filed by foreign-born detainees in federal court and also threatens to strip away court access to millions of lawful permanent residents currently in the United States.

It upholds a key provision of the Military Commissions Act, which Bush pushed through Congress last year to set up a Defense Department system to prosecute terrorism suspects. Now, detainees must prove to three-officer military panels that they don't pose a terror threat.

Democrats newly in charge of Congress promised legislation aimed at giving detainees legal rights. Attorneys for detainees said they would appeal Tuesday's ruling to the Supreme Court.

"We're disappointed," said Shayana Kadidal of the Center for Constitutional Rights. "The bottom line is that according to two of the federal judges, the president can do whatever he wants without any legal limitations as long as he does it offshore."

The two judges voting with the White House — Judge A. Raymond Randolph and Judge David B. Sentelle — were appointed by Republicans. President Reagan appointed Sentelle, and President George H.W. Bush appointed Randolph. The dissenter, Judge Judith W. Rogers, was appointed by President Clinton, a Democrat.

White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino called the decision "a significant win" for the administration and said the Military Commissions Act provides "sufficient and fair access to courts for these detainees."

At the Justice Department, attorneys urged Chief Justice John G. Roberts to deny legal relief to Guantanamo prisoners. They also said that in the case of Sharaf al-Sanani, a Yemeni being held at Guantanamo, the government was no longer obligated to explain why he was being detained.

About 395 detainees are currently being held at the U.S. military base at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba. The first prisoners arrived more than five years ago, after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

At issue is the right of habeas corpus, a basic tenet of the Constitution protecting detainees from unlawful imprisonment. Twice before, the Supreme Court ruled that right gave Guantanamo detainees full access to courts.

But in their latest ruling last June, justices suggested the president could ask Congress for more anti-terrorism authority, prompting passage of the commissions act that in part stripped federal court review.

Randolph, writing for the majority, said the new commissions act clearly blocked court access and was constitutional because a "foreign entity without property or presence in this country has no constitutional rights."

"The arguments are creative but not cogent. To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress," Randolph wrote in the 25-page opinion, which was joined by Sentelle.

In dissent, Rogers said the cases should proceed. She argued that the military hearings — known as Combatant Status Review Tribunals, or CSRTs — deprive detainees of critical due process rights provided by the Constitution by putting the legal burden on detainees to prove they aren't terrorist threats.

DOJ_NMG_0134745

"District courts are well able to adjust these proceedings in light of the government's significant interests in guarding national security," Rogers wrote. "More significant still, continued detention may be justified by a CSRT on the basis of evidence resulting from torture."

Under the commissions act, the government may indefinitely detain foreigners who have been designated as "enemy combatants" and authorizes the CIA to use aggressive but undefined interrogation tactics.

A spokeswoman for Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., said Leahy had prioritized a bill that would restore detainees' legal rights, noting that some 12 million lawful permanent residents currently in the U.S. could also be stripped of rights if they were ever designated as "enemy combatants."

Leahy was referring to the case of Ali Saleh Kahlah Al-Marri, a citizen of Qatar, who was arrested in 2001 as an "enemy combatant" while studying in the United States. The Justice Department says the commissions law should apply to immigrants such as him, and the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Richmond, Va., is expected to issue a ruling soon.

A provision restoring detainees' rights, introduced by Leahy and then-Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., narrowly failed last year on a 48-51 vote.

"The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness," Leahy said in a statement.

But Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, who helped draft the new commission law, heralded the ruling as "respecting the will of Congress."

"The detainees held at Guantanamo Bay do not have an unfettered constitutional right," he said. "In fact, the legal and humane actions of the U.S. government stand in stark contrast to our al-Qaeda enemies who behead those they capture."

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., who chairs the House Armed Services Committee, said he will launch a congressional review to determine whether military hearings offer detainees legal protections to which they are entitled.

"The last thing that we would want is to convict an individual for terrorism and then have that conviction overturned because of fatal flaws in the military commissions law passed in the previous Congress," Skelton said.

Jonathan Hafetz, an attorney at the Brennan Center for Justice, said the ruling sends the wrong message about justice to U.S. citizens and the international community. Ultimately, it will be the Supreme Court that will have to sort out the legal mess, he said.

"It's a terrible ruling that contradicts centuries of Anglo-American history and allows the indefinite detention of innocent people without charge or judicial review," Hafetz said.

___

On the Net:

The ruling can be found at:

http://pacer.cadc.uscourts.gov/docs/common/opinions/200702/05-5062b.pdf

Senate Judiciary Committee: http://judiciary.senate.gov

Court Rejects Detainees' Cases (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- A federal appeals court closed the courthouse doors to prisoners held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, ruling that legislation passed late last year eliminated their right to challenge their indefinite detention.

The 2-1 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit tossed out dozens of pending cases, and was the latest -- although perhaps not the last -- swing of the pendulum on prisoner rights at Guantanamo. The impassioned language of the majority and dissenting opinions, both citing dueling historical precedents, illustrated the divide over the Constitution's relevance to the war on terrorism.

For Judge A. Raymond Randolph, who wrote the majority opinion, the case represented a vindication. In a 2003 ruling, he backed President Bush's claim that Guantanamo prisoners had no rights before federal courts, only to be reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court the following year. The pattern repeated in 2005, when he ruled that Guantanamo prisoner Salim Hamdan had no right to contest the legitimacy of the military trial the Bush administration set up for him -- a ruling likewise overturned within a year when the Supreme Court found that the president had exceeded his powers by acting outside congressional authorization. Congress followed by passing the Military Commissions Act, extending to prisoners some rights Mr. Bush initially had sought to deny, but stripping courts of jurisdiction to hear their habeas corpus claims, a typical right of prisoners to challenge the legitimacy of their detention.

DOJ_NMG_0134746

"Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan," Judge Randolph wrote. Noting the act applies to all detainee claims "without exception," he wrote, "It is almost as if the proponents of these words were slamming their fists on the table shouting, 'When we say "all," we mean all -- without exception!'"

In dissent, Judge Judith Rogers wrote that this time, it was Congress that had exceeded its authority. The Constitution provides that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it." Neither had occurred, she wrote, and Congress hadn't followed its practice during the four prior times it suspended habeas, most recently in Hawaii during World War II.

The decision is certain to be appealed to the Supreme Court, but even if the justices agree to hear the case, they are unlikely to do so before the court's next term, which begins in October.

On Capitol Hill, several lawmakers are proposing to restore some rights to Guantanamo prisoners. The Senate Judiciary Committee's chairman, Patrick Leahy (D., Vt.) and ranking Republican, Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, have introduced legislation restoring habeas corpus rights. A separate bill by Sen. Christopher Dodd (D., Conn.) would go further, limiting the president's power to designate prisoners as "enemy combatants" to those captured in conflict zones. Several Guantanamo prisoners were captured far from the battlefield, in some cases arrested by their home governments and delivered to U.S. agents.

Guantanamo Challenges Rejected (LAT)

By Joel Havemann

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a victory for President Bush in his global war on terrorism, a divided federal appeals court ruled today that the suspected enemy combatants at the Guantanamo Bay detention camp in Cuba had no right to challenge their imprisonment in U.S. courts.

In a 2-to-1 vote, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held that the detainees had no access to U.S. courts because they were taken into custody overseas and held in a facility over which U.S. courts have no authority.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph for himself and Judge David Sentelle.

In her dissent, Judge Judith W. Rogers said Congress had no constitutional authority to deny individuals held by the U.S. government access to the federal courts.

Today's ruling will not be the last challenge to be lodged by the detainees. They will almost surely appeal to the Supreme Court.

Meanwhile, Congress, which has shifted from Republican control to Democratic since it passed the law under which the appeals court ruled, can repeal that law, although Bush would be likely to veto such a measure.

In an action urgently sought by Bush, Congress last fall passed the Military Commissions Act, which barred detainees from challenging their status in civilian U.S. courts. The Military Commissions Act was Congress' second attempt to validate the administration's effort to bring the detainees to trial at military tribunals.

The first was the Detainee Treatment Act, passed in 2005 after the Supreme Court had ruled that the detainees, with no charges having been filed against them, could not be held indefinitely at Guantanamo.

The Detainee Treatment Act held that "no court, justice or judge" had jurisdiction over the detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

After a legal challenge, the Supreme Court ruled that the measure did not apply to challenges to detainee status that were already in progress when the law was passed.

Congress then passed the Military Commissions Act, which the three-judge panel of the appeals court upheld.

To accept the detainees' arguments, wrote Randolph, "would be to defy the will of Congress."

n Houses | Boodle.com for Grocery Coupons

Court Hands Bush Win In Gitmo Case (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A federal appeals court panel yesterday, in a 2-1 vote, upheld a key provision of anti-terrorism legislation signed by President Bush that blocks prisoners at Guantanamo Bay from challenging their detention in U.S. district courts.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph in the 25-page majority ruling, which was supported by Judge David B. Sentelle.

In a key victory for the White House in its war on terrorism, Judge Randolph, named to the bench by President Reagan, and Judge Sentelle, appointed by President George Bush, argued that Congress had successfully stripped the detainees of their right to seek a hearing through a writ of habeas corpus.

"The arguments are creative, but not cogent," Judge Randolph said in response to appeals by two detainees who asked the court to consider their unlawful-detention appeals.

"To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress. ... It is almost as if the proponents of these words were slamming their fists on the table shouting 'When we say "all," we mean all -- without exception!' " he said.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruling will deny court hearings for hundreds of Guantanamo detainees with cases pending.

The dissenting opinion was written by Judge Judith W. Rogers, a Clinton appointee, who said the Defense Department had failed to create a fair substitute outside the federal courts where those detained at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, could challenge their detention.

"While judgments of military necessity are entitled to deference by the courts, and while temporary custody during wartime may be justified in order properly to process those who have been captured, the executive has had ample opportunity during the past five years during which the detainees have been held at Guantanamo Bay to determine who is being held and for what reason," she said.

Congress passed the Military Commissions Act of 2006, which the president signed into law on Oct. 17. It said no court, justice or judge has jurisdiction to consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus by or on behalf of an alien detained as an enemy combatant. The Defense Department is holding 395 enemy combatants at Guantanamo.

White House spokesman Dana Perino called the ruling a "significant win" for the administration, adding that the Military Commissions Act provides "sufficient and fair access to courts for these detainees."

Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin said the decision "reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established" in permitting Guantanamo detainees to challenge their detention through military hearings coordinated by the Defense Department.

Attorneys for the detainees said they were "disappointed" in the ruling and would appeal it to the Supreme Court.

"The bottom line is that according to two of the federal judges, the president can do whatever he wants without any legal limitations as long as he does it offshore," said Shayana Kadidal of the Center for Constitutional Rights.

No Federal Court For Guantanamo Detainees (CSM)

By Warren Richey And Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

Detainees being held at the prison camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, have lost their bid for access to US courts to challenge their open-ended detention in the war on terror.

In an important ruling announced Tuesday, a divided federal appeals court panel here dismissed cases filed by 63 detainees raising fundamental legal challenges to various aspects of the Bush administration's approach to the war.

The ruling applies to every pending or future case – in effect closing all but a few doors to the courthouse for those being held at Guantanamo.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," the appeals court declared.

The ruling is expected to be quickly appealed – perhaps to the full US Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia – or directly to the US Supreme Court.

"This is just a stop along the way to the Supreme Court," says David Remes, a lawyer at Covington and Burling in Washington, D.C., who represents 17 Yemenis being held at Guantanamo.

At the center of the appeals case was the assertion that the newly enacted Military Commissions Act of 2006 (MCA) was an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Lawyers for the detainees argued that their clients enjoyed a constitutional right to challenge their open-ended detention before a neutral judge. If the Bush administration's position prevailed, they said, it would mean that terror suspects at Guantanamo could be tossed into a legal black hole.

Two of the three appeals-court judges disagreed. They ruled that Congress did not violate constitutional protections when it passed the MCA. The law was approved in part to overturn last summer's decision by the Supreme Court in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which overturned the military commission process proposed by the administration. Congress later passed the MCA.

"Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan. Everyone, that is, except the detainees," writes Judge Raymond Randolph in an opinion joined by Judge David Sentelle.

DOJ_NMG_0134748

Judge Randolph says the detainee arguments are "creative but not cogent." He adds, "To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress."

In a dissent, Judge Judith Rogers said that she agrees that Congress attempted to withdraw federal court jurisdiction to detainee cases by passing the MCA. But she says Congress violated the suspension clause of the Constitution when it passed the law. The suspension clause says that those held by the US government have a right to challenge the legality of their detentions in court unless Congress has specifically suspended that right because of rebellion or invasion.

"The suspension clause is a limitation on the powers of Congress," Judge Rogers writes. "It is only by misreading the historical record and ignoring the Supreme Court's well-considered and binding dictum in Rasul v. Bush" that the court can conclude that it lacks jurisdiction to hear the detainees' cases.

In that decision, the Supreme Court ruled that some rights extend to detainees at Guantanamo. But the court did not detail the extent of those rights.

Most analysts emphasized the interim nature of the ruling. They view the 25-page panel opinion and 34-page dissent as a prelude to a major constitutional showdown at the nation's highest court.

"What's critical is [that] this case is going to the Supreme Court for final resolution," says Carl Tobias, a professor at the University of Richmond Law School. "We have a very splintered DC Circuit opinion."

Richard Samp, chief counsel at the Washington Legal Foundation, praised the appeals court ruling as "sound." But he too predicts the case is headed to high court.

"The issue of who does the writ of habeas corpus apply to has divided a lot of legal scholars and is something that is up in the air and will have to be decided," he says.

About 400 detainees are currently held at Guantanamo. According to MSNBC.com, 110 are labeled ready for release. Among the others, only several dozen are likely to face trial before special organized military commissions. For those remaining, there appears to be no end in sight to their detention.

Writing for the panel, Judge Randolph said that Congress could not have been clearer about its intent when it passed the Military Commission Act. The law says the repeal of habeas jurisdiction in Guantanamo cases applies in all cases without exception. "It is almost as if the proponents of these words were slamming their fists on the table shouting, "When we say 'all,' we mean all – without exception!"

Court Blow For Guantánamo Prisoners (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Prisoners at Guantánamo Bay cannot challenge their imprisonment at the US detention facility, an appeals court said on Tuesday, in delivering a significant legal victory to the White House.

The DC court of appeals ruled 2-1 that recent legislation precluded prisoners at the Cuba-based prison from contesting their detention in US civilian courts. The ruling comes as the Pentagon prepares to bring several detainees before the military commissions.

Congress passed the Military Commissions Act last year after the Supreme Court ruled that the original structure of the military commissions were unconstitutional. But the MCA also stripped detainees of habeas corpus - the right to appeal their detention in the US civil court system.

In dismissing the case brought by inmates at Guantánamo contesting their imprisonment, Judge Randolph Raymond wrote Tuesday that the detainees had provided arguments that were “creative but not cogent”, and that accepting them “would be to defy the will of Congress”.

Human rights groups and lawyers for the detainees have argued that the MCA violates the constitution, which says habeas can only be suspended in cases of “rebellion or invasion”. But Judge Raymond concluded that Congress was not obliged to provide the same standard for non-US citizens.

But Judge Judith Rogers, in a dissenting opinion, wrote that her colleagues had misconstrued the ability of Congress to suspend the right in the case of the Guantánamo detainees. She said Congress was obliged to provide an “dequate alternative remedy” under the constitution, but had not done so.

“The MCA is therefore void and does not deprive this court or the district courts of jurisdiction,” she wrote.

Lawyers for the detainees said Tuesday they would appeal to the Supreme Court. Human rights experts said the ruling underscored the need for Congress to reinstate the right for detainees.

“The ruling highlights the need for Congress to act - and to do so quickly - to restore what is amongst the most important checks on executive overreaching,” said Jennifer Daskal, Washington advocacy director at Human Rights Watch.

DOJ_NMG_0134749

Patrick Leahy and Arlen Specter, the top Democrat and Republican lawmakers on the Senate judiciary committee, have introduced legislation that would restore the right of habeas to detainees at Guantanamo.

"I believe the dissenting opinion will be upheld because the Supreme Court has already ruled that detainees have habeas corpus rights even though they are at Guantanamo Bay," Mr Specter said yesterday. "While it will take the Supreme Court at least a year to decide the issue, the Congress could resolve it promptly by enacting the Leahy/Specter bill which restores habeas corpus rights."

Lindsey Graham, the South Carolina Republican senator who was instrumental in the move to strip habeas rights, yesterday welcomed the decision, which he said would prevent "frivolous" lawsuits.

"Never in the history of warfare have enemy prisoners been able to bring lawsuits about their detention," said Mr Graham. "Thousands of Germans and Japanese soldiers were captured and held by the military during World War II. Not one case was allowed in federal court where they were allowed to sue for their release. Our rules for the War on Terror should be no different."

Human Rights First said the ruling ran "counter to one of the most important checks on unbridled executive power enshrined in the US Constitution".

"If allowed to stand, this ruling would permit the government to hold prisoners, potentially indefinitely, without having to show to a court of law why the person has been detained," said Hina Shamsi of Human Rights First. "US courts are well able to decide detention cases that raise both national security and individual liberties concerns."

Court Endorses Law's Curbs On Detainees (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — A divided federal appeals court on Tuesday upheld a new law stripping federal judges of authority to review foreign prisoners' challenges to their detention at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The decision set the stage for a third trip to the Supreme Court for the detainees, who will once again ask the justices to consider a complex issue that tests the balance of power among the White House, Congress and the courts in the murky context of the fight against international terrorism.

It also prompted some senior Democratic lawmakers, who have fought the Bush administration on the matter before and who now hold sway in Congress, to vow enactment of a law more favorable to the prisoners.

The Supreme Court previously ruled twice that federal statutes empowered the courts to consider Guantánamo prisoners' habeas corpus petitions challenging the grounds for their detention. In response to those rulings, Congress twice rewrote law to limit the detainees' avenues of appeal. The most recent rewriting was at issue in Tuesday's 2-to-1 decision.

That law, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, was signed by President Bush last October. Its enactment followed the Supreme Court's rejection of his administration's earlier arguments that the right of habeas corpus — the fundamental right, centuries old, to ask a judge for release from unjust imprisonment — did not apply to foreigners being held outside the United States as enemy combatants.

The new law explicitly eliminated the federal courts' jurisdiction over habeas challenges by such prisoners. It instead set up military panels to review the justification of detention in individual cases, with limited right of appeal to the courts afterward.

In its ruling Tuesday, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that the new law did not violate the constitutional provision that bars the government from suspending habeas corpus except in "cases of rebellion or invasion." Two of the three appeals court judges, citing Supreme Court and other historical precedent, held that the right of habeas corpus did not extend to foreign citizens detained outside the United States.

The majority decision was written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, whose two earlier opinions on habeas corpus and Guantánamo prisoners had also favored the Bush administration. Those opinions were reversed by the Supreme Court, but on statutory grounds rather than constitutional ones.

The dissenting judge on Tuesday, Judith W. Rogers, said the new law did violate the constitutional provision restricting the suspension of habeas corpus.

Administration officials welcomed the decision as a vindication of its position on the rights of detainees, after years of its halting efforts to create a legal process that would withstand tests in court.

"The decision," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, "reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the Military Commissions Act permitting Guantánamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said at his daily news briefing, "The court decided the position that we put forward." He declined to say more.

Lawyers representing the detainees vowed to seek a new review by the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0134750

Shayana Kadidal, a lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, said, "This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore."

Mr. Kadidal said the ruling encouraged "a contempt for international human rights law" and "such notorious practices as extraordinary rendition": sending terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation, where, rights advocates say, they may face torture.

Democrats now in control of Congress said they would move quickly on legislation they recently introduced that would unambiguously give federal courts the right to consider detainees' habeas petitions.

"The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who heads the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Last week Mr. Leahy joined a group of other Senate Democrats, including Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, in introducing the legislation restoring habeas rights for the Guantánamo prisoners. Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, also endorsed that measure last week, and said Tuesday that he believed the dissent from the new appeals court decision would ultimately prevail in the Supreme Court.

But other Republican lawmakers, including Senators John Cornyn of Texas and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, both of whom also serve on the committee, applauded the ruling.

The decision, Lakhdar Boumediene v. George W. Bush, involved a consolidation of the cases of 63 detainees, all from foreign countries, who had sought review in two federal district courts. One judge had ruled that she had the authority to consider the cases, while another had ruled that he did not, and granted the administration's motion to dismiss the inmates' habeas petitions.

Writing for the appeals court, Judge Randolph first turned to the statutory issue. He said arguments put forward by the detainees' lawyers that the new law was not meant to apply to the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay "are creative but not cogent." Congress, he said, clearly meant to keep the federal courts from considering the detainees' cases.

Turning to the question of whether Congress had acted within the Constitution, he said there had been no earlier cases in which a court had granted a habeas corpus petition for a foreign national held at an overseas military base. The Constitution, he said, "does not confer rights on aliens without property or presence within the United States."

The opinion was also signed by Judge David B. Sentelle.

In her dissent, Judge Rogers said: "Prior to the enactment of the Military Commissions Act, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the detainees held at Guantánamo had a statutory right to habeas corpus. The M.C.A. purports to withdraw that right but does so in a manner that offends the constitutional constraint on suspension."

Administration Backed On Detainees (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 21, 2007

A federal appeals panel handed the Bush administration a victory Tuesday in the long legal battle over foreign "enemy combatants" held without trial at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit ruled 2-1 that hundreds of prisoners have no right to challenge their detention in federal court.

The decision upholds a law pushed through Congress in October after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down President Bush's plan to try detainees in military commissions. The high court ruled that the commissions were not authorized by federal law. It was the second time the justices had sided with the detainees on the issue of their right to challenge their detention in the courts.

Tuesday's ruling on the new Military Commissions Act sets up a third Supreme Court showdown.

"This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it off shore," said Shayana Kadidal, attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees and plans an immediate appeal. "The matter will have to be resolved by the Supreme Court for a third time."

The Military Commissions Act allows the government to detain "enemy combatants" indefinitely. Its most criticized provision prevents detainees from challenging the legality of their detention in U.S. courts. Instead, under the law, military panels will review whether there is sufficient evidence to justify detention.

Aside from the court battle, the new Democratic-controlled Congress pressed efforts to revamp the law, which passed when Republicans controlled both chambers. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, announced a new review of detainees' legal protections. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, promoted revisions to the law to restore detainees' legal rights. Leahy, in a statement, disagreed with the appeals panel's assessment, calling it "dangerous and misguided."

DOJ_NMG_0134751

In dismissing the detainees' challenge, Judge A. Raymond Randolph wrote: "The arguments are creative but not cogent. To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress."

Judge Judith Rogers dissented, arguing that the military hearings deprive detainees of their due process rights by placing the legal burden on them to prove they are not a terrorist threat.

"The decision reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman.

Pentagon spokesman Jeffrey Gordon said the detainees at Guantanamo include some of the world's "most vicious terrorist operatives." He said none of Guantanamo's many critics "have put forth a viable option to handle these dangerous men and prevent their return to terrorism."

The prison at Guantanamo, which now houses 395 detainees, has drawn international criticism in the five years since it opened. President Bush repeatedly has said he would like to close it.

Guantanamo Detainees Lose Appeal (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

A federal appeals court ruled yesterday that hundreds of detainees in U.S. custody at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, do not have the right to challenge their imprisonment in federal courts, a victory for the Bush administration that could lead to the Supreme Court again addressing the issue.

In its 2 to 1 decision, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit upheld one of the central components of the Military Commissions Act, the law enacted last year by a then-Republican-controlled Congress that stripped Guantanamo detainees of their right to such habeas corpus petitions. Lawyers have filed the petitions on behalf of virtually all of the nearly 400 detainees still at Guantanamo, challenging President Bush's right to hold them indefinitely without charges. Yesterday's ruling effectively dismisses the cases.

Attorneys for the detainees vowed to quickly petition the Supreme Court to hear the case.

Judge A. Raymond Randolph wrote in the majority opinion that to overrule the new law, which Bush signed in October, would "defy the will of Congress." He and Judge David B. Sentelle also found that historical interpretations of habeas corpus do not apply to foreign nationals not on U.S. soil, determining that the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay is a leased property that falls under Cuban sovereignty.

"Federal courts have no jurisdiction in these cases," Randolph wrote in the combined cases of Al Odah v. USA and Boumediene v. Bush. "Our only recourse is to vacate the district courts' decisions and dismiss the cases for lack of jurisdiction."

In a lengthy dissent, Judge Judith W. Rogers raised two central questions of constitutional law that could form the basis of arguments before the Supreme Court, if it chooses to hear the case. She wrote that the writ of habeas corpus can apply to foreign nationals outside the United States and that Congress has not properly suspended habeas corpus, something it has done only four times, including during the Civil War.

Rogers wrote that Congress may suspend that right "when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it" but that Congress has not invoked that power now, adding that its actions "exceed the powers of Congress."

Justice Department lawyers have argued for years that foreign detainees should not enjoy constitutional rights when they are detained in other countries amid accusations of terrorism against the United States and its allies.

"We are pleased with the decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit upholding the constitutionality of the Military Commissions Act (MCA) and dismissing the consolidated Guantanamo detainee cases for lack of jurisdiction," Erik Ablin, a department spokesman, said in a statement.

Shayana Kadidal, a lawyer with the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents hundreds of Guantanamo detainees, said defense attorneys will petition the Supreme Court "as quickly as possible." He said the decision grants government officials broad latitude in its treatment of detainees and gives detainees no legal way to address it.

"This decision allows the president to basically do what he wants to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore," Kadidal said. He said that his clients at Guantanamo have experienced "disgust and exasperation at the American legal system" and that their "feelings of desperation" now will only grow.

Washington lawyer David Remes, who also represents Guantanamo detainees, said he is disappointed by the decision but not completely surprised. He expects the Supreme Court to hear the case.

DOJ_NMG_0134752

In two decisions, the Supreme Court has upheld Guantanamo detainees' rights to contest their incarceration in federal courts. But the court also made it clear that Congress could weigh in on the issue, which it did by approving the Military Commissions Act. That law mandated special military trials for the detainees.

Douglas W. Kmiec, a professor of constitutional law at Pepperdine University, said it appears that Congress clearly intended to remove the court's jurisdiction. He said, however, that questions remain about the application of habeas rights and their evolution since the late 1700s.

"We're dealing with an area that has been subject to some difficult and subtle rulings from the beginning of the foundation of our country," Kmiec said. "The law has been a moving target."

Democrats, who now hold the majority in both houses, have vowed to quickly amend the Military Commissions Act with provisions that would restore habeas rights for detainees.

Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and the committee's ranking Republican, Arlen Specter (Pa.), have introduced a bill that would restore habeas corpus rights. Specter urged congressional action because the Supreme Court could take months to hear the case.

Sen. Christopher J. Dodd (Conn.), a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination, introduced a bill last week that would return habeas corpus rights to detainees while clarifying other parts of the law. Dodd said yesterday his legislation is now "even more critical."

It is unclear whether Bush would veto such legislation, which would challenge a central element of his anti-terrorism platform.

D.C. Circuit Denies Detainee Challenges (LAW)

By T.r. Goldman, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 21, 2007

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit Tuesday ruled that Guantanamo Bay detainees do not have a right to petition for habeas corpus, letting stand a key piece of the Military Commissions Act passed by Congress late last year.

The 2-1 decision was sharply critical of the plaintiffs, who had argued that the language of the act forbidding U.S. courts to hear challenges to the detention of aliens detained as enemy combatants was ambiguous and did not necessarily apply to detainees whose cases were already pending in court.

"The arguments are creative but not cogent," wrote Judge A. Raymond Randolph. "Everyone who has followed the interaction between Congress and the Supreme Court knows full well that one of the primary purposes of the MCA was to overrule Hamdan," wrote Randolph, referring to the 2006 decision, Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, which ruled that the military commissions set up by the Bush administration to try military detainees violate both international and U.S. military law.

"To accept them would be to defy the will of Congress," Randolph added, later calling the plaintiffs' argument "nonsense."

Randolph was joined in his decision by Judge David Sentelle.

After dispensing with the detainees' argument that the law was ambiguous, the court went on to assert the act's constitutionality. The Constitution's suspension clause, which says that the writ of habeas corpus can only be suspended for reasons of public safety during "rebellion or invasion," does not apply to areas outside U.S. sovereignty. And it is Cuba, the court asserted, not the United States, that has sovereignty over Guantanamo Bay.

In her dissent, Judge Judith Rogers strongly disagreed, writing that the majority opinion "fundamentally misconstrues" the nature of the suspension clause. "Far from conferring an individual right that might pertain only to persons substantially connected to the United States," she wrote, "the Suspension Clause is a limitation on the powers of Congress."

The decision makes it likely that the issue of habeas rights for the Guantanamo Bay detainees will end up in the Supreme Court.

"The Supreme Court has given detainees cert three times -- each time one of these cases has gone to them," says Joshua Colangelo-Bryan, an associate at Dorsey & Whitney, who represents two Bahrainis still being detained in Guantanamo Bay. "These are very fundamental questions."

Court Upholds Military Proceedings For Detainees (NPR)

By Ari Shapiro

National Public Radio, February 21, 2007

The federal appeals court has upheld the controversial detainee bill known as the Military Commissions Act. In a 2-1 ruling, the court said the measure constitutionally wiped out all of the pending court cases from detainees at Guantanamo Bay.

The act allows the government to try detainees in military proceedings, giving detainees access to federal civilian courts only for appeals.

DOJ_NMG_0134753

Writing for the majority, Judge Raymond Randolph calls the detainees' arguments, "creative but not cogent." He says the logic in the dissent is "filled with holes."

In that dissent, Judge Judith Rogers shoots back that the majority can only reach its conclusion, "by misreading the historical record and ignoring the Supreme Court." She says the Military Commissions Act is unconstitutional as written and cannot take away the courts' right to hear these cases.

The ruling is a clear blow to the Guantanamo detainees. Bill Goodman is legal director at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents a number of them.

Many of these people have done nothing," Goodman says. "They're there by accident and happenstance." He added that not being able to "raise the basic defense that 'I've done nothing wrong' means that this is a huge trampling of rights."

This decision wipes out cases that challenged everything from lack of medical treatment at the facility to abusive interrogation tactics. David Rivkin worked in the Justice Department under President Reagan and the first President Bush. He says enemy combatants were never intended to get the same court access as criminal suspects.

There's been more judicial involvement in these types of decisions than in any war in American history," Rivkin says. "And for the critics it's still not enough."

Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos noted in a statement that the Military Commissions Act, or MCA, does give detainees some legal review.

"The decision reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the MCA," Scolinos said, "permitting Guantanamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit."

So although the detainees cannot file traditional habeas corpus claims challenging their detention, they can challenge the Combatant Status Review Tribunals that determine whether they are enemy combatants. Those challenges go directly to the court that decided this case today.

Wake Forest law professor Bobby Chesney says it's unclear how deeply those challenges can probe.

"One of the key issues here is whether that is an adequate alternative to habeas corpus," Chesney says, "and if it is, if it's a sufficient alternative, then habeas has not actually been suspended."

The final word on whether the detainees' lawsuits can continue is likely to come from the Supreme Court.

EDITORIAL Restore Habeas Rights (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

IN UPHOLDING A LAW that denies detainees at Guantanamo Bay Naval Base the ancient right of prisoners to challenge their confinement in court, a federal appeals court has presented the Democratic-controlled 110th Congress with a challenge. Does it have the fortitude to undo an injustice perpetrated by the Republican-controlled 109th?

The injustice came in the 2006 Military Commissions Act, which barred detainees at Guantanamo — now numbering 395 — from contesting their imprisonment by seeking writs of habeas corpus. This exclusion, like Guantanamo itself, has been an embarrassment to the United States.

In 2004, the Supreme Court ruled 6 to 3 that detainees at the facility (which the U.S. leases from Cuba) could seek relief under a federal habeas corpus statute because Congress had previously placed the area under the "complete jurisdiction and control" of the U.S. But on Tuesday, a 2-1 majority of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled that the Military Commissions Act essentially overruled the Supreme Court and should apply to all detainee cases, even those filed before the law was passed.

The high court could still correct the situation by ruling that the detainees have a constitutional right to bring habeas actions. In the 2004 case, Justice John Paul Stevens noted that habeas corpus is a "writ antecedent to statute … throwing its root deep into the genius of our common law." But in his opinion for the appeals court, Judge A. Raymond Randolph preempted that argument by claiming that, under English and early American law, habeas was not available to "an alien outside the territory of the sovereign." Congress, he suggested, has now placed Guantanamo in that "outside" category.

There's a good reason to suspect that the Supreme Court might actually affirm this disappointing decision: It's not the same court that ruled for the detainees in 2004.

Sandra Day O'Connor, one of the six justices in the 2004 majority, has been replaced by Samuel A. Alito Jr., who is more sympathetic to claims of government power. Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, who concurred in 2004 because "Guantanamo Bay is in every practical respect a United States territory," might defer, as the appeals court did, to the Military Commissions Act's exclusion of Guantanamo from habeas jurisdiction.

DOJ_NMG_0134754

Rather than hope that the Supreme Court will rectify the act's flaws, Congress should act on its own to undo the law's habeas restrictions. Last year, 48 members of the Republican-controlled Senate voted for an amendment by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.) that would have allowed detainees to file such petitions. Of the 51 who voted no, six are no longer in the Senate.

That change — plus dramatic Democratic gains in the House — augur well for passage of the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act of 2007, co-sponsored by Specter and Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), now chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. And although the margin for approval may not be veto-proof, President Bush would be wise to allow Congress to atone for its own mistake.

Audit: Anti-terror Case Data Flawed (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Federal prosecutors counted immigration violations, marriage fraud and drug trafficking among anti-terror cases in the four years after 9/11 even though no evidence linked them to terror activity, a Justice Department audit said Tuesday.

Overall, nearly all of the terrorism-related statistics on investigations, referrals and cases examined by department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine were either diminished or inflated. Only two of 26 sets of department data reported between 2001 and 2005 were accurate, the audit found.

Responding, a Justice spokesman pointed to figures showing that prosecutors in the department's headquarters for the most part either accurately or underreported their data — underscoring what he called efforts to avoid pumping up federal terror statistics.

The numbers, used to monitor the department's progress in battling terrorists, are reported to Congress and the public and help, in part, shape the department's budget.

"For these and other reasons, it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics," the audit concluded.

Fine's office took care to say the flawed data appear to be the result of "decentralized and haphazard" methods of collection or disagreement over how the numbers are reported, and do not appear to be intentional.

Still, the errors led Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., to question whether the department had exaggerated the number of terror cases.

"If the Department of Justice can't even get their own books in order, how are we supposed to have any confidence they are doing the job they should be?" said Schumer, who sits on the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees the department. "Whether this is just an accounting error or an attempt to pad terror prosecution statistics for some other reason, the Department of Justice of all places should be classifying cases for what they are, not what they want us to think them to be."

Auditors looked at 26 categories of statistics — including numbers of suspects charged and convicted in terror cases, and terror-related threats against cities and other U.S. targets — compiled by the FBI, Justice's Criminal Division, and the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys.

It found that data from the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys were the most severely flawed. Auditors said the office, which compiles statistics from the 94 federal prosecutors' districts nationwide, both under- and over-counted the number of terror-related cases during a four-year period.

The office has since agreed to change the way it counts and classifies anti-terrorism cases, said department spokesman Dean Boyd.

Boyd denied suggestions that the department pumped up its numbers. He said Criminal Division prosecutors at Justice headquarters and the FBI have overhauled their respective case reporting systems since 2004 for a more accurate picture of terror-related workloads. Both agencies, he said, were strained to accurately report terrorism data in the flood of cases immediately after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks.

"The notion that the Justice Department intentionally inflated its statistics is false and flatly contradicted by the OIG report itself," Boyd said.

In all but one area, Criminal Division prosecutors either accurately stated or underreported their data — the ones the department usually uses in public statements about its counterterror efforts, Boyd noted. He said the Justice Department has already completed most of the fixes recommended in the audit.

Much of the problem stemmed from how that office defines anti-terrorism cases.

A November 2001 federal crackdown on security breaches at airports, for example, yielded arrests on immigration and false document charges, but no evidence of terrorist activity. Nonetheless, the attorneys' office lumped them in with other anti-terror cases since they were investigated by federal Joint Terrorism Task Forces or with other counterterror measures.

Other examples, according to the audit, included:

DOJ_NMG_0134755

_Charges against a marriage-broker for being paid to arrange six fraudulent marriages between Tunisians and U.S. citizens.

_Prosecution of a Mexican citizen who falsely identified himself as another person in a passport application.

_Charges against a suspect for dealing firearms without a license. The prosecutor handling the case told auditors it should not have been labeled as anti-terrorism.

"We do not agree that law enforcement efforts such as these should be counted as anti-terrorism," the audit concluded.

___

On the Net:

The audit can be found at: http://www.usdoj.gov/oig/reports/plus/a0720/final.pdf

Report: Feds Overstate Terrorism Cases (CHIT)

By Andrew Zajac, Washington Bureau

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Federal prosecutors and the FBI have significantly overstated the number of terrorism-related investigations and prosecutions they pursue, according to a highly critical report released Tuesday by a Justice Department watchdog.

The study by Inspector General Glenn Fine concluded that the overstatements occurred in large part because authorities count offenses such as document and marriage fraud and immigration violations as terrorism-related even when there was no discernible tie to terror.

Although the Justice Department and the FBI have reorganized since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to make preventing future attacks a priority, Fine found that the agencies have done a poor job of providing statistical documentation for the work they are doing.

His report reviewed 26 categories of statistics and found inaccuracies, because of either inflated numbers or undercounting, in 24 of them.

Fine did not allege a deliberate attempt to mislead. He said information was "inaccurately reported for a variety of reasons, including that [Justice] Department components could not provide support for the numbers reported, could not provide support for a terrorism link used to classify statistics as terrorism-related, and could not document that the activity reported occurred in the period reported."

He also found collection and reporting of terrorism-related statistics "decentralized and haphazard."

In 2004, U.S. attorneys reported 379 terror-related convictions, but Fine's investigators found documentation for 240.

That same year, the FBI reported tracking 4,499 terrorism-related threats, but Fine said only 4,049 were connected to terrorism, according to information supplied by the bureau.

The numbers of terror-related incidents dealt with by federal authorities are important because they could affect anti-terrorism funding, as well as the government's credibility on terrorism threats.

The bulk of Fine's 140-page review covered cases from 2003 and 2004.

Dean Boyd, a spokesman for the FBI and the Justice Department, which oversees U.S. attorneys, said both agencies were under stress from having to quickly ramp up an anti-terrorism capability after the 2001 attacks and have subsequently upgraded their tracking and labeling of cases to comport with many of Fine's recommendations for improvement.

Fine also found that unlike the FBI and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys, which coordinates the activities of 93 federal prosecutors in the U.S. and overseas territories, the Justice Department's Criminal Division consistently reported lower numbers of terrorism cases than it actually handled.

For instance, the criminal division recorded 195 guilty pleas or convictions in terrorism cases from Sept. 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, but Fine said there actually were 216.

Boyd said Fine's report should not be read as undercutting the Justice Department's credibility because Criminal Division figures are the ones "used by DOJ in publicly quantifying their work."

But Fine cautioned against taking too much comfort in the Criminal Division's understatement of its anti-terrorism work because the record-keeping behind it was so weak that there "was no accurate basis for its reported numbers."

The report is the latest in a string of analyses to question the accuracy of the Justice Department's terrorism data.

In the past, department officials have emphasized that they are aggressively combating terrorism and would use so-called preventative prosecutions to deport or imprison people on immigration violations or other crimes rather than wait for a terrorist plot to develop.

Fine said his office "looked for, and accepted, any terrorism linkage" asserted by department officials but found many cases "where department officials provided no evidence to link the subject of the case to terrorist activity."

DOJ_NMG_0134756

Among such cases were those of immigration violators caught up in sweeps like Operation Tarmac, begun soon after the Sept. 11 attacks, in which authorities combed airports looking for people linked to terrorism.

Boyd defended labeling such immigration cases as anti-terror matters because they were part of an effort to discourage terrorist infiltration of vulnerable facilities. But he said the Justice Department had agreed to clarify how it defines them.

Bruce Hoffman, a terrorism expert at the RAND Corp. think tank, said there is a significant deterrent value to sweeps and other crackdowns, but authorities need to be careful not to exaggerate what they're doing and to be as forthcoming as possible.

"Without explaining their methods more clearly, the public could look at it as 'crying wolf,'" Hoffman said.

azajac@tribune.com

Justice Dept. Statistics On Terrorism Faulted (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Most of the Justice Department's major statistics on terrorism cases are highly inaccurate, and federal prosecutors routinely count cases involving drug trafficking, marriage fraud and other unrelated crimes as part of anti-terrorism efforts, according to an audit released yesterday.

Inspector General Glenn A. Fine found that only two of the 26 sets of important statistics on domestic counterterrorism efforts compiled by Justice and the FBI from 2001 to 2005 were accurate, according to a 140-page report. The numbers were both inflated and understated, depending on the data cited and which part of the Justice Department was doing the counting, the report said.

The biggest problems were in numbers compiled by the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys, which counted hundreds of terrorism cases that did not qualify for the designation because they involved minor crimes with no connection to terrorist activity, the report said.

In short, the report concluded, "The collection and reporting of terrorism-related statistics within the department is decentralized and haphazard."

The Justice Department said in a statement that it has already made most of the improvements suggested by Fine's office and that the U.S. attorneys' office would rename its "anti-terrorism" category to remove the implication that every case involves terrorism.

The analysis is the latest to find serious faults with the Justice Department's terrorism statistics, some of which have been featured prominently in statements by President Bush or the attorney general as evidence of the terrorist threat and the department's successful efforts to combat it.

The data are used to justify expenditures and explain to Congress and to the public how the Justice Department is using its resources to protect the country against terrorist attacks, officials said.

"Congress, department managers and the public need accurate statistics in order to fully assess the department's anti-terrorism efforts," Fine said in a statement.

A 2005 Washington Post analysis of terrorism cases tallied by the Justice Department's Criminal Division showed that most defendants were charged with minor crimes unrelated to terrorism.

Fine's office examined similar data as part of its analysis but, unlike The Post, it accepted at face value any claims of a terrorism link by the government. Under those conditions, the report said, the Criminal Division actually understated the number of cases that would qualify as related to terrorism.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said "the notion that the Justice Department inflated its statistics is false and flatly contradicted by the [inspector general's] report itself, which found that the Criminal Division either accurately stated or understated the department's terrorism statistics in nearly all categories."

Fine's report was careful to stress that the inaccuracies did not appear to have been intentional but instead were the result of shoddy recordkeeping, disagreements over definitions and other problems.

Much of the report's criticisms centered on the U.S. attorneys' office at Justice headquarters, which compiles statistics from 93 federal prosecutors nationwide and in U.S. territories. The office dramatically over- or understated the number of terrorism-related cases during a four-year period, due in large part to the way officials defined "anti-terrorism" cases, the report said.

A prime example was a massive operation to crack down on security problems at airports, which yielded dozens of arrests for immigration charges and other crimes but none related to terrorism. Even so, Fine's report said, all of the cases were counted as anti-terrorism efforts.

The only two sets of accurate statistics were compiled by the FBI, which nonetheless provided inaccurate data in eight other categories, the report said.

DOJ_NMG_0134757

Terror Statistics Deemed Inaccurate (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

The Justice Department's reporting of terrorism-related statistics is "decentralized and haphazard," according to an internal audit, which said immigration, marriage fraud and drug cases often were wrongly counted as terrorism-related.

In examining the accuracy of 26 terrorism-related statistical reports by the FBI, the Justice Department's criminal division and the Executive Office for U.S. Attorneys (EOUSA), Inspector General Glenn A. Fine said all but two were inaccurate -- lacking documentation and "significantly overstated or understated" by 10 percent or more.

"Department officials either had not established internal controls to ensure the statistics were accurately gathered, classified and reported, or did not document the internal controls used," he said. "We found many cases involving offenses such as immigration violations, marriage fraud or drug trafficking where department officials provided no evidence to link the subject of the case to terrorist activity."

The statistics, collected from the FBI, the department's criminal division and all 94 U.S. attorneys, are reported to senior Justice Department managers, Congress and the public.

Mr. Fine's office focused on terrorism convictions during fiscal 2003 and 2004 reported by EOUSA; the number of persons convicted or who pleaded guilty resulting from terrorism convictions from September 11, 2001, through Feb. 3, 2005, reported by the Criminal Division; and the number of terrorist threats tracked by the FBI in fiscal 2003 and 2004.

"The Justice Department agrees fully with the Office of the Inspector General that the department must collect, verify and maintain accurate statistics on the important national security work being conducted at Main Justice, the FBI and in United States Attorney's Offices around the country," according to the FBI.

The FBI said it has made improvements to its statistical reporting systems in recent years, specifically its case management and supporting information technology programs.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the EOUSA has changed the way it counts and classifies anti-terrorism cases, and that the IG's findings, with respect to U.S. attorneys' statistics, "largely boiled down to a difference of opinion over the definition of anti-terrorism."

He also said criminal division prosecutors and the FBI also have changed their case reporting systems to more accurately reflect terror-related cases.

The report said the EOUSA significantly overstated the number of anti-terrorism defendants in cases it filed, the number of terrorism and terrorism-related convictions, and the number of terrorism-related defendants sent to prison. It said the criminal division significantly understated the number of persons convicted or who pleaded guilty in terrorism cases, and the number convicted with material support of terrorism.

Also, it said the FBI significantly overstated the number of counterterrorism threat assessments it issued, the number of presidential terrorist threat reports, and the number of terrorism-related convictions, but significantly understated the number of intelligence assessments and bulletins it issued and terrorist threats it tracked.

Audit Questions Accuracy Of Federal Terror Statistics (MCT)

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department has routinely misrepresented the number of terrorism prosecutions, possibly undermining decisionmaking in the war on terrorism, an independent government audit found.

The report, released Tuesday by the Justice Department's inspector general, concluded that the department in most cases "could not provide support for the numbers reported or could not identify the terrorism link used to classify statistics as terrorism-related."

All but two of the 26 statistics reviewed from October 2000 through September 2005 were wrong. "These inaccuracies are important because department management and Congress need accurate terrorism-related statistics to make informed ... decisions," Inspector General Glenn Fine said in the report.

Part of the problem, according to Fine, was that the Justice Department routinely counted criminal cases as terrorism-related even when prosecutors had found no links to terrorism. Fine also blamed a "decentralized and haphazard" system.

Some in Congress have accused the department of manipulating the statistics to claim success in the war on terrorism.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the inaccuracies found from 2002 to 2004 resulted partly from the reorganizations of the Justice Department and the FBI after 9/11. Since then, terrorism-case reporting has improved, he said.

Judge Rejects Delay Of Phone Wiretap Suits (SFC)

By Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

DOJ_NMG_0134758

San Francisco Chronicle, February 21, 2007

U.S. seeks dismissal in appeals court over national security

A federal judge rejected the Bush administration's request Tuesday to put wiretapping lawsuits against telephone companies on hold while the government asks an appeals court to dismiss the suits on national security grounds.

The ruling came from Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker of San Francisco, who is hearing more than 40 suits from around the nation accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the government's electronic surveillance program.

Walker refused in July to dismiss the leading case, a suit accusing AT&T of sharing its telephone records and e-mail network with the National Security Agency. Walker rejected Bush administration arguments that allowing the case to proceed would expose vital secrets about the clandestine program and the company's alleged role in it.

The Justice Department has asked the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the ruling and dismiss all the lawsuits. While that appeal is pending, government lawyers argued, any further action in Walker's court would waste time and money and increase the risk of a security breach.

But Walker ordered the companies Tuesday to respond to the suits by March 29 unless plaintiffs in particular cases agreed to a delay.

The judge also said lawyers for AT&T customers could ask him for permission to question company officials and to seek evidence on limited issues. Attorney Kurt Opsahl of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which represents the plaintiffs, said those topics could include the company's structure and operation of its networks.

Opsahl said plaintiffs' lawyers may also ask AT&T to present to Walker, in private, any evidence of government authorization that exists for its actions -- a subject that Justice Department lawyers have described as among the most sensitive in the case. Such secret submission of evidence, a procedure spelled out by federal law, would allow the judge to determine whether any surveillance in which the company participated was legal, Opsahl said.

Walker "is trying to advance the case while being very sensitive to national security concerns," Opsahl said.

An AT&T spokeswoman was unavailable for comment. The phone companies joined the administration's request to put the cases on hold.

In a separate order, Walker denied a request by The Chronicle and other news organizations to unseal some documents in the AT&T case. They include a statement by a former AT&T engineer, Mark Klein, about installation of equipment that allegedly would allow the government to screen customers' Internet messages, and a supporting declaration by J. Scott Marcus, a former Federal Communications Commission technology adviser.

AT&T says the documents contain trade secrets. Walker noted that the company released edited versions of the material last year, after negotiations with the plaintiffs, and said he may reconsider unsealing the rest of the documents if their content becomes critical to the outcome of the case.

Karl Olson, an attorney whose clients include The Chronicle, the Los Angeles Times, the Associated Press, the San Jose Mercury News, Bloomberg News and USA Today, said he was disappointed that Walker had deferred to AT&T's claim of trade secrets, which he described as flimsy. Among the information that remains sealed, Olson said, were the names of the city, San Francisco, and the street, Folsom, where the company's facility is located.

E-mail Bob Egelko at begelko@sfchronicle.com.

FBI Translating Over 1,000 Wiretap Conversations A Day (USNEWS)

U.S. News and World Report, February 21, 2007

Spurred by adding hundreds of new linguists and help from allies overseas, the FBI is translating a record 34,000 wiretapped conversations a month, bureau officials tell the Bad Guys blog. Long criticized for its lack of language specialists, the FBI, they say, is finally catching up to an unprecedented intake of foreign-language surveillance recordings, electronic data, and text since 9/11.

Most of the wiretaps are tied to counterterrorism and counterintelligence cases, officials say. Since 9/11, the FBI's counterterrorism agents, in particular, have collected a mother lode of intelligence. In a widely overlooked report to the Senate Judiciary Committee in November, bureau officials ticked off their counterterrorism take over the past four years:

519,217 hours of audio

5,508,217 electronic data files

1,847,497 pages of text

A July 2005 audit by the Justice Department's inspector general found that the bureau's counterterrorism audio backlog had doubled over the preceding year to 8,354 hours. But in their Senate report, FBI officials counter that the backlog represents only 1.35 percent of all the audio collected, and that nearly all of the agency's text and electronic data files have now been translated.

"We've made great strides," says Jeff Lanza, an FBI spokesman. "Ninety-nine percent of the backlog has been eliminated." Nearly a third of what remains is "white noise" not expected to yield anything of value, officials say. Of most concern are 3,240 hours of "audio from very obscure languages and dialects," which the bureau is scrambling to find linguists for.

The FBI has eased its backlog by markedly increasing its reservoir of translators. Since 2001, the number of FBI staff linguists has grown to 1,409, an 80 percent jump, officials say. The FBI has also turned to "the language programs of allied intelligence agencies," as well as to contract linguists, according to testimony by FBI Director Robert Mueller.

Since the 9/11 attacks in 2001, the number of national security wiretaps approved by the secret U.S. Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court more than doubled, according to the Justice Department, from 934 in 2001 to 2,072 in 2005–an increase of 122 percent. These include wiretaps of counterterrorism suspects as well as counterintelligence targets such as foreign spies in America. In addition, thousands of electronic intercepts are thought to have been made under the National Security Agency's controversial warrantless surveillance program begun after 9/11. (That program was recently brought under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court's purview.)

By contrast, the growth has been much slower in criminal wiretaps, which include eavesdropping on Mafia bosses, corrupt officials, and other suspected lawbreakers. In 2001, authorities completed 1,491 of these intercepts authorized by federal and state courts, according to the Administrative Office of the United States Courts. That number grew to 1,773 in 2005, representing an increase of 19 percent.

American Faces Charges In Qaeda Case (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

HOUSTON, Feb. 20 — A thin and weakened 28-year-old American who the government says was captured last month in Kenya after joining Islamic terrorists fighting in Somalia appeared on Tuesday in federal court here to face charges of conspiring to use an unconventional weapon and receiving military training from Al Qaeda.

The defendant, Daniel J. Maldonado, is a convert to Islam who grew up in Boston before moving here. Chained, Mr. Maldonado stayed impassive as F.B.I. witnesses and prosecutors said he had admitted to having guarded a suspected spy who was later killed, to praising the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and to offering himself as a suicide bomber.

“What we have is a U.S. citizen homegrown Islamic jihadist right here,” said Gary Cobe, an assistant United States attorney.

The hearing, to determine whether enough evidence exists to continue to hold Mr. Maldonado without bond, hit a snag when his chief public defender, Brent E. Newton, argued that he could not properly examine F.B.I. witnesses without seeing their written reports.

Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley asked prosecutors to provide the reports for the resumption of the court on Wednesday.

The testimony added details to the government complaint and affidavit filed on Feb. 13, a day after Mr. Maldonado was taken into custody here after being flown from Kenya. He had been seized in Kenya on Jan. 21.

John McKinley of the counterterrorism squad of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in Houston said an unidentified confidential witness who corroborated Mr. Maldonado’s account told of Qaeda efforts to recruit American women to travel to Somalia to train for terrorist attacks in the United States.

The weapon in the complaint was said to be a bomb that the F.B.I. said Mr. Maldonado had seen how to make while “consorting” with a bomb maker in Kismayo, Somalia. The bomb maker reportedly used match tips and TNT to create explosive devices. No evidence was offered that Mr. Maldonado had made such a device.

The bureau also said that Mr. Maldonado had been trained in using an AK-47 and that he had pointed it at a prisoner, an unidentified flight attendant accused of spying against Al Qaeda by taking photographs with his cellphone.

Mr. Maldonado poked the man with his weapon and told him to “shut up,” Mr. Cobe, the prosecutor, said. Someone else later executed the prisoner, Agent McKinley said Mr. Maldonado had told him.

Agent McKinley, one of six who questioned Mr. Maldonado in Kenya, also testified that Mr. Maldonado’s wife and three children had joined him in Mogadishu, Somalia; that his wife had died of malaria there; and that agents had escorted the children back to Mr. Maldonado’s parents in New Hampshire.

Mr. Maldonado had been ill in Somalia, too, Mr. Newton, his lawyer, brought out in cross-examination. The testimony showed that he suffered from malnutrition that shrunk him to 105 pounds from 165. In court in green prison scrubs, he appeared gaunt, with shoulder-length brown hair parted in the center and a wispy beard and mustache.

DOJ_NMG_0134760

The government said Mr. Maldonado was also known as Daniel Aljughaifi. He also appeared to have undergone changes of heart.

"He told me some of the folks in the camp lied to him about taking care of his family," Agent McKinley testified. "He seemed kind of disillusioned by that."

Another agent who had questioned Mr. Maldonado in Kenya, Loretta Eglen-Anderson, said he at one point "advised us he had made false statements." Agent Eglen-Anderson said he made corrections in the written record "and signed that."

Mr. Newton's cross-examination suggested that he intended to make an issue of Mr. Maldonado's treatment in custody and whether his client had properly waived his rights to a lawyer before F.B.I. agents questioned him.

Agent McKinley said Mr. Maldonado told him that he had been in Somalia "to fight jihad, raising the word of Allah."

"He said he was angry at America," Agent McKinley testified. "He said he had no problem with the 9/11 attacks."

When asked in cross-examination, "Did he indicate why he was angry with America?" the agent replied, "Not to me."

Houston Al-Qaida Case On Hold (HC)

By Cindy George, Houston Chronicle

Houston Chronicle, February 21, 2007

A federal judge cut short a hearing for accused terrorist Daniel Joseph Maldonado late Tuesday to give his lawyers time to review reports about FBI interviews with their client.

Maldonado, 28, is the first American accused of training with al-Qaida in Somalia. The hearing, which will determine whether the government's case will continue, is to resume at 10 a.m. today.

Also known as Daniel Aljughaifi, the Muslim convert left the U.S. in late 2005, spending his last few months in Houston. He trained at radical Islamic camps in southern Somalia from November until January, when Kenyan soldiers captured him and others — including British citizens and a Swede — as they fled Ethiopian fighters in Somalia, FBI Agent John McKinley testified Tuesday.

In Kenya, two senior FBI officials questioned Maldonado, who gave conflicting information during later interviews with another FBI agent and a Houston police officer.

"That's what their case hinges upon — the words he supposedly told the case agent and the police officer," Brent Newton, a federal public defender, told U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley.

The seven-page criminal complaint against Maldonado alleges there were al-Qaida fighters where he trained and studied bomb-making, a charge for which he faces up to life in prison.

Newton argued that even if Maldonado went overseas to fight jihad, there is no evidence that he intended to affiliate with al-Qaida. FBI agents escorted Maldonado back to Houston from Kenya last week.

Tuesday's delay was an unusual twist to a fairly routine process in which prosecutors argue to proceed with their case.

The hearing was postponed shortly after prosecutor Gary Cobe passionately launched into the government's argument.

"What we have here," Cobe declared, "is a U.S. citizen-homegrown-Islamic jihadi."

As Cobe raised his voice to explain how Maldonado went overseas to fight jihad, Botley interrupted and told prosecutors to hand over the FBI reports to Newton by 8 a.m. today.

Accused Terrorist From Houston Described As 'Militant' (KPRC)

KPRC-TV, February 21, 2007

HOUSTON -- A former Houston man suspected of training with al-Qaida was in federal court downtown Tuesday afternoon and described as a militant young man angry with the U.S., KPRC Local 2 reported.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, covered his face as he arrived for a detention hearing.

He's been held without bond on suspicion that he joined with al-Qaida to try and overthrow the Somali government.

During the hearing, more information about Maldonado was released.

He moved to Houston from New Hampshire in 2005. His last known address in the United States was a southwest Houston apartment.

An FBI special agent said Maldonado traveled to Egypt in November 2005 and to Somalia in 2006. That's where he allegedly joined the Islamic Courts Union and al-Qaida to fight jihad.

Special Agent John McKinley said Maldonado received training from a terrorist organization in physical fitness, weapons and explosives. In federal court, it was revealed that Maldonado was approached to return to America and recruit English-speaking women to receive training in Somalia, a notion that alarmed local Islamic leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0134761

"To take matters in your own hands and interpret the religion the way that you see it fit by rejecting a life that you came from and then you become militaristic in that sense -- that's not the way to go about it," said Rodwan Saleh, the president of the Islamic Society of Greater Houston.

It was also detailed in court how Maldonado allegedly took part in the beating and interrogation of a flight attendant who he accused of being a spy after the flight attendant took cell phone pictures of high-ranking al-Qaida members on a flight. The FBI agent said the flight attendant was eventually killed.

The official testified that Maldonado initially intended to fight Somalians but said he then broadened his targets to Ethiopians and Americans.

The agent also said Maldonado was angry at America and had no problem with the Sept. 11 attacks.

Maldonado was captured in Kenya in January. He faces federal charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a destructive device.

Maldonado's arrest marks the first criminal prosecution of an American suspected of joining terrorists in Somalia, officials said.

GOP Donor Hit With Terror Charges (AP)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

A New York man accused of trying to help terrorists in Afghanistan has donated some $15,000 to the House Republicans' campaign committee over three years.

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari pleaded not guilty Friday in U.S. District Court in Manhattan to charges that include terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering.

From April 2002 until August 2004, the man also known as "Michael Mixon" gave donations ranging from $500 to $5,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee, according to Federal Election Commission reports and two campaign donor tracking Web sites, http://www.politicalmoneyline.com and http://www.opensecrets.org.

Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the NRCC, said if Alishtari is found guilty, the organization would donate the money to charity.

"We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges, but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward," Boulanger said.

In the federal indictment, the government said Alishtari, 53, of Ardsley, N.Y., also known as Mixon accepted an unspecified amount of money to transfer $152,000 to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support an Afghanistan terrorist training camp. He also stands accused of causing the transfer of about $25,000 from a bank account in New York to an account in Montreal, money the government says was to be used to provide material support to terrorists.

Also, the indictment says, Alishtari schemed to defraud investors by obtaining millions of dollars in a loan investment scheme that he called the "Flat Electronic Data Interchange" and that promised high guaranteed rates of return.

The charges carry a potential penalty of 95 years in prison.

Alishtari was detained pending a court appearance this week. Prosecutors said he was a danger to the community and a flight risk.

On campaign finance forms, Alishtari identified his occupation as either the owner, president or chief executive of a business called Global Protector Inc., or GlobalProtector.Net, Inc. In some filings he listed the business as being located in the Bronx and in other filings in Scarsdale, N.Y.

A resume listed in his name and posted on an MSN group Web site on Jan. 8, 2007, identifies him as being an "industrialist and philanthropist" and references previous connections to the Republican Party.

The resume says that in 2003 Alishtari was named a National Republican Senatorial Committee "Inner Circle Member for Life" and was appointed to the NRCC's "White House Business Advisory Committee." The resume also says Alishtari was named the NRCC's New York state businessman of the year in 2002 and 2003.

The 2007 resume identifies him as the founder of IDPixie LLC, which is described as an "ID theft protection agency."

Terrorism Suspect Is Republican Donor (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 21, 2007

A New York man who pleaded not guilty last week to charges of supporting terrorism contributed about $15,000 to the House Republicans' campaign committee and claimed to be involved with the Senate Republicans' campaign committee in recent years.

DOJ_NMG_0134762

Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari, also known as Michael Mixon, donated almost all of the money to the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) during the 2004 election cycle and listed on his résumé that he was an "Inner Circle Life Member" with the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), the Associated Press reported.

The NRSC website says people can become "Inner Circle Life Members" by being nominated by a selection committee and donating $15,000 per person or $20,000 per couple.

An indictment states Alishtari accepted money to send $152,000 to Afghanistan and Pakistan to support a terrorist training camp. He is charged with terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering, and faces 95 years in prison.

Democrats are asking how much access Alishtari had with Republicans and whether the NRCC would return the money.

"We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges, but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward," NRCC spokeswoman Jessica Boulanger said. "If the individual in question is found guilty of a crime, it is our intent to donate the money to charity."

The NRSC did not comment by press time.

Propagating Terror (WT)

By Rachel Ehrenfeld

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Six years after al Qaeda attacked the United States, many policy-makers and "terrorism experts" retain the misconception that terrorism does not require large amounts of money. This myth was strengthened first with the September 11 Commission's report in 2003 and later reinforced by its October 2005 Progress Report, giving the government an A- for its "vigorous efforts against terror financing."

The Feb. 13 Terrorism Index of the Center for American Progress also lauds U.S. success in stopping terrorists' money all over the world. The Center for American Progress asked 116 U.S. foreign policy and terrorism experts to indicate how much progress has the U.S. government "made in implementing the 9/11 Commission recommendations since July 2004... to curtail terrorist financing." Most experts, in fact, "95 percent... said that some or a great deal of progress had been made."

The press release by the Center for American Progress offers the explanation that this is not surprising since "terrorists do not need large sums of cash to be deadly effective." Indeed, individual terrorist acts do not cost much; the World Trade Center attack on September 11 is estimated as al Qaeda's most costly, at $500,000, while the bombing of London's transit in July 2005, cost merely $2,000. Therefore, the report argues, the $140 million in terrorist assets, which the United States froze in 1,400 bank accounts worldwide during the last six years, is a great success.

But freezing $140 million did little to stop the fund flows to terrorists, especially when compared to the more than $90 billion that the Saudis spent since the 1970s to spread Wahhabism, one of the world's most virulent forms of Islam, which also produced al Qaeda. This Saudi-sponsored propagation of Islamist extremism is described by former CIA Director James Woolsey as "the soil in which Al-Qaeda and its sister terrorist organizations are flourishing." The hundreds of millions of dollars that the Saudis donated to the Palestinian Liberation Organization and Hamas just to fuel the intifada is but one example.

The report also ignores Iran's $100 million-plus in annual subsidies, for decades, to Hezbollah. Nor does it mention Iranian funds and weapons that bolster Hamas and Palestinian Islamic Jihad, whose cells are spread all over the world. Incredibly, there is nothing about the Iranian support of the Shi'ite in Iraq, or the cost of the Iranian made and supplied deadly weapons, including roadside bombs, and grenades "which spray molten metal ... [and] are responsible for the deaths of scores of American soldiers."

The Center for American Progress report talks about "terrorists money" in abstract. It says nothing about who transferred the money or who was the intended recipient. Was this al Qaeda's money? Hamas'? Or perhaps the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC)? Most importantly, the report failed to take into account the cost of building, maintaining and expanding the multilayered international infrastructure of radical Islam, thus making terrorists attacks possible on demand.

Another major source for financing terrorism comes from the illegal drug trade. But following the lead of the September 11 Commission's reports, this Index also ignores the billions of dollars generated by heroin, cocaine and other illegal drugs, which corrupts many governments and destroys millions of lives while filling terrorists' coffers worldwide.

It boggles the mind that the Bush administration continues to ignore terrorism's need for, and access to, a strong, international funding base, with large pockets even in the United States. More disturbing is the administration's unwillingness to identify the funding sources. As long as the terror financiers remain unknown, we will not be able to sever the terrorists' lifeline.

This willful blindness continues to undermine U.S. credibility with its allies and foes, and therefore its ability to curtail the money flow. Ultimately, this U.S. approach allows the expansion of the Islamist terrorists' agenda and the spread of terrorism, further risking U.S. national security.

Rachel Ehrenfeld is director of the American Center for Democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0134763

Muslim Groups Fast For Jailed Al-Arian (WT)

By Audrey Hudson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A coalition of Muslim groups is calling for a worldwide fast in support of Sami Al-Arian, a former college professor convicted of raising funds for a terrorist group who remains in jail on contempt charges for refusing to testify before a Virginia grand jury investigating other financiers of terrorism.

The American Muslim Taskforce for Civil Rights and Elections on Monday asked Muslims to fast every Monday, Wednesday and Friday along with Al-Arian, who has been on a hunger strike since Jan. 21.

Task force spokesman Agha Saeed says the response has been "compassionate, caring, supportive and concern about Professor Al-Arian's health."

The former University of South Florida computer-science professor was arrested in 2003 and pleaded guilty last year to assisting the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group. He was sentenced to time served and given an additional 18 months for refusing to testify against the International Institute of Islamic Thought (IIIT) and its role with the terrorist group.

The task force calls the additional sentence "a form of harassment," and along with Amnesty International, is demanding his release. The task force is made up of larger Muslim groups, including the American Muslim Alliance, Council on American-Islamic Relations (CAIR), the Islamic Circle of North America and United Muslims of America.

"The Muslim coalition is urging local communities to host information sessions at houses of worship and on college campuses to educate the public about Dr. Al-Arian's case," the task force said in a statement.

Daveed Gartenstein-Ross, a counterterrorism analyst and author of "My Year Inside Radical Islam," says prosecutors want Al-Arian's testimony to demonstrate the financial links between IIIT and his group and how the Palestinian Islamic Jihad was financed.

Mr. Gartenstein-Ross called the support through fasting "simply puzzling."

"I think on the one hand, there is a perception that Muslim civil rights are threatened, and there is a desire to support someone who might be a victim of an overzealous system, but it's important to take a look at the record and not blindly support something," Mr. Gartenstein-Ross said.

In sentencing Al-Arian last year, U.S. District Judge James Moody called him a "master manipulator" who "looked your neighbors in the eyes and said you had nothing to do with the Palestinian Islamic Jihad."

"This trial exposed that as a lie. ... The evidence was clear in this case that you were a leader of the Palestinian Islamic Jihad," Judge Moody said. "Your only connection to widows and orphans is that you create them, even among the Palestinians; and you create them, not by sending your children to blow themselves out of existence. No. You exhort others to send their children."

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales earlier this month, Amnesty International asked for an investigation into Al-Arian's treatment in prison, calling it "unacceptably harsh and punitive" and that he is being abused by guards "based, at least in part, on his political background."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Attorney General To Inspect Supermax (PUEBCH)

By Peter Roper, THE PUEBLO CHIEFTAIN

The Pueblo Chieftain, February 21, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will visit the federal Supermax prison complex at Florence on Wednesday, four months after a federal inspection report cited a staff shortage as the reason for security and supervision problems there.

Gonzales will tour the prison complex with Colorado Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, who urged him to visit the nation's highest security federal prison after a Justice Department inspector general's report found a list of security problems. The most glaring was that the mail and telephone calls for convicted terrorists being held at the prison were not always being monitored.

Allard, a Republican, and Salazar, a Democrat, both met with Gonzales earlier this year and were told that Bureau of Prisons officials had added staff to Supermax, which holds 400 of the most dangerous prisoners in the federal prison system, such as Ramzi Yousef, who led the first bomb attack on the World Trade Center.

Supermax officially is known as the U.S. Penitentiary, Administrative Maximum (ADX). According to a CNN broadcast last November, the inspector general's investigation was begun when Spanish police found letters from a Supermax inmate, Mohammed Salameh, were sent to a terror cell with links to the train bombings in Madrid.

DOJ_NMG_0134764

The Justice Department report found that staffing at the prison had become so short that there were times when inmate mail and telephone calls were unmonitored. Also, there were times when there were no guards available to be in some cellblocks for an entire shift - although the cellblock was still staffed at the perimeter.

Other Supermax inmates have been accused of sending messages to prisoners in other states, ordering racial attacks and other criminal acts.

According to officers with the guards' union, Supermax is supposed to have 240 guards but has been functioning with fewer than 200.

Federal BOP officials said in January they were adding 18 additional guards to the staff.

Gonzales Plans Supermax Tour (CANCDR)

By Vic Vela

Canon City (CO) Daily Record, February 21, 2007

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales will tour Supermax on Wednesday in Florence, as will Congressional representatives as security concerns regarding the federal prison continue to capture the attention of those in Washington, D.C.

Colorado Sens. Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard will join Gonzales on the Administrative Maximum facility tour Wednesday. Fifth District Rep. Doug Lamborn, State Rep. Liane "Buffy" McFadyen, Florence Mayor Cindy Cox and union representatives will also tour the facilities.

A press conference will follow the tour.

"We want to be sure the Bureau of Prisons and the Department of Justice are putting resources into secu-rity at Supermax," said Salazar during a conference last week.

Correctional officer safety and terrorism concerns have worried those who have been vocal in the issue of security at Fremont County's federal institutions. A report released in October of last year by the Department of Justice's inspector general indicates that mail and phone calls received from convicted terrorists at ADX have not been totally checked by BOP staff. Also, the inspector general reported that not enough staff was sufficiently capable of monitoring phone calls in foreign languages.

These concerns could because of an overall lack of staff at the prison. In November, the Bureau of Prisons — the governing body of a federal institutions — increased staff at Supermax, but the number of those staffed still lagged behind the number the prison opened with in 1994; that number was 240 correctional officers, today it is 220.

But the staffing concerns do not stop at Supermax. Earlier this year, a riot situation was narrowly averted at the United States Penitentiary in Florence. Correctional officers from ADX and the Florence Correctional Institution came to the aid of staff at USP where seven officers were injured breaking-up fighting inmates.

"We have a guard-inmate ratio that I'm not sure is sufficient," said Salazar.

McFadyen agrees.

"You can't take staff from other institutions and put them in another," said McFadyen, who has been instrumental in bringing prison security concerns to the forefront. "It needs to be across the board."

While McFadyen's concerns have not totally eased, she sees some of the latest developments as good news. In late January, Congress passed the President signed a $463.5 billion appropriations bill for the Veterans Administration, Social Security Administration and the Bureau of Prisons.

With those moneys, the Bureau will received $4.97 billion for the 2007 fiscal year for salaries and expenses aimed at increasing the number of staff within the Bureau; this is a $143 million increase from the 2006 fiscal year budget.

In addition, the Bureau's buildings and facilities account will net the department $432 million, a substantial increase of $332 million to help construct new facilities and help alleviate overcrowding.

These budget increases, combined with the attorney general's visit Wednesday, please McFadyen, who says things are going in the right direction.

"We've been looking for attention at the national level for two years," she said. "I believe the crusade we've been on is now being heard."

Bush Swears In New Intelligence Director (USAT)

USA Today, February 21, 2007

President Bush installed retired vice admiral Michael McConnell as the nation's second national intelligence director and said his challenge is to improve the quality of spy data and analysis in wartime. Bush said the intelligence community needs significant improvements more than five years after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. He instructed McConnell to focus on finding more recruits with the language skills and cultural background to collect information on terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0134765

"Old policies have hampered some common-sense reforms, such as hiring first- and second-generation Americans who possess native language skills, cultural insights and a keen understanding of the threats we face," McConnell said.

McConnell, 63, replaces John Negroponte in the 2-year-old office overseeing activities across 16 agencies, including the CIA, FBI, National Security Agency and Defense Intelligence Agency. Negroponte has been nominated to be deputy secretary of State.

Romney to air campaign's first ad

Republican Mitt Romney airs his first presidential campaign ad today to introduce himself to voters in early primary states. The 60-second spot describes the former Massachusetts governor as a "business legend" who "rescued the Olympics" and "turned around a Democratic state." Romney himself says, "This is not a time for more talk and dithering in Washington. It's a time for action." The ad will air in Michigan, Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Florida.

It is the first ad by a top-tier contender in a race where total spending by all candidates could top $1 billion by the time it ends in November 2008.

Sen. Johnson released from hospital

Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., has entered a private rehabilitation facility, more than two months after suffering a debilitating brain hemorrhage. Spokeswoman Julianne Fisher would not say where Johnson is getting treatment. He was released Friday from George Washington University Hospital in Washington. After a stroke Dec. 13, Johnson underwent surgery to repair a malformed cluster of blood vessels in his brain.

Grants awarded for homeless programs

The Department of Housing and Urban Development awarded $1.36 billion in grants to support local homeless programs, a slight increase from last year. President Bush has requested $1.6 billion for the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1. Local agencies compete for most of the grants, which support more than 5,300 programs for such things as emergency and transitional housing, job training and substance-abuse counseling.

Justice audit faults terror-crime reporting

The Justice Department regularly counted crimes such as identity theft and immigration fraud as terrorism despite having no evidence linking them to terrorist activity, an inspector general's audit found.

The report by Inspector General Glenn Fine found serious errors in 24 of 26 sets of department data compiled from 2001 to 2004. The report called the methods for collecting and reporting terrorism-related data "haphazard," but said the errors appeared to be unintentional. Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the office has since made improvements to track data. — Donna Leinwand

Retired Admiral Sworn In As Director Of Intelligence (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Retired Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, sworn in yesterday as the second director of national intelligence, said new technologies and capabilities are needed to collect and analyze intelligence "because today's threats move at increasing speeds."

"The time needed to develop a terrorist plot, communicate it around the globe and put it into motion has been drastically reduced," he told the audience of 300 at his swearing-in ceremony, which included President Bush and the leaders of the nation's intelligence agencies. "The timeline is no longer a calendar -- it is a watch."

McConnell becomes the president's chief intelligence adviser and manager of the 16 agencies and about 100,000 people making up the U.S. intelligence community.

Bush described McConnell's job "one of the most difficult and important positions in our government in this time of war -- and we are a nation at war." And although the president and his advisers have been criticized for ignoring prewar intelligence about the dangers in Iraq, Bush said yesterday: "He'll find that I value the intelligence product. . . . He's going to find that the intelligence product is an important part of my strategic thought."

Bush also paid tribute to McConnell's predecessor, Ambassador John D. Negroponte, who has moved back to the State Department as deputy secretary, saying he served with "talent and distinction." Nevertheless, Bush said that many elements of improving the intelligence community remain, including information sharing and the hiring of employees with the right language and cultural skills. McConnell repeated yesterday a plan he disclosed to Congress at his confirmation hearing: that he will change security rules to make it easier for intelligence agencies to hire first- and second-generation Arabic-speaking Americans for very sensitive jobs.

Although it was not mentioned yesterday, another of McConnell's highest priorities will be in proposing a deputy DNI, a position that has been vacant since Gen. Michael V. Hayden moved to the CIA last year. He told the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence that his preference would be someone from within the community on the civilian side who is working on terrorism-related issues.

DOJ_NMG_0134766

U.S. Official Admits To Big Delay In Revamping No-Fly Program (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — The federal takeover of checking passenger names against terrorist watch lists, a top priority for aviation officials since the 2001 terrorist attacks, is not expected to be complete until 2010, more than five years behind schedule, a top Department of Homeland Security official acknowledged on Tuesday.

The delay in the timetable is the latest setback in a long-promised program intended to enhance aviation safety, while reducing the number of passengers mistakenly identified as possible terrorists.

Since the 1990s, airlines have been required to do the checks on their own. But they do not always use the most up-to-date watch lists, or computer software that is sophisticated enough to distinguish between similar names, like Catherine Stevens, and Cat Stevens, the former name of the British Muslim folk singer who had been added to a no-fly list.

The Transportation Security Administration, the agency in the Homeland Security Department leading the effort, has invested nearly $140 million and four years trying to start the system. Two earlier versions of the system, which is now called Secure Flight, failed, mostly because of civil libertarians' complaints that the vast new database would violate passenger privacy.

The agency's administrator, Kip Hawley, said in an interview Tuesday that after spending a year re-examining Secure Flight, officials have come up with a way to reduce mistakes, protect privacy rights and achieve the reliability needed to screen some two million passengers who fly each day.

It will cost some $80 million more in the next year and a half to develop the enhanced system, which will then require more than a year of testing, resulting in the estimate that it will be in full use sometime in 2010. Officials would not release an estimate of how much they expected to spend before the system was complete.

"All of us are anxious to get it started as soon possible," Mr. Hawley said. "But we are going to get it right before we set an artificial date and try to rush."

The government effort first drew scrutiny when officials disclosed that they intended to search for unknown terrorists by buying access to commercial repositories of personal data collected about consumers to look for any possible link between a passenger and a known terrorist like a common address or phone number.

The new system, which will not use commercial data, will simply check, ideally with greater accuracy, if a passenger is on the no-fly list or a "selectee list," which requires more intensive screening.

To reduce false alarms, under the new program, airline passengers will probably be required to provide a date of birth, Mr. Hawley said.

Mr. Hawley said he hoped that the start of the new system could be accelerated, assuming that opposition to it was not too intense.

Officials are looking for ways to reduce false alarms. That has included a detailed review of the existing no-fly list to eliminate erroneous, redundant or incorrect listings, which Mr. Hawley said should result in its being cut almost in half. He would not say how many names remained.

Park Police Survey Shows Doubt In Chief, Terror Readiness (WT)

By Jerry Seper And Matthew Cella

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A survey of U.S. Park Police officers shows 97 percent of those who responded lack confidence in Chief Dwight E. Pettiford and 98 percent do not think the agency is as prepared as others to respond to a terrorist attack.

The survey also found that 98 percent think the agency's command staff was not doing its best to protect the public. In addition, 94 percent said inadequate staffing makes their work sites unsafe, and 85 percent described their work conditions as "unsatisfactory," according to the survey.

"These results are extremely disappointing," said James Austin of the Fraternal Order of Police, which conducted the survey. "If there has been a change in our mission, we have not been notified."

Mr. Austin, chairman of the union's Park Police Labor Committee, also asked that agency officials consider the survey findings if they want to improve morale.

Park Police spokesman Lt. Scott Fear confirmed that the agency had received the findings but said officials would not discuss them with a reporter.

DOJ_NMG_0134767

Much of the criticism about Chief Pettiford, who was promoted to the job from a deputy position in March 2005, is that he has not pushed hard enough for funding increases.

The lack of federal funding for the agency has been a concern for years. Several field officers and supervisors, who asked not to be identified for fear of losing their jobs, say the situation is hurting the agency's ability to accomplish its mission and is understaffed by at least 20 percent.

Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District's nonvoting congressional representative, has vowed to seek more money for the agency this year and has called ongoing budget shortfalls the result of "congressional neglect."

Mrs. Norton, a Democrat, has said Park Police has received funding increases of 23 percent since the September 11 attacks, while Capitol Police have received funding increases of 105 percent. However, she made clear that bolstering protection around potential terrorist targets such as the Capitol was "fully warranted." She also said Congress, not Chief Pettiford, should address the issues.

Former Chief Teresa C. Chambers, who was fired after making public statements in December 2003 about the lack of employees and resources, told The Washington Times that continuing budget shortages for the agency provide "a good opportunity for the new Congress to pick up this important issue."

She said "a long history of insufficient staffing" contributed to the 2002 death of Officer Hakim Farthing, who was struck by a drunken driver while trying on foot to secure an accident scene on the Baltimore-Washington Parkway. Mrs. Chambers said Officer Farthing was killed because of an inadequate number of officers and police cars.

"I maintain that a contributing factor in Hakim's death was the lack of adequate staffing," she said.

Critics of Chief Pettiford, who replaced Mrs. Chambers, also say he lacks the visibility to get Congress' attention for additional manpower and other resources.

Others blamed the National Park Service, which oversees Park Police, for the budget shortfalls.

This is not the first time agency officers have complained about inadequate funding and the potential for dangerous consequences.

In July, officers at Park Police, the country's oldest uniformed federal police agency, said funding problems forced them to cancel several important programs, including cadet training classes.

Earlier this year, they said the lack of funding has resulted in vehicles too broken and dangerous to drive. Though no officer had been hurt or killed as a result of the shortfalls, "it is just a matter of time" before such an incident occurs, Mr. Austin said.

About 179 of the agency's roughly 600 officers responded to the survey, which also found that 96 percent think they have inadequate equipment to carry out their duties during a terrorist attack. In addition, 72 percent thought their level of training was inadequate for their job and 60 percent said their special training or certifications were not up to date.

Roughly 85 percent said the "icons" the agency is assigned to protect from terrorist attacks -- including the Statue of Liberty, the Washington Monument and the Golden Gate Bridge -- were not as secure as they could be, according to the survey.

The agency also provides foot, mounted, marine and air patrols to protect the Mall, Rock Creek and Anacostia parks, the Baltimore-Washington and George Washington Memorial parkways and dozens of parks in the District, Maryland and Virginia. It also provides escort to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Nichols Says Bombing Was FBI Op (DESERET)

By Geoffrey Fattah, Deseret Morning News

Deseret Morning News, February 21, 2007

Detailed confession filed in S.L. about Oklahoma City plot

The only surviving convicted criminal in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building in Oklahoma City is saying his co-conspirator, Timothy McVeigh, told him he was taking orders from a top FBI official in orchestrating the bombing.

A declaration from Terry Lynn Nichols, filed in U.S. District Court in Salt Lake City, has proven to be one of the most detailed confessions by Nichols to date about his involvement in the bombing as well as the involvement of others. However, one congressman who has investigated the bombings remains skeptical of Nichols' claims.

The declaration was filed as part of Salt Lake City attorney Jesse Trentadue's pending wrongful death suit against the government for the death of his brother in a federal corrections facility in Oklahoma City. Trentadue claims his brother was killed during an interrogation by FBI agents when agents mistook his brother for a suspect in the Oklahoma City bombing investigation.

The most shocking allegation in the 19-page signed declaration is Nichols' assertion that the whole bombing plot was an FBI operation and that McVeigh let slip during a bout of anger that he was taking instruction from former FBI official Larry Potts.

DOJ_NMG_0134768

Potts was no stranger to anti-government confrontations, having been the lead FBI agent at Ruby Ridge in 1992, which led to the shooting death of Vicki Weaver, the wife of separatist Randy Weaver. Potts also was reportedly involved in the 51-day siege of the Branch Davidian compound in Waco, Texas in 1993, which resulted in a fire that killed 81 Branch Davidian followers.

Potts retired from the FBI under intense pressure and criticism for the cover-up of an order to allow agents to shoot anyone seen leaving the Weaver cabin at Ruby Ridge.

When contacted, the FBI's main office in Washington, D.C., said it could not provide immediate comment on Nichols' claims Tuesday.

Nichols claims that, in December 1992, McVeigh told him that "while he was serving in the U.S. Army, he had been recruited to carry out undercover missions."

In the next few years, the two men hatched the bombing plot. In October 1994, "McVeigh and I stole explosives from a quarry in Marion, Kansas consisting of 8 1/2 cases or boxes containing 229 (2-inch by 16-inch) sticks of the gel type explosive known as Tovex," Nichols wrote, adding that only a small amount was used in the actual bombing.

It was while traveling the gun-show circuit that Nichols claims the two obtained bombmaking knowledge and the materials used in the bombing. One example is that McVeigh allegedly attended a gun show in Knob Creek, Ky., in 1993.

"At this gun show, McVeigh had the opportunity to make contact with about 20 people who were bomb experts. McVeigh told me that he himself had no knowledge about how to construct a bomb, but that he always wanted to gain more knowledge about how to construct bombs," Nichols stated.

Nichols says he knew McVeigh was building the bomb, and in November 1994 he left for the Philippines to get away from the area to avoid being implicated.

"I did not want to be present when and if McVeigh did explode a bomb. Consequently, I left for the Philippines to be out of the country," he wrote.

That statement contradicts findings of Congressman Dana Rohrabacher, R-California, whose study on the bombing was made public last December. It indicated Nichols had traveled to the Philippines to receive bombing training by a possible foreign terrorist.

Having not heard of any bombing, Nichols said he returned to the U.S. in January 1995. It was later that, in a fit of rage, McVeigh mentioned Potts' name, Nichols wrote.

"McVeigh said he believed Potts was manipulating him and forcing him to 'go off script,' which I understood meant to change the target of the bombing," Nichols stated.

It wasn't until April 18, 1995, that Nichols said he helped McVeigh construct a bomb at Geary Lake. The bomb was comprised of "metal and white plastic" barrels which were filled with ammonium nitrate fertilizer and mixed with nitromethane. In all he estimates between 90 to 92 fifty-pound bags of fertilizer went into the barrels and explosive sticks were placed in the holes of each barrel.

Nichols said he had no further role in renting the Ryder truck and claims he did not know the target, only that McVeigh "wanted to make a statement" by "targeting some structure."

After hearing about the bombing of the federal building, which killed 168 adults and children, Nichols said he panicked when his name came up on the radio and he wanted to turn himself in — but not before hiding evidence, including explosives used in the bombing.

The claims made in the declaration have added yet more twists to the mystery surrounding the bombings. Some familiar with the bombing's history say Nichols' claims seem to indicate the FBI put McVeigh up to the plot as a draw for radicals, but that the situation got out of control and McVeigh became a runaway informant.

After reviewing the declaration, Rohrabacher told the Deseret Morning News that Nichols' claims should be investigated but treated with extreme skepticism.

"I need to caution people to remember that Terry Nichols is a mass murderer," Rohrabacher said. "But if Terry Nichols is beginning to reveal some of the information that's been kept from the public, I'd be very happy about that."

Rohrabacher also expressed disappointment with the FBI and the Department of Justice for not adequately following up on indications there were others who helped Nichols and McVeigh.

The congressman said he no longer is chairman of the subcommittee that conducted the investigation and is "dismayed" that no one else in Congress seems interested in the matter.

Nichols said he has much more information, which he offered to former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft in 2004, but is willing to divulge only under sworn video deposition. Trentadue said he plans to seek that deposition of Nichols, but "I expect one hell of a fight with the Department of Justice."

Nichols is serving life in prison without parole after being convicted by a jury for his role in the bombing. McVeigh also was convicted and on June 11, 2001 was executed in Terre Haute, Ind.

FBI, DHS Launch Third Fingerprint System Data-sharing Pilot (GCN)

By Wilson P. Dizard III, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 21, 2007

The government's massive, technologically ambitious project to achieve connectivity between two critical biometric databases took a step forward as the Homeland Security Department and the FBI unveiled an additional pilot project.

The project to achieve information sharing between the FBI's Integrated Automated Fingerprint Identification System (IAFIS) and the Homeland Security's Automated Biometric Identification System (IDENT) database dates back in various forms for many years and is planned to extend forward for several years.

IDENT contains millions of two-fingerprint records gathered by the former Immigration and Naturalization Service, which now is part of DHS.

The FBI's Criminal Justice Information Services Division in Clarksburg, W.Va, maintains IAFIS to service customers in the federal, state and local law enforcement communities, the intelligence community, and other authorized users of federal fingerprint data. IAFIS' 10-fingerprint records date back in millions of cases to the dawn of federal fingerprint collection, ushered in by the bureau in the last century.

The technological core of the data-sharing project involves modifications to the fingerprint comparison engines of the databases, among other changes. The bureau and the department already exchange data about each other's "worst of the worst" criminal suspects, fugitives and immigration law violators.

Two existing pilots, in the Boston Police Department and the Dallas County Sheriff's Office, started testing the data exchange technology last year.

The new pilot, which started operation on Feb. 1, will allow the sheriff's office in Harris County, Texas, to tap into additional IDENT records.

In a joint press statement, the bureau and the department said that the Harris County Sheriff's Office already had "booked a person for assault causing bodily injury to a family member and submitted the fingerprints for a background check.

"Despite previous use of nine aliases and four different dates of birth, the person's fingerprints revealed a lengthy criminal and immigration history, including deportation proceedings; entered without inspection; probation violation; driving while intoxicated; fraud in connection with an immigration document; supervised release violator; and assault," FBI and DHS said. The new system automatically advised the law enforcement officers of the criminal history, the agencies said, facilitating state and federal prosecution of the accused

Spitzer Makes Switch Official: He Supports Freedom Tower (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Gov. Eliot Spitzer announced yesterday that he supported going ahead with construction of the Freedom Tower at ground zero, making official his change of mind about a project that he once called a white elephant.

Mr. Spitzer's remarks — made with no great enthusiasm — came at a news conference downtown with Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg and Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey. Despite the setting for his remarks, Mr. Spitzer said he "would not be in the business of having a press conference every time a brick is added to the foundation or a column goes up."

That was an apparent swipe at the public relations approach to ground zero under his predecessor, Gov. George E. Pataki. Rebuilding has moved only in fits and starts during the last several years, with most visible activity until recently accompanied by news conferences and photo opportunities.

David M. Catalfamo, a spokesman for Mr. Pataki, responded later: "I'm not sure if it was one too many or one too few press conferences. What I do know is that today's announcement is a reaffirmation of the vision advanced by Governor Pataki and a sign that the progress at the site will continue unabated."

The $3 billion Freedom Tower, the tallest and most symbolic of the five towers in the plan, has been widely criticized for its size, expense and design, as well as its failure to interest nongovernment tenants. Mr. Spitzer was critical of it during his campaign for governor, and when he took office he put the 1,776-foot building under review.

Last week, however, city, state, and Port Authority officials indicated that Mr. Spitzer had changed his mind, encouraged by the improving real estate market and apparent interest by some private investors in buying the Freedom Tower.

Yesterday, Mr. Spitzer said that while he had felt obligated to criticize aspects of the project he disliked, it was time to move on.

"This should not be interpreted to mean that this is the project I would have designed at its initiation," he added. "But where we are today, this is clearly the best and the wisest alternative."

DOJ_NMG_0134770

Like Mr. Spitzer, Mr. Corzine and Mr. Bloomberg appeared more relieved than elated, a sign of how tumultuous the rebuilding effort has been since the Sept. 11 attacks.

"Maybe we would have done it differently if you could roll it all the way back to another day, but we live in the world we live in," Mr. Corzine said.

All three men deflected criticism of the tower's current design, saying it struck a necessary balance between security and aesthetics.

"I've said to Ray Kelly, our police chief, 'Would you let your kids work in this building?' " Mr. Bloomberg said; the Police Department had insisted on plan revisions to make the tower safer. "That's the standard that we have to build to. And he's looked me in the eye more than once and said, 'Yes.' "

After Mr. Bloomberg left for another event, Mr. Spitzer took more questions and seemed to wade into the controversy over the arrangement of the names of the dead at the 9/11 memorial. While the mayor, as chairman of the memorial foundation, contends that the matter has been settled, some families of the victims are not satisfied.

Mr. Spitzer said there was still room for discussion. "It is something that we will try to work through at the right time and the right place and get to a resolution that satisfies everybody," he said.

NY, NJ Govs Sign Off On Freedom Tower (AP)

By Amy Westfeldt, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 20, 2007

Govs Sign Off on Freedom Tower, but Push Sale of WTC Skyscraper

NEW YORK (AP) -- The governors of New York and New Jersey said Tuesday they support continued construction of the 1,776-foot Freedom Tower but also would favor selling the multibillion-dollar symbolic skyscraper being built at ground zero.

New York Gov. Eliot Spitzer, New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine and Mayor Michael Bloomberg appeared together to sign off on the delayed, redesigned skyscraper that has been under construction for more than nine months.

Spitzer, who once called the planned building a "white elephant" that could not be profitable for the government agency that owned the World Trade Center, said after he was elected governor that he would look at the project again.

He said Tuesday that a booming commercial real estate market and the need to move forward with long-delayed rebuilding at ground zero changed his mind.

"We're confident that this is not only viable, but profitable," said Spitzer. The federal and state government has promised to lease half of the tower's office space and the skyscraper -- which will cost more than $2.4 billion to build -- is on budget, he said.

But Spitzer added, "I don't have any opposition" to selling the tower, which the Port Authority is scheduled to finish building by 2011. "We will entertain these options if and when they arise."

Corzine said that selling the tower "would be good public policy." He said the Port Authority, which is run by both governors and owns airports, shipping terminals and bridges, should stay focused more on transportation than real estate.

Private investors have recently come to the agency with interest in ownership and development rights for the skyscraper and a second tower under the agency's control, Port Authority officials have said.

The agency agreed to build and lease two of the five planned towers last year when it renegotiated its lease with private developer Larry Silverstein, who is building three other towers on the site. It is sharing more than $7 billion in insurance proceeds and tax-exempt bonds to rebuild office space destroyed by the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack.

No design changes are foreseen, despite critics' complaints that the tower's height makes it too much of a terrorist target and that a 20-story, windowless base makes the building look too forbidding.

The base "speaks less of resilience and tolerance than of paranoia. It's a building armored against an outside world that we no longer trust," wrote New York Times architecture critic Nicolai Ouroussoff in a column on Monday, urging that the building be redesigned.

Spitzer called the design a compromise "between the security needs that are real and pure aesthetics."

"I don't think it will look like a fortress," Bloomberg said. "There's nothing wrong with taking appropriate security actions."

Spitzer Says There's Time To Resolve 9/11 Memorial Names Issue (NSDY/AP)

Long Island Newsday, February 20, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) _ Mayor Michael Bloomberg has said several times that his decision on how to arrange names of the dead around the Sept. 11 memorial is final. But Gov. Eliot Spitzer on Tuesday said that there was still time to talk about it.

"Yes, I have opinions. No, this is not the moment to begin that very public discussion," Spitzer said when asked about the issue of naming the dead on the memorial, which has pitted the mayor against some Sept. 11 families that have launched a Web site to oppose his decision.

DOJ_NMG_0134771

The mayor, who chairs the board of the nonprofit foundation building the memorial, announced in December that the nearly 3,000 victims of the 2001 attack and the 1993 World Trade Center bombing would be grouped by the tower or plane in which they died, and he said first responders' companies would be listed.

Families that opposed the decision wanted to list their loved ones' ages, the ranks of first responders, the tower floors on which they died and the names of the companies in the trade center. A Web site launched last month has 18,000 signatures on an online petition, Sept. 11 family member Edie Lutnick said.

Spitzer said Tuesday: "It is something that we will try to work through at the right time and the right place and get to a resolution that satisfies everybody."

The governor intended to speak to Bloomberg and New Jersey Gov. Jon Corzine about the names, Spitzer spokeswoman Jennifer Givner said later.

Bloomberg's office did not comment Tuesday. Last month, the mayor said of the issue: "You can't please everybody. I think the naming issue is something that has been decided."

After 9/11, Ailing Residents Find A Place To Turn (NYT)

By Anthony Depalma

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

They say they suffer the same rasping cough, shortness of breath and gastrointestinal pains as thousands of rescue and recovery workers who fell ill from the dust and smoke at ground zero. They worry, as the others do, that the future may bring more health problems.

Yet residents, workers and students who returned to Lower Manhattan after the Sept. 11 attack say that their medical problems have largely been overlooked as officials focus increasing attention on the responders who were more exposed to the hazards.

“Not to take anything from them, but everything has been concentrated on the fire, police and E.M.T. guys,” said Agustin Chaves, who lives and works in an apartment building two blocks from the World Trade Center site. “Nobody has been helping regular working people.”

Mr. Chaves, 53, developed asthma and severe acid reflux about a year and a half after Sept. 11, 2001. As his condition worsened, he tried to find out whether it was connected to the dust he had breathed in after the twin towers collapsed. Then last fall he heard that the city was giving millions of dollars to Bellevue Hospital Center to treat people excluded from other programs, like the one that monitors and treats recovery workers at Mount Sinai Medical Center.

Since that announcement in September, the number of people being treated at the W.T.C. Environmental Health Center at Bellevue Hospital has doubled to more than 900. Several hundred more people are on a waiting list, including many low-income residents of Chinatown and the Lower East Side, and immigrant workers without health insurance. And after Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg last week encouraged residents who might have been exposed to the dust to be checked by the clinic’s specialists, the number of patients is expected to rise substantially.

Dr. Joan Reibman, a pulmonologist who directs the center, said that most of her patients had not been exposed to the dust as intensively as firefighters and workers who toiled on the debris pile, but that they might have been affected by the contaminated air nonetheless.

Doctors and scientists have not definitively linked the dust to serious illnesses like cancer. But certain symptoms of respiratory and gastrointestinal ailments have been strongly associated with exposure to the dust. Thousands of firefighters developed gastrointestinal problems and what has become known as World Trade Center cough; the seriousness of their symptoms was found to be related to how soon they arrived at ground zero after the towers collapsed. Medical studies have also shown that they suffered substantial losses in lung capacity after working at the site.

Testing done by the Fire Department is considered especially important because all firefighters undergo thorough physical examinations every year, making it possible to track with a degree of medical certainty illnesses that developed after 9/11.

Most other studies about exposure to trade center dust — for example, the World Trade Center Health Registry of 71,000 workers, residents and volunteers — have been based on people’s own reporting of when an ailment began, and thus were less reliable indicators of a link between the dust and disease.

However, in the past year, both the federal and city governments have expanded monitoring and treatment programs for recovery workers and others, based on the premise that there is some association between the dust and those respiratory ailments.

An overwhelming majority of residents in Lower Manhattan have not developed any illnesses because of the dust, Dr. Reibman said. But whether some patients who have come in complaining of symptoms actually were reacting to the dust may be determined by looking at the extent of the dust exposure and the person’s medical history.

DOJ_NMG_0134772

While ground zero recovery operations ended in June 2002, dust could have remained in interior spaces and duct work in nearby office and apartment buildings far longer. In many buildings that were never thoroughly cleaned, that dust may still be present.

Dr. Reibman said it was possible that some clinic patients believed that their symptoms were associated with the dust even though there may not be a connection. As a doctor in a public hospital, she said that did not matter to her as long as those who were sick could be cared for.

But she said many of her patients do have "asthma-like symptoms that we're treating. And a small number have more complex diseases. Where you fall in that spectrum depends on exposure and susceptibility."

Most patients are treated with medication, though a few who develop more serious illnesses are hospitalized at Bellevue whether or not a specific link to trade center dust can be proved.

The half-dozen examining rooms at the clinic have been serving a constant stream of patients since Mr. Bloomberg pledged $16 million over five years for the clinic to treat anyone who needs it without charge. Dr. Reibman has so far adopted a policy that accepts nearly everyone.

Many people, like Mr. Chaves, arrive at the clinic with worry in their eyes and asthma inhalers in their pockets. He is the resident superintendent of a condominium complex on Greenwich Street. When his building was engulfed by dust on Sept. 11, he was standing guard in the lobby and was covered in a layer of fine particles.

About 18 months later, Mr. Chaves started having trouble breathing and began to think that his symptoms were connected to the trade center dust. His family doctor could not pinpoint what was wrong even as his condition worsened. He was once athletic and agile, he said, a basketball-court terror his sons could not catch.

"Now I can barely run around with the grandchildren," he said.

All the apartments in his building were professionally cleaned several years ago. But he finds the dust — a toxic mixture of chemicals and concrete that scientists say can be as caustic as drain cleaner — when he has to work in spaces above ceiling tiles.

Most alarming, he said, is finding the fluffy, gray dust when he or his men are called to remove a balky air conditioner from its slot in the building wall.

"We pull it out of the wall," Mr. Chaves said, "and all the dust is still in there."

The Bellevue clinic, which he visits every few weeks, has its roots in an asthma clinic that Dr. Reibman started in 1991 to investigate why the city had some of the highest rates of the disease in the country.

In 2002, she collaborated with the State Department of Health on a survey of residents who lived within a mile of ground zero. The study, one of only a few to deal with the effect on residents, found that about 60 percent of the 2,812 residents who responded complained of coughing, wheezing or shortness of breath that began after the terror attack.

The study has limitations. Those who responded to the survey were not given physical examinations, nor were their medical records checked for pre-existing health problems. Their responses were based on their own estimations of when their symptoms began.

In the same 2002 study, in a control group of residents about five miles from ground zero, 20 percent reported similar symptoms, again based solely on their own recollections.

Dr. Reibman's asthma clinic became part of the city's overall public health response in the months after 9/11. But it played a relatively small role until Mr. Bloomberg sharply increased funding in response to community pressure and emerging medical issues among recovery workers and others.

This month Manuel S. Bruno, 82, had his first examination at the clinic after reading news articles that said firefighters and police officers were developing serious, and sometimes fatal, illnesses.

Mr. Bruno said that shortly after he and his wife cleaned ground zero dust from their apartment on the Lower East Side, he developed an eye infection and an unusual rash. He said his regular doctors dismissed any possible link to the dust, attributing the symptoms to his age. Now he said he is willing to undergo specialized tests that the clinic's doctors ordered because, whether they find a link to ground zero dust or not, "at least maybe they can help me."

Another recent patient, Miguel Lopez, 40, said he had felt awful since he worked several months for a company that cleaned the dust from office buildings in Lower Manhattan. Without health insurance, he struggled for years to find someone to treat his severe rash and muscle ache before he heard about the specialists at the Bellevue clinic in October.

Mr. Lopez said he wanted to return to Ecuador, his native country, but was afraid to do so until he knew more about his medical condition.

"If something happens in 5 to 10 years," he said, "I don't want to be in Ecuador."

Dr. Reibman recently added psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers to the clinic staff because so many of her patients also have stress-related symptoms, stemming in part from their concerns about medical problems that could develop.

DOJ_NMG_0134773

She said she was so overwhelmed with new patients that she had not had the time or staff to conduct a follow-up to her 2002 residential survey. And she is likely to get even busier. Mr. Bloomberg, in describing the city's comprehensive plan for dealing with 9/11 health problems last week, said that the Bellevue clinic might need to care for as many as 12,000 patients.

Dr. Reibman said she did not know the extent of the health problems among Lower Manhattan residents, or how much money would be needed for treatment. But she shares data with the Mount Sinai program and the Fire Department and hopes to reach conclusions about 9/11-related symptoms and treatment.

Meanwhile, officials from the federal Environmental Protection Agency have said that trade center dust poses little continuing danger to residents. Still, in December, the agency offered to test and clean apartments in Lower Manhattan. (To register, residents and building owners can call 1-888-747-7725.)

In 2004, residents, workers and students in Lower Manhattan filed a federal class action lawsuit against the E.P.A., its former administrator, Christie Whitman, and other federal officials, seeking a more thorough cleanup and an aggressive screening and treatment program.

The suit, which does not ask for individual monetary awards, claims that Ms. Whitman deliberately distorted information and put families at risk by encouraging them to return to apartments, schools and places of business before comprehensive tests of the air quality were available.

Last year, Judge Deborah A. Batts of Federal District Court in Manhattan said that Ms. Whitman's statements that the air downtown was safe to breathe were misleading and "conscience-shocking." She allowed portions of the suit against Ms. Whitman and the agency to go forward.

Screening For Unions (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Democrats figure they owe Big Labor for helping them take Congress, and now comes the payback. Tucked away in House and Senate bills that purport to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission is a provision that the Commission most assuredly did not recommend: collective bargaining rights for the Transportation Safety Administration's 43,000 airport screeners.

Congress created TSA in 2001 without union rights on common sense grounds that the agency overseeing airport security was more like the Defense Department than, say, Agriculture. Unionization, with its myriad work rules, would make it harder for the executive branch to hire, fire, train and reassign workers to best meet changing terrorist threats.

Democrats haven't stopped trying to overturn that decision, and in 2002 they forced a showdown with President Bush over union rights as part of creating the Department of Homeland Security. Mr. Bush opposed the effort by Senate Democrats who were then in the majority, and the dispute helped the GOP gain Senate seats that November. This may explain why Democrats are now trying to unionize TSA sotto voce, under the cover of 9/11 Commission "reforms," and so far the press corps has barely noticed.

The Bush Administration has caught on, however, and opposes the change in TSA rules. Democrats are betting the White House won't have the nerve to veto an otherwise popular, if ill-understood, bill over this single provision. Our guess is that if Mr. Bush did veto such a bill, he'd find public sympathy for an argument that he was protecting a vital national security function from being corrupted by union politics.

La. Levee Plan Leaves Some Helpless (USAT)

By Brad Heath

USA Today, February 21, 2007

VENICE, La. — State and federal plans for a massive hurricane protection bulwark for Louisiana would sacrifice dozens of coastal communities, some with thousands of residents, to the next Katrina-sized hurricane. The reason: Protecting them would cost too much.

"We believe that it's probably not possible to provide adequate protection that people should be living down there," says Randy Hanchey of the state's Department of Natural Resources, which drafted one of the plans. Even so, the state has not encouraged residents to move from those areas.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, ordered by Congress last year to design its own set of storm defenses, reached a similar conclusion, project manager Tim Axtman says. "The reality is, the cost of protection doesn't equate to what's there," he says.

If state and federal recommendations are adopted, places such as Venice, a riverbank town of about 2,000 people south of New Orleans, will be left with hurricane protections comparable to the levees they had before Hurricane Katrina swamped them.

DOJ_NMG_0134774

Venice was devastated by Katrina, a Category 3 storm that came ashore with winds of 127 mph. In most places, existing barriers could not defend against a similar strike today, says Andrew MacInnes, who manages coastal issues in Plaquemines Parish.

The state and federal plans are due to be turned over to lawmakers this year. Together, they will recommend stringing hundreds of miles of fortified levees across the Louisiana coast and restoring or protecting vast stretches of fast-disappearing coastal wetlands, creating defenses around New Orleans and other populated areas that could withstand a storm more powerful than Katrina.

Final costs haven't been tallied, but Hanchey and Axtman each say the work will easily top $30 billion.

Most of the places that would be outside the new barriers are rural towns slung along the few remaining patches of high ground near the receding coast. A draft of the state's plan released this month shows new levees would exclude areas that were home to more than 20,000 people before hurricanes Katrina and Rita hit.

"We know they need to draw a line somewhere," MacInnes says. "But here?"

Efforts to rebuild those areas will be undermined if the government can't deliver better defenses against the next storm, says Lynda Banta, a councilwoman in coastal Plaquemines Parish. The area is still dotted with government-issued travel trailers. "People feel like they've been pushed under the rug — like the government doesn't want us to go back," she says.

Axtman says engineers are concerned that defending small coastal towns would siphon resources from bigger cities where more people are at risk. He says building bigger levees closer to the coast could increase the power with which storms can hit places such as New Orleans.

WAR NEWS:

Sen. Reid Discusses Iraq Troop Strategy (AP)

By Brendan Riley

AP, February 21, 2007

U.S. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid questioned Tuesday whether word of a possible British troop withdrawal from Iraq would pressure President Bush into changing his war strategy, and said Senate Democrats will move ahead with their own efforts to limit the president's authority.

Asked about the impact of a possible announcement by Prime Minister Tony Blair of a new troop withdrawal timetable, Reid, D-Nev., said he doubted whether "it would make too much difference" for Bush.

"Well, in the past they've ignored everybody. So they might must ignore him too," Reid said. "Realistically it will give those of us who believe the course in Iraq is headed in the wrong direction ... more confidence that what we're doing is the right thing to do."

Reid also said Senate Democrats may move ahead on Monday with an effort to limit the 2002 measure authorizing Bush's use of force in Iraq. That move is planned despite a warning from Senate Republicans that it's certain to be vetoed and the veto would be upheld.

The new move follows a failed weekend effort by Democrats who control the Senate to force debate on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's deployment of 21,500 more combat troops to Iraq.

The 56-34 vote fell four short of the 60 needed, but Reid said the vote still showed a majority of senators voted against the escalation.

Reid also repeated his statement that Iraq "is the worst foreign policy blunder in the history of our country." He said the war can't be won militarily, and what's needed is a political and regional solution that involves those with "a larger stake in the neighborhood," including Iran.

Reid, in Carson City for a forum of most Democratic presidential candidates, also said he's not favoring any candidate at this point. He added it's "not the easiest thing to say" to the candidates — other than Hillary Clinton — that his son, Rory Reid, has signed on as her Nevada chairman.

"I can't put numbers on who's No. 1, No. 2, who's going to win. I'm going to stay neutral on this," Reid said, when asked about the decision by his son, a former state Democratic Party chairman and currently chairman of the Clark County Commission.

Reid also declined to criticize U.S. Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who was one of several Republican senators not present for the weekend vote on Iraq.

"You haven't heard about our pact" to keep their differences out of the public, said Reid. "It's still there."

Reid commented at a news conference held prior to an address to the Nevada Legislature.

DOJ_NMG_0134775

For Democrats, War Is Front And Center (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

CARSON CITY, NEV. — The Democrats seeking the White House may be united in opposing the war in Iraq. But that hasn't stopped them from fighting over the conflict.

It is a skirmish over judgment, character and political mettle.

Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois stresses his opposition to the invasion from the start and says those who voted to authorize the war, only to come around later, are at least partly to blame for today's problems. It shows, Obama says, the decision-making capacity each candidate would bring to the White House.

Former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has apologized for his initial war vote, suggests Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York has been too measured in her opposition. Implicit is the notion that a calculating front-runner has shaped her views more out of political consideration than principle.

Clinton has sharpened her tone and stepped up her antiwar rhetoric, but has not apologized for her initial stance on the war. Take it or leave it, she says, telling voters she would not make the same decision today but acted on the best information at the time.

That the war is front and center in the Democratic primary, as it was in 2004, is hardly surprising. Congress has spent weeks focused on the issue, and grim news from Iraq dominates the headlines. "Nothing is more central or important to the American public than what's going on in Iraq, period," said Peter Hart, a veteran Democratic pollster who is neutral in the party's primary.

A national survey released last week by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center found that support for the war continues to decline, with 53% of Americans believing the U.S. should bring its troops home as soon as possible. Opposition is even fiercer among Democrats — 83% in the Pew poll said things in Iraq were not going well and more than six in 10 said the U.S. mission there would definitely or probably fail. That is the audience Democrats are playing to in Iowa, New Hampshire and on Jay Leno's "Tonight Show," where former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack drew a burst of applause last week with his call to cut off funding for the war.

"People don't want political spin. They want someone decisive, someone who tells the truth," said Craig Varoga, a strategist for Vilsack. (The ex-governor has emerged as one of the most assertive antiwar critics, bringing to mind a similar long-shot candidate four years ago.) "If you flunk the No. 1 issue of our era by treating it as a political Rubik's Cube … you flunk the principal character issue of what it is to run for president."

Never mind that the differences among the major Democratic contenders are largely a matter of degree. All of them oppose an increase in U.S. troops. By contrast, the top Republican candidates have given President Bush their qualified support. And while the Democrats offer different timetables and exit strategies, each of them wants to reduce U.S. involvement in Iraq sooner rather than later.

"The truth is we're in a primary contest," said Mark Mellman, a 2004 strategist for Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, who, like Kerry, is sitting out this race. "A lot of times the goal is to magnify small differences into giant divides."

The leading Democratic contenders — all save Obama, who is campaigning in Iowa — will be in Carson City today for the first Western forum of the 2008 presidential campaign. The session in Nevada's pint-size capital is supposed to focus on working families and the food-on-the-table issues they face. But even if the candidates stray from those topics, there will be little chance for give-and-take on the war or any other subject.

The candidates will appear sequentially over two hours, fielding questions from ABC's George Stephanopolous. They will not share the stage, but have been invited to pose for a group photo. (Only Democrats will participate in the labor-sponsored event, held with an eye on the Nevada caucuses set for mid-January. Republicans have yet to settle on their nominating calendar.)

Four years ago, former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean used his vociferous antiwar position to launch himself from back in the Democratic pack and, for a time, emerge as the front-runner for the nomination. Dean surged not just because of his blunt talk on Iraq but also because he gave voice to the anger of many Democrats who thought the party had lost its spine after losing the 2000 campaign.

Winning back control of Congress might have taken some of the edge off that anger. But plenty of people in the party, especially activists, view Iraq as a test of a candidate's toughness — not as a potential commander in chief, but a partisan warrior. That too is driving the war debate among Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0134776

"There is a very significant part of the base that thought the party was too accommodating and too willing to capitulate to Bush, and the war was the prime symbol of that," Mellman said. In that sense, he said, the parsing of positions on Iraq reflects a larger debate "over the kind of Democratic Party one wants to see."

Of course, Dean's candidacy faded and Iraq receded as a voting issue in the 2004 primary. All of the leading Democratic presidential hopefuls converged in roughly the same place, criticizing Bush and the war.

Many expect the same thing to happen this time. They don't minimize the war — it may be the paramount issue facing the next president. But they say Democrats are, in a literal sense, playing to the crowds that are turning out for events at this early stage of the race.

"The people out there now are among the top [percent] of voters who will actually go the polls in January," said Dante Scala, a political scientist at New Hampshire's St. Anselm College. "A lot of them are motivated by single issues, especially the war, and you just have to wonder whether most voters who turn out are going to have that same concern."

For now, however, no truce is in sight.

Former Admiral Says All American Forces Should Pull Out By Year's End (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - After the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, U.S. Adm. Joe Sestak commanded a carrier battle group in combat near Afghanistan, then in the Persian Gulf in the run-up to the Iraq war.

Now a freshman member of the House of Representatives, Sestak, a Pennsylvania Democrat, has introduced a bill calling for withdrawing all American forces from Iraq by the end of this year, while strengthening the U.S. military presence in the region and in Afghanistan.

Sestak, who defeated 10-term Republican incumbent Curt Weldon in November, has a Ph.D. in political economy and government from Harvard University. He served as the director for defense policy on President Clinton's National Security Council and once was the director of the Navy's anti-terrorism unit.

His bill would cut off most money for military operations in Iraq by Dec. 31.

"I honestly believe that in the next few months we will move to this position," Sestak said in an interview. "It may not be my bill, but it will be something very similar."

The main reason, he said, is that the war in Iraq is hurting American national security: It's diverted resources and attention from the fight against terrorism in Afghanistan and from other challenges to U.S. interests around the world.

"We diverted our attention, our resources and our forces ... to Iraq," he said. "To my mind Afghanistan is the poster child for what isn't being done in this world where the real war on terrorism is elsewhere, not Iraq."

While focused on Iraq, he said, the military has been unable to move effectively from World War II-era tanks to 21st-century high-tech communication and intelligence.

Spending on the war also has diverted investment from what he calls three "pillars of national security": health, education and economic development at home.

He rejects the worst-case scenario arguments that Iraq will descend into genocide and a regional war if the United States leaves.

"It changes all the incentives," Sestak said of his withdrawal plan.

Iraqi sectarian leaders would realize that without the American military holding down the violence, "they would have to accept the consequences that if they go too far, the retaliation against them might go too far."

Iran and Syria want to see the United States bleed in Iraq, Sestak said. But once the United States is gone, they'd want to avoid getting into a proxy war. Moreover, mostly Shiite Muslim Iran doesn't want Sunni Muslim terrorists growing powerful next door, he said.

Sestak's bill calls for moving Iraq-based American forces to bases outside the country but nearby and to Afghanistan or other trouble spots and sending some home. A strong U.S. presence near Iraq would permit special forces to be sent in on counterterrorism missions or to support Iraqi forces from the air, he said. American efforts to rebuild Iraq's government and economy would shift to diplomacy.

Sestak said that what got him into politics wasn't Iraq but his little daughter, Alexandra, age 5, who was diagnosed with a malignant brain tumor in July 2005. She's doing well after surgeries and chemotherapy, and Sestak hopes that buys time until a cure is found.

The walls of Sestak's office are covered with his child's art. He wears her blue plastic bead bracelet. Life in the cancer ward, he said, made him realize that he was fortunate to have access to top care, and inspired him to ponder how to improve the nation's health system. When doctors advised him to resume a normal life, he opted for politics. He serves on health-related House subcommittees and on the Armed Services Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0134777

Cheney: U.S. Won't Relent In Iraq War (AP)

By Eric Talmadge,

AP, February 21, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney reaffirmed the Bush administration's commitment to the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq during a visit to a U.S. aircraft carrier Wednesday, saying "the American people will not support a policy of retreat."

Cheney, who arrived in Japan on Tuesday, was given a 19-gun salute as he boarded the USS Kitty Hawk at this U.S. Navy base just south of Tokyo.

"We want to complete the mission, we want to get it done right, and then we want to come home, with honor," he told about 4,000 troops in the hangar bay.

Cheney said his brief visit to Japan was a gesture of appreciation for Tokyo, which has been one of Washington's most valuable allies in the war on terror.

He was scheduled later Wednesday to have dinner with Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and talk with Foreign Minister Taro Aso before departing early Thursday. Earlier in the day, he met with Emperor Akihito and Empress Michiko.

Also Wednesday, Cheney and Tokyo's top government spokesman, Yasuhisa Shiozaki, reiterated their countries' intentions to collaborate closely on missile defense and the realignment of U.S. troops stationed in Japan.

The U.S. has about 50,000 troops stationed throughout Japan under a mutual security pact that dates back to the 1960s. Tokyo and Washington have been reworking that alliance to make the presence more effective. They are also developing a joint missile defense shield.

Japan and the United States are also seeking to coordinate their stance on North Korea, which has rattled the region with its nuclear ambitions — and its first atomic bomb test in October — but earlier this month agreed to shut down its main nuclear reactor in exchange for energy aid and other incentives.

Despite the breakthrough, Japan has declined to contribute aid to the North until the issue of past abductions of its citizens is resolved. North Korea has admitted kidnapping Japanese in the late 1970s and '80s, but Japan believes it has not provided a full accounting of the victims.

Abe said he planned to explain his government's position to Cheney, and said "the U.S. has already expressed its understanding on this issue."

Cheney was to meet the parents of one of the abductees before flying on to the U.S. Pacific island of Guam and to Australia, his final stop.

Vulnerable House Republicans Risk Ties To Bush On War Vote (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Three months ago, the unpopularity of President Bush and the Iraq war led many House Republicans to the closest reelection bids of their careers. Now, most of those with freshly painted targets on their backs have given Democrats an early vote to tie them to Bush and the war.

While Senate Republican defections on the non-binding anti-troop increase resolution last week tilted heavily toward those with tough reelection bids in 2008, the few House GOP crossovers came overwhelmingly from safe incumbents. Nearly all of those who narrowly survived in 2006 voted with Bush, possibly providing future opponents with campaign fodder.

Although many of these vulnerable Republicans expressed skepticism or opposition to the troop increase, they toed the party line and opposed the resolution, apparently in hopes that Democrats will overreach in future showdowns over Iraq, such as de-funding the war effort.

In all, 17 of 201 House Republicans voted with Democrats on the resolution. Only one of them, Rep. James Walsh (R-N.Y.), was among the approximately 20 House Republicans who won in 2006 by less than 5 percent — a threshold that Democrats have set for identifying potential 2008 targets.

The 17-vote defection was also smaller than expected. Predictions were as high as between 30 and 60 GOP votes for the measure, a purely symbolic resolution that many saw as an opportunity for Republicans to separate themselves from Bush on the record.

Rep. Christopher Shays (R-Conn.), for example, previously said that Bush's proposed troop increase would be a "huge mistake" if the Iraqis don't step up. But he struck a different tone during the House debate, when he criticized the resolution for failing to offer an alternative course in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0134778

Shays beat back an anti-war challenger by 3 percent in November, while he watched his two Connecticut Republican colleagues fall.

"Two years ago, I believed this strategy had a better than even chance to work," Shays said last week. "Today it is less likely to succeed, but it is still the best opportunity we have."

Rep. Mike Ferguson (R-N.J.), who initially said he needed to be convinced that the increase was the correct choice, signaled that he had indeed come around.

The increase is "the best hope we have for the lasting success of the U.S. mission and for the future stability of Iraq's government," said Ferguson, who took less than 50 percent of the vote and won by less than 2 percent. "It may also be, I believe, our last chance for victory."

Offering similar sentiments were Republicans such as Reps. Charlie Dent (Pa.) and Mark Souder (Ind.), who each won by less than 10 percent, and Rep. Vern Buchanan (Fla.), a freshman whose race is still being contested. Souder railed against the war and said he disagrees with Bush, but voted against the resolution, saying "the battle has already begun."

Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC), has indicated that he sees the Iraq issue retaining its political legs through the 2008 election. Before the vote, he accused Republicans who sided with Bush of being "rubber stamps" — an enduring slogan from 2006.

DCCC spokeswoman Jennifer Crider said the Bush-Iraq ties were particularly effective in races in the Northeast and Midwest, and cited polls showing that a clear majority of Americans oppose the troop increase.

The vote "just drives home the point that these members are tied to President Bush's failed Iraq strategy," Crider said.

Narrowly reelected Republicans could mistakenly conclude that if the issues of Bush and Iraq didn't bring them down in 2006, the same will hold in 2008, said Amy Walter, house editor of the Cook Political Report.

She noted that the casualties of 2006 in fact included centrist House Republicans and Rep. Jim Leach (R-Iowa), who voted against the Iraq war.

"Voting record alone won't help in a bad political environment," Walter said. "But what you can hope for is that the other side overplays and overreaches."

Many Republicans didn't discuss the merits of the troop increase in detail during the debate, instead describing the vote as a political ploy and the first step on a slippery slope toward de-funding the war and hurting the troops.

Those voting with the president also included Reps. John Doolittle (R-Calif.), who won by 3 percent; Marilyn Musgrave (R-Colo.), who won by 3 percent; Jon Porter (R-Nev.), who won by 2 percent; Heather Wilson (R-N.M), who won by 1 percent; and New York Republicans Tom Reynolds and Randy Kuhl, who each won by about 3 percent.

Among the potential targets who voted for the resolution, Reps. Ric Keller (R-Fla.) and Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) each won by 7 percent.

Kirk comes from a district that Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) won in 2004, as does crossover Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.). Democrats have also suggested a presidential bump could help them oust incumbents like Castle, even though he wasn't in any danger in 2006.

Conversely, of the seven GOP senators who voted Saturday to bring the Iraq resolution to a vote, five face reelection bids in 2008, including three of the most vulnerable: Norm Coleman (Minn.), Susan Collins (Maine) and Gordon Smith (Ore.).

Smith drew heat from Democrats for previously voting against cloture, and Sen. John Sununu (R-N.H.) remains under fire for opposing it.

War Debate Fuels Advocacy Groups (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Grass-roots organizing on both sides of the war issue has been galvanized by debate and anti-war resolutions in the Democrat-controlled Congress, and it appears the advocacy will grow more intense.

Anti-war groups are following members of Congress home during their week off, while groups who support the war are targeting those they call "white flag Republicans" for defeat in the 2008 elections.

The anti-war movement has "very high expectations for this Congress," said former Rep. Tom Andrews, Maine Democrat and national director of Win Without War.

"For the first time, there's a hope for a check and a balance on the administration," Mr. Andrews said. "Instead of banging your head against a wall, there's a chance that you might actually make some progress."

Win Without War is part of the Americans Against Escalation in Iraq coalition, which also includes MoveOn.org and the Service Employees International Union (SEIU). The groups are lobbying members of Congress while they are in their home districts this week.

DOJ_NMG_0134779

The anti-war coalition has created a list of public events for senators and representatives who support the president's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq. Mr. Andrews' group is urging anti-war activists across the country to attend these events and persuade their members of Congress to stop supporting the surge.

Tomorrow, MoveOn will deliver letters to congressional offices, urging Congress to use its "power of the purse" to stop the surge by constraining or cutting off funding.

"They're home for recess, and this is our best opportunity to influence what they do when they return to Washington. They need to know that we're not going to rest until they start bringing our troops home," said an e-mail to MoveOn supporters.

Rep. John P. Murtha, Pennsylvania Democrat, has outlined a strategy to limit President Bush's use of war funds that have been requested in a supplemental appropriation to be reviewed next month.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, and Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer, Maryland Democrat, support Mr. Murtha's plan, and they say it is not the equivalent of cutting off funding for troops in harm's way.

Republicans say that constraining funding has "exactly the same effect as cutting off funding."

"If you have people ... who need reinforcements desperately and they have to have those reinforcements within a matter of hours, and the reinforcements can't go because the Democrats have put down metrics that say it's unlawful for this Marine machine gunner to leave Camp Pendleton because he hasn't done his requisite 14 months in the States before he goes overseas, you've had exactly the same effect," said Rep. Duncan Hunter, California Republican and ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee.

Meanwhile, a grass-roots conservative group, called the Victory Caucus, is targeting the 17 congressmen and seven senators whom they have labeled "white flag Republicans."

The 17 congressmen Friday voted with the Democrat-led resolution opposing the president's surge plan. The seven senators voted Saturday to shut out Republican amendments to an anti-surge resolution.

The Victory Caucus, led by conservative radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt, is now looking for Republican primary candidates to challenge these legislators.

The Woman In The Middle (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin And Michael Grunwald

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

The Democratic majority was only three weeks old, but by Jan. 26, the grass-roots and Net-roots activists of the party's left wing had already settled on their new enemy: Rep. Ellen O. Tauscher (D-Calif.), the outspoken chair of the centrist New Democrat Coalition.

Progressive blogs -- including two new ones, Ellen Tauscher Weekly and Dump Ellen Tauscher -- were bashing her as a traitor to her party. A new liberal political action committee had just named her its "Worst Offender." And in Tauscher's East Bay district office that day in January, eight MoveOn.org activists were accusing her of helping President Bush send more troops to Iraq.

Helping? Jennifer Barton, the lawmaker's district director, played them a DVD of Tauscher blasting the increase as an awful idea in a floor speech eight days earlier.

"The words are fine and good, but we are looking for leadership," scoffed Susan Schaller, one of the activists.

Leadership? Barton showed them the eight golden shovels Tauscher had received for bringing transportation projects to her suburban district, along with numerous awards she had won for her work protecting children, wetlands, affordable housing and abortion rights.

"That's fine and good," Schaller repeated, "but this is about Iraq."

The anti-Tauscher backlash illustrates how the Democratic takeover has energized and emboldened the party's liberal base, ratcheting up the pressure on the party's moderates. That pressure is also reaching House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), a San Francisco liberal who recognizes that moderate voters helped sweep Democrats into the majority. Pelosi has clashed with Tauscher in the past, but she's now eager to hold together her diverse caucus and to avoid the mistakes of GOP leaders who routinely ignored their moderates.

So far, Pelosi and her leadership team seem determined to protect Tauscher and her 60 New Democrats -- up from 47 before the election. In fact, the day after Working for Us, the new progressive political action committee, targeted Tauscher, Pelosi sought her out at a caucus meeting and assured her: "I'm not going to let this happen." House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) spent 20 minutes complaining to Working for Us founder Steve Rosenthal, who swiftly removed the hit list of "Worst Offenders" from the group's Web site.

Said Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly: "We want to protect our incumbents. That's what we're about."

DOJ_NMG_0134780

Democratic leaders want their activists to focus on beating Republicans. But the grass roots and Net roots believe the political tide is shifting their way, and they can provide the money, ground troops and buzz to challenge Democratic incumbents they don't like. MoveOn.org had two Bay Area chapters before the election; now it has 15, and they could all go to work against Tauscher in a primary. "Absolutely, we could take her out," said Markos Moulitsas ZÃºniga -- better known as Kos -- the Bay Area blogger behind the influential Daily Kos site.

Tauscher was reelected with 68 percent of the vote, but she said she takes this threat seriously; she has already used it in fundraising appeals. And though she has always highlighted her independence -- shortly before the election, she warned Democrats not to "go off the left cliff" -- she's now emphasizing her party loyalty.

She was once the only California Democrat to oppose Pelosi's campaign for leadership, but she now marvels that the speaker's performance has been "absolutely perfect -- and she looks so beautiful doing it!" Tauscher's Web site no longer features photos of her with Bush or Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (Conn.), who lost a Democratic primary of his own last year but won reelection as an independent.

Those photos survived in Google's cache; bloggers have dubbed one shot that appears to show Bush's hand on Tauscher's thigh "The Caress," an allusion to "The Kiss" -- video and photos showing Bush embracing Lieberman after the 2005 State of the Union address -- which dogged the senator in his fight against insurgent Ned Lamont. Tauscher donated and has helped raise a total of $2 million for Democrats over the past decade, and since 2003 she has voted with her party more than 90 percent of the time. This year, she has marched in lock step with Pelosi. But to Net-roots sites such as Daily Kos, Firedoglake, and Crooks and Liars, she's Lieberman in a pantsuit.

"I don't think it's a fair comparison," Tauscher said. "My colleagues look at this and say, 'If they're going after Ellen Tauscher, holy moly!' "'A Vicious Fight'

Why are they going after Ellen Tauscher?

She has annoyed the left by supporting legislation to scale back the estate tax, tighten bankruptcy rules and promote free-trade agreements. She served as vice chair of the pro-business Democratic Leadership Council, which many liberal activists dismiss as a quasi-Republican K Street front group. And she voted to authorize the Iraq war, although she did so with caveats, and she was quick to express her displeasure with its execution.

But liberal groups such as the Children's Defense Fund and the League of Conservation Voters give Tauscher impeccable report cards, while the National Rifle Association gives her straight F's.

"It's not just about her voting record," said Bob Brigham of San Francisco, an activist who recently started the Ellen Tauscher Weekly.

The latest blog wars began simmering in December after Tauscher led a New Democrat delegation to meet with Bush about bipartisan cooperation, irritating the Net roots. They boiled after her former chief of staff, Katie Merrill, posted a scathing piece on a California Web site attacking the Net roots for attacking Tauscher. Outraged activists immediately began mobilizing for a fight in 2008. "I didn't even know who Tauscher was 5 mins ago, but now I support a primary challenge against her," one typical commenter replied.

Brigham says it's never wise to tell the Net roots not to do something: "That's the worst move you can possibly make." But the anti-Tauscher backlash isn't just about pique, either. It's also partly about her district. And it's partly about her.

Tauscher grew up in working-class New Jersey, the daughter of a secretary and a shop steward for the meatpackers union. She was the first member of her family to attend college and, by 25, the youngest woman to hold a seat on the New York Stock Exchange. After 14 years on Wall Street, she married a technology executive (they're now divorced) and moved to California, where she became a Democratic fundraiser.

In 1996, Tauscher ran for Congress as a pro-business, pro-environment, pro-military centrist against Bill Baker, a conservative Republican she portrayed as too far right for his suburban swing district. Pelosi supported her, and she won. But when Pelosi ran for whip, Tauscher supported moderate Hoyer, a close friend. And later in 2001, Tauscher accused Pelosi and her allies in the California Senate of redrawing her congressional district as payback. The new district was much more Democratic, which made it a safer seat for the party, but not necessarily for Tauscher -- unless she followed Pelosi's lead.

That's why Kos has promised "a vicious fight for her seat." He's often portrayed as a raving ideologue, but he's really a savvy strategist; he has no problem supporting conservative Democrats in conservative districts, such as new Rep. Heath Shuler (N.C.). But he sees no need to tolerate a DLC type in Tauscher's district, where Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) received 58 percent of the presidential vote in 2004. And he said that primaries are the only way to force incumbents with safe seats to pay attention to constituents.

"We're creating real democracy," he said.

Kos and MoveOn.org founder Eli Pariser serve on the board of They Work for Us -- an issue advocacy group affiliated with Working for Us -- which also plans to focus on Democrats more conservative than their districts.

DOJ_NMG_0134781

"We're not going to the Heath Shulers of the world and saying, 'We want you to be more like Barney Frank,' " Rosenthal said, referring to the liberal congressman.

But Tauscher's district is not Pelosi's San Francisco or Kos's Berkeley. It's connected to Berkeley by tunnel, but as Tauscher likes to say, everything changes when you drive through that tunnel, even the microclimate. "Suddenly it's 25 degrees warmer, there's not a cloud in the sky and you know you're in Tauscher territory," she said.

Tauscher territory is mostly soccer moms, software executives and Restoration Hardware stores. It also includes the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory, Travis Air Force Base and several farm towns. "Ellen's a perfect fit for that district," said Audrey Gordon, a local Democratic fundraiser. "We've got a lot of tough seats to defend this year; why on Earth would Democrats want to attack Ellen?"

Tauscher's liberal critics say she has undermined the party during the Bush years, making a fetish of bipartisanship at a time when Republicans had no interest in real compromise, demonizing the far left at a time when Democrats needed to unify against the far right. And they're still seething about her "left cliff" quote, which echoed GOP talking points before Election Day.

"She reinforces the idea that lefties are out-of-control children," said Brian Leubitz, who runs a liberal California blog called Calitics. "She provides cover for Republican extremists."

Tauscher says it's obvious that Democrats will alienate independent voters if they tack to the hard left and she won't apologize for stating the obvious. "The speaker has been indefatigable about saying she's going to govern from the center," she said. "I guess if you're looking to be offended, that's what's going to offend you."

Her rhetoric infuriates activists, who still quote her statements that she never met a trade deal she didn't like, even though she later voted against one, and that she slept fine after her 2002 vote to authorize the Iraq war, even though she now opposes it. She supports same-sex marriage, but she's not an activist's idea of a Bay Area politician: too Wall Street, too establishment, too comfortable with the Chamber of Commerce.

"You can sense her contempt for the grass roots," Leubitz said. "She really doesn't represent her district."Doing It Her Way

How does Tauscher represent her district?

On a typical day this month, she started with a three-hour Transportation and Infrastructure Committee markup. California faces a water crisis, and Tauscher had two water bills on the agenda that she had pushed for years. She made a point of allowing freshman Rep. Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.) to share credit on one bill; she had supported his centrist opponent in his primary, to the disgust of the Net roots, but now she was trying to help him keep his seat.

She then raced to catch the last minutes of an Armed Services Committee hearing, just in time to question Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. As five women from the antiwar group Code Pink stood in protest, Tauscher asked two quick questions: Why didn't Bush's budget increase production of the C-17, a plane based at Travis? And how much would the president's troop increase cost?

Pace called the C-17 a "great aircraft" and hinted that he wouldn't be too upset if Tauscher, who chairs the subcommittee on strategic forces, stuck a few more into the budget, as she did last year. Gates then revealed the price of the troop increase: $5.6 billion.

"It's amazing how you can walk right in after doing something else for three hours and get them to answer the question nobody had asked," Tauscher said.

But Code Pink activist Zanne Joi, whose shirt read "Stop Funding, Start Impeaching," was not impressed. She said she was horrified that Tauscher hadn't challenged Gates about Iraq, that she had treated the increase as a done deal. "We need her to stand up and end this war," said Joi. She and her Code Pink colleagues recently told Tauscher that if she wouldn't support a bill calling for total withdrawal from Iraq within six months, they'd occupy one of her district offices.

Tauscher rolls her eyes at this kind of talk. She said she doesn't trust anything the Bush administration says, but it's the administration in power. "I want to represent my constituents, so I have to work with this president," she said. "I'm a pragmatic person. I don't have the luxury of saying, 'I'll come back in January 2009 and try to get some work done.' "

Tauscher spent the rest of her day dealing with local issues. She talked immigration with the California Farm Bureau; she strategized about a contract to run Livermore with the University of California; she discussed a traffic plan for Alameda County with a group of public officials. A lawyer named John Gibson stopped by to thank Tauscher for telling his mother nice things about him at a recent event, shortly before his mother died. "I went out on a high note with my mother," he said.

To Tauscher, this is what it means to be a representative. "I bring people together. I get things done," she said. "And I get things done the way the speaker wants."Appeasing the Left

On Feb. 2, when the House Democrats held their annual retreat in Williamsburg, Gerald W. McEntee, president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, made it clear that Working for Us didn't work for him.

DOJ_NMG_0134782

"Our majority can disappear in a wisp," he told the members. "I'm the sheriff of the incumbent-protection program, and if you need help, let me know. In Blue America, there's no room for PACs to chase vulnerable members they have differences with."

From the crowd, a voice squealed: "Woo hoo!"

It was Tauscher.

Working for Us was created in January by a coalition of bloggers, trial lawyers and labor leaders, the trifecta of Democratic interest groups. But once the group took aim at Tauscher, the trial lawyers quietly withdrew. And Tauscher soon met for a glass of wine with Andy Stern, the feisty liberal who runs the Service Employees International Union; he assured her of his union's support, even though it had helped launch the political action committee. For 12 years, Republicans ran the House according to the "majority of the majority," which meant that the conservative majority within the GOP caucus ruled. Pelosi is trying to run her House according to a consensus of the majority, avoiding legislation that does not have broad Democratic support. She hasn't forced members in swing districts to take tough votes on same-sex marriage, gun control or trade. She is focused on the minimum wage, ethics reform and other issues that can bring together Tauscher and MoveOn.org.

"Having served in the majority and the minority, I can tell you, the majority is better," said Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), another moderate who has sparred with Pelosi in the past. "It will take a big tent to keep it."

But Kos points to Harman as a perfect example of how the Net roots can keep Democrats in line. He said Harman used to be a constant irritant, a go-to quote for reporters looking for a Democrat to tweak liberals -- until she had to fight off a primary challenge from the left in 2006. "She's been great ever since," he said. Now Harman even writes on the liberal Huffington Post blog.

Kos can imagine a day when Tauscher still holds her seat but is no longer distasteful to the left. "That's what victory would look like -- a more responsive representative," he said. So when Tauscher praises Pelosi as "perfect on substance, perfect on optics," it's hard to know if that's a result of personal evolution, political trends, or blogospheric pressure, but it's music to Kos's ears. It's helpful to Democratic leaders, too.

Said Rosenthal, the Working for Us founder: "We want them to understand what we're doing helps and enhances the majority."

But Pelosi still faces two potential dangers.

She could work so hard to appease the moderates that she alienates her base. In fact, the left blogosphere is already grumbling that Democrats aren't doing enough to stop the war. And there's always the left cliff. Those moderate first-termers could be one-termers if Pelosi overplays her hand.

"Nancy knows our majority is fragile in its newness," Tauscher said. "If you keep our most endangered species in your frontal lobe, you know what you have to produce."

Staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Many House Members Cite, But Don't Read, Full NIE Iraq Report (HILL)

By Mike Soraghan

The Hill, February 21, 2007

During last week's war debate, House members repeatedly cited the new National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) on Iraq. Judging from the debate, it supported both sides.

Democratic Rep. David Wu (Ore.) warned that "[t]he fact that we are in a civil war is backed up by our own National Intelligence Estimate."

But Republican Jeb Hensarling (Texas) said the report shows that the U.S. troop presence in Iraq is preventing attacks within the United States.

"If we leave Iraq before subduing [the enemy], he will follow us to America, make no mistake about it ... Read the National Intelligence Estimate," Hensarling said.

But it seems very few, if any, House members read the full, classified version of the report. That 90-page tome is now available to all representatives, thanks to a surprise decision by the House Intelligence Committee a week before the debate.

A sampling by The Hill could not find a single House member who had trekked to the committee's secure office in the Capitol to view the classified version of the document. When asked, many said that they had read only the three-and-a-half-page declassified summary of "key judgments" that the office of the director of national intelligence released earlier this month.

The Hill's query of members was unscientific and non-comprehensive, so it asked Kira Maas, spokeswoman to House Intelligence Committee Chairman Silvestre Reyes (D-Texas), which members had dropped by the secure office to read the full report.

DOJ_NMG_0134783

"I'm not sure, given the classified nature of the information, if that's something that's public," Maas said. She promised to check again with the committee, but she didn't call back over the course of the week. The Hill repeatedly left messages asking whether the problem was not the sensitive nature of the information but embarrassment that no one had bothered to read it.

Like most members, House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) said he had read the unclassified summary available to the public, but not the full, classified report.

"That's just more detail," Hoyer said. "I think it has more specifics, but its conclusions aren't that different than the public version."

When the committee decided to let members review the classified version, it required them to take a secrecy oath before viewing the report in the committee's secure office in the Capitol. They are not to be allowed to leave with notes.

Rep. Diana DeGette (D-Colo.) also noted the NIE's conclusions about civil war on the floor of the House. But she said she drew her knowledge of the text from media reports. She said it was only one part of her decision-making on the Iraq resolution.

"The NIE adds to the weight of the evidence that we shouldn't escalate this," DeGette said.

Leading war critic John Murtha (D-Pa.) was dismissive of the classified NIE, but noted that he constantly reviews intelligence reports.

"I don't think there's anything in there I haven't seen in the press," Murtha said. "The best intelligence I get is in the field."

Rep. Greg Walden (R-Ore.) said he plans to read the full NIE, although he didn't do so in time for the debate. He said it's difficult to carve out the time to make a special trip to the Intelligence Committee office.

"You've got to go sit up there," Walden said. "The last time, there wasn't much more in the long version than there was in the summary."

A Peaceful Death, Then The Blast (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

Unlike so many deaths in this city these days, the passing of Ahmed Lami was remarkable not for its violent end, but for its lack of bloodshed: He died of natural causes at 65.

But even peaceful death has become a magnet for violence. As his Shiite Muslim family and friends gathered to mourn his passing Tuesday afternoon under a tent in a middle-class, religiously mixed neighborhood on Palestine Street, a suicide bomber walked in, sat down and detonated his explosives, killing at least seven people and injuring 21.

The funeral blast was among several car bombings, shootings and explosions around Iraq on Tuesday that suggested insurgents were finding new ways to evade the ongoing security crackdown by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

At least six people were killed in what authorities described as a crude attempt to detonate a chemical weapon in Taji, about 12 miles northwest of Baghdad. Insurgents blew up a truck holding two tanks of chlorine gas, which were thrown clear of the vehicle and leaked, the U.S. military said. Scores of people suffered nausea, vomiting and irritated eyes from exposure to the gas, according to wire service reports. Prolonged exposure to high concentrations of the gas can cause deadly respiratory damage.

The U.S. military said a Marine died Tuesday during combat in Al Anbar province, in western Iraq. The death brought to 3,147 the number of U.S. military personnel killed in the Iraq theater since the March 2003 American-led invasion, according to the website icasualties.org.

At the Lami funeral, attendance was smaller than usual for such public events, because fear of death grips the capital. Lami's family even took precautions to guard against a car bomb attack, blocking entrances to the tent with a minibus and palm trunks.

But the suicide bomber took advantage of common courtesies extended to those attending such ceremonies, where food is served and strangers are welcome to partake.

"The suicide bomber came in and greeted us and sat down," said Lami's cousin, Sabur Abdul-Hussein, who suffered slight shrapnel wounds in the blast. "We thought he was poor, waiting for the feast to be served. We asked each other if someone might know him." After two minutes, Abdul-Hussein said, the stranger blew himself up.

Abdul-Hussein said his family had begun to feel safer when the new security plan was announced but now thought the city was gripped by violence that would not let go. Those killed in the funeral bombing were two of Abdul-Hussein's brothers and five of his cousins.

"The scene was chaos — women came out from the deceased's house and started wailing and beating their chests," he said. "And there were my relatives' bodies, scattered and torn to pieces."

In the Shiite holy city of Najaf, a bomb Monday evening caused severe damage to a provincial office of the Iraqi National Accord, the party of former interim Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who returned to Iraq last week in a bid to unify the nation's political factions. Allawi, a onetime protege of Western intelligence agencies, had been living in London and Amman, Jordan, after his party fared poorly in 2005 parliamentary elections.

DOJ_NMG_0134784

Police also found 25 corpses dumped around Baghdad. A source in the Interior Ministry said the bodies, all with gunshot wounds, bore no markings of torture, as they often have in the past.

The U.S. military on Tuesday also updated the number of American military personnel wounded in Monday's attack on a U.S. base in Tarmiya, about 25 miles north of Baghdad, from 17 to 29.

*

christian.berthelsen@latimes.com

Special correspondents in Baghdad, Najaf and Taji contributed to this report.

Copter Attacks In Iraq May Indicate New Battle Strategy (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

The Army's senior aviation officer in Iraq said yesterday that Sunni fighters probably used a sophisticated SA-14 or SA-16 shoulder-fired missile to shoot down a Marine helicopter on Feb. 7, killing all seven people on board.

If confirmed by an ongoing Marine Corps investigation, it would mark the first time since last summer that insurgents in Iraq struck U.S. aircraft with such an anti-aircraft missile, and it would provide fresh evidence of a new strategy of targeting helicopters, according to Maj. Gen. James E. Simmons, deputy U.S. commander in Iraq.

Simmons said that, upon reviewing a videotape of the attack on the Marine Corps CH-46 Sea Knight transport helicopter, it appeared that the missile used was not the Vietnam-era SA-7, which insurgents and militias are known to have, but more likely an SA-14 or SA-16. Those pose a bigger threat because they have greater range, size and ability to overcome aircraft defensive systems. The helicopter's defensive system did not appear to deploy properly, the Marine Corps commandant, Gen. James T. Conway, testified before the Senate last week.

The Russian-manufactured SA-14 or SA-16 probably would have been brought into the country from abroad relatively recently, Simmons said in an interview.

The attack in Anbar province was the latest in a string of seven U.S. military and civilian helicopter downings in Iraq since last month. U.S. commanders say that Sunni and Shiite extremist groups have begun to use deadly strikes in a new and carefully planned effort to rally support for their causes.

"The extremists on both ends of the spectrum, Sunni and Shia, recognized that whenever you have an aircraft shot down that belongs to the U.S. government, that is a spectacular international press event" and sends the message that "they are a capable adversary," Simmons said.

The strategy of stepping up the targeting of U.S. helicopters, revealed in recently captured insurgent documents, was devised specifically to counter the U.S. and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad, he said.

In addition to confronting missiles, the U.S. military is seeing an intensification of ground fire from automatic weapons against its helicopters. On Monday, for example, three U.S. military helicopters were struck by ground fire as they helped repel an unusually bold insurgent attack on an American outpost in the town of Tarmiyah, north of Baghdad. The pilots were able to fly the helicopters back to their bases, where the aircraft are undergoing repair.

Army and Marine Corps helicopters in Iraq carry out hundreds of missions each day. On average, they are shot at about 100 times a month, with 17 of them hit.

Simmons said some recent attacks exhibited unusual coordination, planning and patience. These include a Jan. 20 assault, when an Army Black Hawk helicopter was shot down northeast of Baghdad, killing 12, and one on Feb. 2, when an Apache attack helicopter was downed north of the capital, killing its crew of two.

In both cases, Simmons said, insurgents in heavily Sunni regions used multiple weapons systems, including heavy machine guns, "clearly emplaced to attack the aircraft" from several different directions. It was the first time in months that such a concerted effort had been made using multiple weapons systems to attack aircraft, he said.

Insurgents apparently readied for the attacks by watching U.S. flight patterns over several days.

"These are patient fighters," Simmons said, adding he believes the attacks were linked and involved fighters from the same Sunni extremist group.

All of the recent helicopter downings occurred during daylight hours. The U.S. military flies extensively at night, but it cannot limit operations to nighttime.

Instead, Simmons said the military is responding by giving pilots detailed updates on threats and terrain, directing them to the least risky routes, and then allowing them to modify their altitude, speed and course to evade attack.

DOJ_NMG_0134785

Meanwhile, U.S. forces are aggressively going after groups believed to be responsible for the recent helicopter downings, Simmons said. "We're not being passive about this."

Joint Force Weighs Move On Sadr City (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

U.S. and Iraqi forces have moved aggressively in the last week to combat Sunni Arab insurgents in neighborhoods across the capital and to establish a stronger presence in religiously mixed districts long plagued by sectarian violence.

But as the new security crackdown enters a second week, they face their most sensitive challenge: whether, when and how to move into the Shiite-dominated slum of Sadr City, stronghold of the Al Mahdi militia.

Political pressure has mounted to crack down on the Baghdad neighborhood that harbors the militia loyal to radical anti-American cleric Muqtada Sadr. Sunni Arabs, who make up the backbone of the insurgency, have long accused Shiite Prime Minister Nouri Maliki of allowing Sadr City to remain a haven for the militia to keep the support of Sadr's followers.

"We think that much of the … violence that comes as a result of operations emanating from Sadr City will be remarkably diminished if they crack down," said Ammar Wajuih, a leader of the Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's main Sunni political organization.

U.S. and Iraqi military commanders setting out the next steps of the Baghdad security plan are concerned about stirring up a hornet's nest in a neighborhood of more than 2 million Shiites.

They worry that by moving too aggressively they could sabotage one of the few success stories in Iraq since the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

The teeming streets of Sadr City are thriving while the rest of the violence-racked capital wilts. The district pulses with commerce and youth, even as huge stretches of Baghdad fade into ghost towns.

Sadr City may shelter troublemakers, but they're lying low for the most part now. Moreover, Sadr's deputies have endorsed the security crackdown.

Even amid the bloodshed across Baghdad, customers fill Sadr City's shops. Workers repair its streets and sewage lines. Children play soccer on its dusty fields and walk to school along newly prettified squares, verdant emblems of progress in a quarter long one of Iraq's most deprived.

"Sadr City has always been safe, with the exception of the suicide and roadside bomb attacks," said Talib Saad, a barber along the district's main thoroughfare.

U.S. troops took heavy casualties when they tried to storm Sadr City in the spring and summer of 2004. For the Americans, the grueling street fights with black-clad teens holding AK-47s while running down the streets represented a nadir few want to relive.

Rather than crush the Al Mahdi, the U.S. wound up bolstering Sadr's street credibility and undermining the popularity of then-Prime Minister Iyad Allawi, who was pro-American.

Any new move into Sadr City remains controversial among military experts. Army Gen. Jack Keane, a former vice chief of staff, and military analyst Frederick Kagan, who were among the most influential advocates of the current Bush administration plan to increase the number of U.S. troops in Iraq by 21,500, have warned that a push into Sadr City would unnecessarily unite the country's now-splintered Shiite leadership.

"Attempting to clear Sadr City would almost certainly force the [Al Mahdi militia] into [a direct] confrontation with American troops," they wrote in a January report for the American Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank.

"It would also do enormous damage to [Maliki's] political base and would probably lead to the collapse of the Iraqi government."

But now at least one of the authors questions that view. In an interview Tuesday, Kagan adjusted his position and said some early signs of success, including Sadr's recent disappearance from public view and successful sweeps of other heavily Shiite neighborhoods nearby, suggest that U.S. forces could move into Sadr City earlier than Keane and Kagan had advocated.

"It appears that I overestimated the Sadrists and underestimated Maliki," Kagan said. "Our troops have operated in these neighborhoods and these neighborhoods are not resisting."

U.S. officials in Iraq have taken pains not to depict Sadr City as a singular source of trouble.

"Our intent is for people to recognize that we view it as any other place," said Army Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, a battalion commander with the 3rd Stryker Brigade Combat Team, which has been sweeping parts of north and east Baghdad as part of the crackdown that began Feb. 13.

But Sunnis insist on action. After years of watching their communities be targeted aggressively by local security forces and U.S. troops, Sunni leaders and officials insist that the success or failure of the security plan and possible reconciliation between sects hinges on whether Sadr City is treated like the hive of militants they consider it to be.

DOJ_NMG_0134786

Beyond Baghdad, Grass-Roots Security (WP)

By Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

IBRAHIM BIN ALI, Iraq -- The mud sucked at the soldiers' boots as they crept across the wet pasture after dawn. To their right, Humvees and tanks tracked the soldiers' progress from a narrow dirt road. To their left and in front stood cinder-block huts, shaded by date palm trees, where they believed the enemy was hiding.

The only sound as they approached the insurgent stronghold was the lowing of piebald cows and the faint gobble of turkeys.

"I'll tell you right now there's a lot of bad guys watching," Sgt. Anthony Palkki said.

The security plan for Baghdad is a fight not only in the teeming streets of the capital but also in places like this, a Sunni-dominated village on the northern outskirts, where U.S. commanders say the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq is terrorizing Shiite residents, planning attacks on Americans and funneling explosives into Baghdad along a network of country roads. Hundreds of U.S. soldiers from the 2nd Battalion, 5th Cavalry Regiment, 1st Cavalry Division pushed into Ibrahim bin Ali village Saturday morning for a two-day operation designed to take back the hamlet from insurgents and catalogue every fighting-age male in the village.

"This is a large part of the Baghdad security plan because this helps disrupt [al-Qaeda in Iraq] movement and foreign fighter movement into Baghdad," said Maj. Chad Shields, a company commander. "It's about getting to the level of detail where you understand the town that you're operating in, and you know the people you're operating among."

Gaining this understanding is one of the most difficult challenges facing U.S. soldiers operating here. Over two days, more than 350 U.S. troops involved in the operation searched 95 homes, discovered about a dozen roadside bombs -- including two that exploded under their tanks, causing no injuries -- and took scattered small-arms fire. But they failed to capture a single insurgent.

Although the security plan has been cast as an Iraqi-led mission, no Iraqi police operate around Ibrahim bin Ali. And Lt. Col. Kurt Pinkerton, the battalion commander, said he could not persuade Iraqi army commandos to assist.

"They didn't return my calls," he said.

So the U.S. troops proceeded alone along muddy canals, over irrigation ditches, amid flocks of sheep. The supporting tanks and Humvees sealed off roads around the village. Soldiers swabbed some residents for traces of explosives, took digital photographs of every male adult and logged Global Positioning System readings to mark the location of each building. Commanders said the census was necessary to learn who might be out of place when they return. But even before the operation, officers warned that insurgents might flee such a large American onslaught, and finding them would be difficult.

"They know we're looking for bad guys, and they know we don't . . . know what the bad guys look like, so we've got to check everybody," Staff Sgt. Patrick O'Neil told other platoon leaders at the pre-mission briefing.

Once in the village, a platoon led by 1st Lt. Chris Larsen, 24, a West Point graduate, encountered several frustrations. Some residents blithely pronounced the area safe, even though guerrillas regularly attack U.S. patrols with roadside bombs, gunfire and rocket-propelled grenades. Others complained about the lack of jobs, electricity and fuel, and said they cower in their homes at the sound of explosions and don't know who is responsible.

"I am not afraid of your visit or of you, the Americans, I'm mostly happy when you come over. I'm afraid of the interaction between you and the terrorists and then firing starts," said one villager, Onaid Merza Alwan. "Or when the terrorists see you in my house and they start to wonder why you are here, maybe I'm giving you information. It's very scary."

"So where are these terrorists that are watching right now?" Larsen asked him.

"If the Americans cannot see them, can I see them?"

"Yeah, he'll know who they are," Larsen told his interpreter. "I don't know who they are. They look exactly the same. The bad guys and the good guys look exactly the same."

Some residents took a more defiant stand when questioned by the platoon.

"Any individual on Earth values his country and refuses occupation. I am hoping this is not an occupation," Hassan Ali Hamid Hassan, 27, a recent graduate in Arabic literature from Baghdad University, told Larsen. "Jihad is a duty. Jihad was within our power since the beginning to protect our women, our property, our way of living. Jihad is cited in the Koran."

"I am not liking this guy right now," Larsen said. Hassan eventually told the soldiers he did not support violence.

On Dec. 30, the battalion uncovered large weapons caches in the area, including a warehouse that contained 3,000 pounds of explosives, car bombs, explosive belts and propane-tank weapons. But Larsen's platoon discovered no illicit weapons on this weekend hunt, or at least no new weapons. One villager kept a forearm-size shell from the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s that he had converted into a flower vase. Behind another house, the soldiers examined 11 Russian ammunition boxes that held spare car parts.

DOJ_NMG_0134787

Gunfire broke out once, when a U.S. soldier shot a snarling dog.

"Use rocks from now on, please. Rocks!" Larsen shouted at the soldier. "We're trying not to scare these . . . people. Tell them that we're sorry."

When the sun set, and the bats began to circle, the platoon moved into an Iraqi home, posted rooftop guards and spent the night on blankets on the concrete floor. Maintaining around-the-clock presence in trouble spots is key to the battalion's plan to disrupt the insurgents. For weeks the soldiers have lived in a series of abandoned houses in the village to send the message that their presence is not temporary. The Baghdad security plan encourages commanders to make such deployments, Pinkerton said.

The plan has "given them the authority, if you would, to go out there and occupy and sit full time," he said.

Without such heightened presence, he said, even armed residents are afraid to confront the insurgents. "I know they have AK-47 weapons in their house. What they'll always tell you is, 'until you're out here full time we can't' " respond, Pinkerton said.

To build a sense of trust, the soldiers in the operation tried to help the villagers. The platoon's medic, Pfc. Bruce Cardenas, 18, sterilized and bandaged one man's festering ankle wound. The soldiers spent part of the second day passing out truckloads of supplies -- rice, flour, blankets, kerosene heaters, stew, diapers -- to the residents. The handouts caused a mob scene, soldiers said.

After the Humvees rolled out Sunday afternoon, the commanders called the operation a success because it laid the groundwork for further counterinsurgency operations, familiarized them with the villagers and likely caused insurgents to flee, at least temporarily. Some of the soldiers on the ground were less sure.

"I think there will always be people who don't want us to be here," said Spec. Logan Gathman, 26, of Sacramento. "And whenever we show up the bad guys leave, anyway."

"I really thought there'd be more going on," Sgt. Josh York said.

Rape Accusation Reinforces Fears In A Divided Iraq (NYT)

By Marc Santora

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 20 — The most wicked acts are spoken of openly and without reserve in Iraq. Torture, stabbings and bodies ripped to pieces in bombings are all part of the daily conversation.

Rape is different.

Rape is not mentioned by the victims, and rarely by the authorities. And when it is discussed publicly, as in several high-profile cases involving American soldiers and Iraqi women, it is usually left to the relatives of the victim to give the explicit details.

So when a 20-year-old Sunni woman from Baghdad appeared on the satellite television station Al Jazeera on Monday night with a horrific account of kidnapping and sexual assault at the hands of three officers in the Shiite-dominated Iraqi National Police, people across the country were stunned, some disbelieving, others horrified, but all riveted.

Almost immediately, Shiite leaders lined up to condemn the woman, calling her charges propaganda aimed at undermining the new security campaign. Sunni politicians offered the woman their support. Whatever the truth of the accusation, though, it played to sectarian fears on both sides.

For many Shiites, the charges appeared to be an attempt to smear them and attack the Shiite-led government; for Sunnis, the woman's account only highlighted what they already believed to be true — that the Iraqi government cares little for justice and promotes a Shiite agenda.

Bitter exchanges between politicians of various sects were relayed to millions on television, interspersed with clips of the woman telling her story, her face veiled, just the tears in her eyes visible.

The Americans, who have advisers working with the Iraqi National Police, found themselves caught in the middle without answers. The woman said the Americans had rescued her from the officers and gave her medical treatment. The American-backed, Shiite-led government said the Americans would show the woman's claims to be false.

The American military said only that it was investigating the charges.

That was also the first response of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, who issued a statement soon after the woman appeared on television on Monday, promising a full investigation and the most severe punishment for anyone involved.

Only hours later, however, Mr. Maliki reversed himself. His office released a second statement after midnight, that one calling the woman a liar and a wanted criminal and going on to praise the officers involved.

DOJ_NMG_0134788

"It has been shown after medical examinations that the woman had not been subjected to any sexual attack whatsoever, and that there are three outstanding arrest warrants against her issued by security agencies," said the second statement. "After the allegations have been proven to be false, the prime minister has ordered that the officers accused be rewarded."

The government did not elaborate on the statement or say why the prime minister had so quickly reversed himself. His office only said that "known parties" had been responsible for the allegations.

But in siding with the security forces, Mr. Maliki threatened to only heighten the tensions surrounding the already highly charged case. His government also released the woman's name, which is not being published by The New York Times.

Sunni politicians rushed to her defense, accusing the government of revealing its true sectarian bias.

The case "should not be dealt with on a sectarian basis," said Saleem Abdullah, a spokesman for the Tawafiq bloc of Sunni parties, which helped the woman come forward. "She is a sister for all Iraqis."

He went on to say the government's handling of the issue could undermine its credibility in directing the security crackdown.

With fears of violence pervasive throughout the country, many Iraqis stay inside their homes whenever they can. Satellite television is their connection to the outside world and, just as often, their own country. On the two most prominent channels, Al Jazeera and Al Arabiya, they would have heard the woman telling her story over and over.

If she made up the story, it was an elaborate piece of propaganda and the contradictory statements by the Iraqi government only added to its power.

The woman was lying on a bed as she was interviewed, a blue blanket pulled up nearly to her chin. She had a light pink scarf covering her hair and a black scarf covering her face.

She said she was taken from her house on Sunday morning by the National Police while her husband was out, something no one disputes. The officers, she said, were looking for weapons but when they arrived at the police garrison, they accused her of cooking for Sunni insurgents.

It was at the garrison that she says the first officer raped her, covering her mouth to muffle her screams. Others were in the room at the time.

"I begged one of them to get me out," she said. "He said, 'No, no. I will after you give me one thing.' " She asked what that was, and he told her he wanted to "get close to me." She said she was led into a small room with a bed and a machine gun against the wall. Another officer came in and told the first man to leave. "Leave her to me," the man said, according to her account.

"I swear on the Koran and the Prophet Muhammad, I am not that kind of woman," she said she told the officer. He repeated her words scornfully and beat her with a black water hose, she said.

"If we want something, we will take; and things we don't want, we will kill," the woman said she was told.

She said that the attack was videotaped and that she was told she would be killed if she told anyone about it.

A nurse who said she treated the woman after the attack said that she saw signs of sexual and physical assault. The woman, according to the nurse, could identify one of her attackers because he was not wearing a mask, as were the others, and could identify a second attacker by a mark on his genitals.

The nurse would speak only on the condition of anonymity because she feared that Shiite militiamen would kill her for speaking out. The nurse said she was also wanted by the authorities, who believed the clinic she works at was used by insurgents.

She said the clinic was simply for Sunnis in the Amil neighborhood who were too afraid to the visit the Shiite-run hospital.

In Amil, which has been almost totally cleared of Sunnis, people were outraged, but not surprised. The woman's charges seemed to confirm their worst fears that the security forces were little better than militias in uniform.

A spokeswoman for the American military here in Baghdad, Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, confirmed that the woman had been detained by the Iraqi National Police on Sunday morning, but said that everything that happened after that was under investigation.

But a senior Iraqi official, speaking only on the condition of anonymity because he did not want to be seen as critical of the Americans, said that he had alerted the American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, on the day the woman made her allegations, cautioning him that if the case was not handled delicately, it could further inflame sectarian passions.

A spokesman for Mr. Khalilzad could not be reached.

The sectarian tensions further complicated an already delicate topic in Iraqi society.

The most high-profile rape cases since the American invasion four years ago have involved charges against American soldiers. And even in those cases, it was left to the relatives to speak publicly. Iraqis said they could not remember the case of a rape victim going on television.

DOJ_NMG_0134789

Sabah Salem, a professor at the Baghdad University College of Law, said that while men were occasionally charged with rape in Iraq and punished, many cases went unreported.

“Rape cases in Iraq are viewed as a shameful thing to any woman regardless of the fact that she is the victim,” he said in an interview.

The charges and countercharges occurred on yet another day of unrelenting violence in the capital, as two car bombs and a suicide bomber, in separate attacks, killed at least 17 people. One of the car bombs exploded in a neighborhood that was visited earlier in the day by Mr. Maliki, on a rare foray outside of the Green Zone.

North of Baghdad, a truck carrying chlorine exploded, killing nine people, The Associated Press reported. More than 150 others were made violently ill by the toxic fumes.

A Rape Case Goes Public, Igniting Political Fray (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 20 -- Most facts surrounding the reported rape that has become Iraq's latest political firestorm remain in dispute. But this much is clear:

Three Iraqi policemen, in the span of a few hours, went from being rape suspects to distinguished officers in the eyes of the Shiite-led government.

A Sunni woman's assertion that the officers sexually assaulted her was taken seriously enough to gain her admittance into a U.S.-run medical facility in the fortified Green Zone.

And the handling of the alleged assault has offered a window into Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's idea of damage control.

The 20-year-old married woman said she was taken to an Iraqi police station Sunday after police officers searched her house and accused her of aiding insurgents. She later graphically described her alleged sexual assault in a televised interview that has made her a fixture on Arab news channels since the story broke Monday.

The woman said neighbors alerted U.S. soldiers that she had been arrested, which led to her release. She was admitted to Ibn Sina Hospital, which is run by the U.S. military. Iraqis treated there are generally admitted at the request of U.S. officials.

"The woman was here," a hospital spokesman, 1st Lt. Justin Kocher, said Tuesday night. "She received the care she needed," he added, declining to elaborate.

Reports of rape are rare in Iraq, as in most of the Middle East. They seldom become newsworthy events. But Maliki injected himself into the case, issuing a news release announcing that the government had convened a committee to investigate and would hold the perpetrators responsible. The initial news release identified the woman, who has a common Sunni name.

Hours later, Maliki reversed course, issuing another statement calling the woman an impostor and a criminal with three outstanding warrants.

"After confirming the falsehood of these claims," it said, Maliki "has ordered that these distinguished officers be honored." It did not identify the officers or explain why the accolades were justified.

Saleh Muhamed al-Mutlaq, a Sunni member of parliament, decried the way Maliki handled the case and accused him of covering up the acts of what he said must have been a rogue group of officers at the Shiite-led Interior Ministry.

"They gave them a compliment," he said about the officers. "That's an insult to the family and the tribe. To do that in such a fast way is not fair. The investigation should have been done in a quiet, steady way, taking time to get the reality."

The Sunni speaker of parliament, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, also criticized Maliki. "By God, if you don't bring justice to this Muslim Iraqi woman, whom you should view as your sister or daughter," he said in a televised interview, "history will curse us with eternal disgrace."

The Islamic Army in Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, weighed in more forcefully, issuing a statement on its Web site vowing to avenge the alleged assault. The statement declared a "state of maximum alert" and called on its followers to "intensify attacks against the Iraqi security forces" in support of Sunni Muslim women.

The threat came on a day when at least 11 people were killed by car bombs in the capital, a police spokesman said.

North of Baghdad, at least six people were killed and more than 100 hospitalized after a truck apparently carrying a toxic chemical exploded, another police spokesman said.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair planned to announce Wednesday the withdrawal of 1,500 British troops from Iraq in the coming months, rising to 3,000 by Christmas, the BBC reported Tuesday. Britain has about 7,000 troops in Iraq.

Meanwhile, the president of the Iraqi Journalists Union said U.S. troops raided the group's office Monday and detained 10 of its guards. Shihab al-Timimi called the raid "a strange and irresponsible act" and said he has called the U.S. ambassador in Iraq and the U.S. military.

Military officials did not immediately respond to an e-mail sent Tuesday night asking for information on the reported raid.

DOJ_NMG_0134790

The U.S. military disclosed the death on Tuesday of a soldier killed in Anbar province in western Iraq.

Britain To Announce Trimming Of Iraq Force, Reports Say (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

LONDON, Wednesday, Feb. 21 — Prime Minister Tony Blair is planning to announce Wednesday that up to 1,500 of the 7,000 British troops in southern Iraq will begin withdrawing in coming weeks, the British news media reported, quoting unidentified sources.

An official spokesman for the prime minister declined to confirm widespread reports in newspapers and from the BBC about a withdrawal, saying that Parliament should be informed first of any such move.

But in Washington, a spokesman for the National Security Council, Gordon Johndroe, said that "while the United Kingdom is maintaining a robust force in southern Iraq, we're pleased that conditions in Basra have improved sufficiently that they are able to transition more control to the Iraqis."

Mr. Johndroe added that President Bush and Mr. Blair had spoken to each another on Tuesday and that Mr. Bush "sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad."

Britain has insisted for several months that it will reduce its troop levels in Iraq as soon as Iraqi security forces can take over from them — a marked contrast to America's decision to increase military personnel in and around Baghdad with a buildup of more than 20,000 troops.

Britain has long been America's most prominent ally in Iraq, with most of its forces deployed in and around the city of Basra. But with British troops engaged in Afghanistan as well, senior military commanders here have complained that their forces are overstretched and might well be exacerbating tensions by their very presence in Iraq.

The announcement could have political significance, too.

Mr. Blair is readying himself to redeem a promise to step down this year. Political analysts say he wants to set a timetable to extricate British troops from a war that has proven deeply unpopular among Britons, overshadowing his legacy after almost 10 years in office.

British newspapers said he would announce Wednesday that a total of 3,000 soldiers would return home by the end of the year.

Mr. Blair routinely faces legislators' questions in the House of Commons on Wednesdays when Parliament is in session and may make his announcement after that scheduled 30-minute appearance. He may also repeat what British officials have frequently said in the past — that troop withdrawals are dependent on the level of security in Basra.

For several weeks, British and Iraqi forces have been conducting an operation code-named Sinbad to challenge Shiite militias in Basra. Mr. Blair said in a television interview on Sunday that the operation had been successful and that it was "now complete."

The newspaper The Sun said 1,500 troops scheduled to rotate out of Basra in April would not be replaced and others would withdraw to a heavily-fortified base. Britain has lost some 130 soldiers in the Iraq campaign.

British leaders, including Mr. Blair, have stressed that their mission in predominantly Shiite southern Iraq is less fraught than the insurgency and sectarian strife facing American and Iraqi forces in Baghdad.

The Ministry of Defense said Iraqi forces in southern Iraq took a "significant step" toward taking responsibility for Basra's security on Tuesday when an Iraqi Army division in Basra was transferred to Iraqi command.

Maj. Gen. Jonathan Shaw, a senior British commander in southern Iraq, called the move "another important milestone on the road to Iraqi self-reliance."

Some politicians saw the expected announcement of a withdrawal as closely tied to the as yet unannounced schedule for Mr. Blair's departure.

"I always assumed that he would want to be able to announce some limited withdrawal before he left," said Tony Benn, a retired member of the British Parliament and a fierce critic of the Iraq campaign. "It is nothing to do with the real question, it doesn't represent any change of policy whatsoever in my opinion, but tactically it looks good."

British Muslim leaders, who have been vociferously opposed to the war, generally welcome the idea of a British withdrawal. "We should never have been there in the first place, and of course the sooner we come out of this mess the better it is," said Sir Iqbal Sacranie, the former head of the Muslim Council of Britain.

Sir Menzies Campbell, leader of the antiwar Liberal Democrats, told the Press Association news agency that the expected announcement did not go far enough toward a complete British withdrawal.

Blair To Reveal 1,600 Cut In Iraq Troops (FT)

DOJ_NMG_0134791

By James Blitz

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Tony Blair is to announce on Wednesday that Britain will cut the number of UK troops stationed in Iraq by about 1,600 – the first time the UK's military presence in the country has been reduced since the 2003 invasion.

The Financial Times has learnt that Mr Blair will tell MPs that the current UK contingent in Iraq – numbering 7,100 troops – is to come down to 5,500. The reduction in troop numbers will pave the way for Iraqi forces to begin taking control of the city of Basra.

In a statement to the Commons, Mr Blair will present the reduction in troop numbers as an initially modest move that does not undermine the UK's fighting capability.

However, Mr Blair will also say that a large part of the UK military in and around Basra will now start to return to barracks, acting as a potential back-up force for the Iraqi military as it begins to take full control of Basra.

For Mr Blair, in his final months as prime minister, Wednesday's announcement is highly symbolic. After being dogged by the debacle in Iraq for nearly four years, today's statement allows him to leave office conveying the impression – albeit a limited one – that the UK intervention has had some success.

However, the announcement will be watched with anxiety by politicians across the political divide in the US. Britain's troop reduction comes as President George W. Bush has started to commit the US to a "surge" of US troop numbers in Iraq, a move contested by the Democrats in Congress.

Mr Blair, who on Tuesday spoke with Mr Bush about Wednesday's announcement, will insist that there has been no opposition from Washington to the British move.

Mr Blair has told allies that senior White House figures regard today's announcement as good news for the coalition because it underlines that parts of the US-UK invasion have gone well.

Even so, Mr Blair's critics are likely to argue that conditions in the south of the country, where British troops have been in operation, have always been more favourable than they are in Baghdad.

Downing Street will want to convey today's announcement as one of the most significant stages of Mr Blair's final few months in office. Next month, Mr Blair plans to help pull off a big achievement in the Northern Ireland peace process, with hopes that a power-sharing executive will be formed after the assembly elections on March 7. Mr Blair is also focused on helping Angela Merkel, German chancellor, achieve agreement on a post-Kyoto deal on climate change at the G8 summit in June.

Apart from the situation in Iraq, Mr Blair is also likely to place emphasis on a possible climate change deal with Mr Bush – although White House concerns that Washington will only commit to a post-2012 treaty if China and India do the same have been taken into account.

Mr Blair's announcement on Iraq on Wednesday comes at the end of Operation Sinbad – a four-month security operation conducted by UK forces that has been aimed at gradually putting the Iraqis in front-line control of the city.

The British handed over security responsibility for two of their four provinces to Iraqis last year and abandoned their main base in a third.

The UK force is now concentrated in Basra itself and at a nearby air base.

Blair Readies Timeline For British Cuts In Iraq Force (WT)

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

LONDON -- Prime Minister Tony Blair will announce today a new timetable for the withdrawal of British troops from Iraq, with 1,500 to return home in several weeks, the British Broadcasting Corp. reported.

Mr. Blair also will tell the House of Commons during his regular weekly appearance that about 3,000 British soldiers will have left southern Iraq by the end of 2007, if security there is sufficient, the BBC said, quoting government officials who weren't further identified.

The withdrawal was announced as President Bush implements a surge of 21,500 more troops for Iraq.

Mr. Blair said Sunday that Washington had not put pressure on London to maintain its troop numbers. Britain hopes to cut several thousand of its 7,000-member force in the southern city of Basra by midyear.

Britain put Iraqis in command of the main Iraqi army unit in Basra yesterday in an apparent move to pave the way for London to formally announce major cutbacks in troops.

"The Iraqi army division based in Basra has transferred from under coalition command, and is now -- for the first time -- taking its orders directly from an Iraqi headquarters in Baghdad," the British military said.

"The transfer is a significant step towards Iraqi forces taking responsibility for security in the city."

Since the 2003 invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein, British troops have been responsible for Iraq's southern-most four provinces, which are mainly Shi'ite and have been quieter than mixed or mainly Sunni areas patrolled by Americans. But a British decision to draw down forces could prove diplomatically sensitive at a time when Mr. Bush is sending thousands more American troops on a "surge" to fight sectarian violence in Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0134792

The British handed over security responsibility for two of their four provinces to Iraqis last year and abandoned their main base in a third.

The force is now concentrated in Basra itself and at a nearby air base. Commanders say they hope to withdraw from the city and keep a reserve force on standby at the base.

U.K. May Pull 1,500 Troops From Iraq (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

LONDON -- Prime Minister Tony Blair will announce today a new timetable for the withdrawal of British troops from Iraq, with 1,500 to return home in several weeks, the BBC reported.

Mr. Blair will also tell the House of Commons during his regular weekly appearance before it that a total of about 3,000 British soldiers will have left southern Iraq by the end of 2007, if the security there is sufficient, the British Broadcasting Corp. said, quoting government officials who weren't further identified.

The BBC said Mr. Blair wasn't expected to say when the rest of Britain's forces would leave Iraq. Currently, Britain has about 7,100 soldiers there.

Britain has long been the most important coalition member in Iraq after the U.S. But Mr. Blair knows the British public and politicians from his own Labour Party want the troops out as quickly as possible, and don't want to see Britain stick with the U.S. in Iraq for the long haul.

Militarily, a British withdrawal isn't likely to have much effect on the stepped-up U.S. operation in Baghdad or the war with the Sunnis in Anbar province west of the Iraqi capital. However, Iraqi forces could have a tough time maintaining security in mostly Shiite southern Iraq, including Basra city.

Mr. Blair's Downing Street office refused to comment on the BBC report, which also said Blair would tell the Commons that if the situation worsens on the ground on Iraq, his new game plan could change.

The announcement comes even as President Bush implements an increase of 21,000 more troops for Iraq.

Messrs. Blair and Bush talked by secure video link yesterday morning, and President Bush views Britain's troop cutbacks as "a sign of success" in Iraq, said U.S. National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe.

Nine Killed in Chlorine Gas Tank Explosion

A hidden bomb ripped through a tanker carrying chlorine gas Tuesday, killing nine people and filling hospital beds with more than 150 wheezing and frightened villagers after noxious plumes covered homes and schools north of Baghdad.

The attack was part of a string of blasts -- including a suicide bomber who killed seven mourners at a funeral -- that further rattled officials marking the first week of a major security crackdown seeking to calm the blood-soaked city. U.S. forces, meanwhile, called in airstrikes during intense clashes against insurgents in strongholds northwest of Baghdad.

With the death toll in the Baghdad area climbing above 100 since Sunday, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki tried to court some rare upbeat publicity with an even rarer event -- leaving his heavily guarded quarters for a visit to the city's streets and markets.

The bombing of the tanker took place near Taji, 12 miles northwest of Baghdad. A military spokesman, Brig. Gen. Qassim Moussawi, said a bomb was planted under the tanker, but it was not known whether it had a timer or was remotely detonated. His remarks contradicted earlier reports that a roadside bomb blew up the truck.

Hospitals were soon flooded with terrified people -- including many children -- complaining of breathing problems, vomiting and stinging eyes. Most of the people treated were released after several hours and there were no apparent life-threatening cases, hospital officials said.

Authorities were left questioning whether the bombing could signal a new tactic by militants to try to spread greater panic with chemical fallout.

Blair To Unveil British Troop Reduction From Iraq (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

LONDON -- British Prime Minister Tony Blair is expected to announce Britain's first major troop pullout from Iraq, with 1,500 troops likely to return home within the next few months, British news agencies reported Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0134793

A total of 3,000 troops -- or more than 40 percent of Britain's contingent in Iraq -- could be pulled out by the end of the year, if the handover of security to Iraqi government forces in the southern part of the country continues to go smoothly, the reports said.

The expected announcement to Parliament on Wednesday, which the prime minister's office refused to confirm, follows the British government's pledge to consider drawing down troops this year as the Iraqi military and police shoulder more responsibility for quelling sectarian violence.

An important signal came earlier this week, when Blair announced that a program to place Iraqi troops to take "main frontline control" of security in the southern city of Basra had been "successful," clearing the way for British troops to assume a largely supportive role.

Critics have questioned just how successful Iraqi forces have been when taking charge. The Iraqis also have been assigned the lead in at least two other provinces of southern Iraq.

"It is absolutely true, as we have said for months, that as the Iraqis are more capable down in Basra of taking control of their own security, we will scale down," with the proviso that sufficient troops are "in reserve" to help in the event a "particular problem" arises," Blair told the BBC's Sunday AM over the weekend.

"The operation that we have been conducting in Basra is now complete, and that operation has specifically been to put the Iraqi forces in the main frontline control of security within the city," he said.

He said British forces in the south face a somewhat easier task than that of the Americans, who are preparing to deploy 21,500 additional troops in Baghdad and Anbar province, because there is no Sunni insurgency or al-Qaida suicide attacks in the predominately Shiite Basra area.

Several British newspapers and the BBC reported that Blair Wednesday will tell Parliament he plans to reduce Britain's 7,100-troop contingent to 5,500, with most of the reduction coming from troops now deployed in Basra.

A Blair spokesman said Tuesday night: "The prime minister has said that Parliament will have to be told about this matter first."

In Washington, the White House said it is grateful for Britain's past and future military support in Iraq. Blair and President Bush spoke on Tuesday, when the British prime minister presumably briefed Bush on his plans.

The Financial Times said Blair will assure members of Parliament that Bush expressed no opposition to a pullback.

Blair To Announce Timetable For Pulling Troops From Iraq (USAT)

By David Jackson And Jeffrey Stinson

USA Today, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the Bush administration's closest ally in Iraq, plans to announce on Wednesday a phased pullout of British troops from that country, he told President Bush Tuesday.

Blair's decision comes as the U.S. force in Iraq is growing by 21,500 troops to try to improve security.

The British leader had said recently that conditions in southern Iraq, where British troops are concentrated, are stable enough to begin withdrawals.

Bush and Blair discussed the move by secure videoconference. The White House called it positive step and said it was not a surprise because the British have been turning over power to Iraqi forces for months. Tuesday, they transferred command of Iraqi forces in Basra to the Iraqi army. Those forces had been training under British leadership.

"President Bush sees this as a sign of success and what is possible for us once we help the Iraqis deal with the sectarian violence in Baghdad," National Security Council spokesman Gordon Johndroe said Tuesday.

But Jeffrey White, an Iraq military expert at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy, said the move is "not a good news story from the point of view of security." A former Mideast analyst for the Defense Intelligence Agency, White said the British presence in southern Iraq "acted as a check on a whole slew of bad guys."

ON DEADLINE: Share your thoughts

The British Broadcasting Corp. quoted unnamed sources in Blair's government as saying the prime minister will tell the House of Commons today that the first 1,500 of the 7,100 British troops in Iraq will begin heading home in several weeks. The BBC said Blair plans to reduce the force to 3,000 soldiers by Christmas. That could not be independently verified.

British troops have been in charge of security in the southern part of Iraq, including Basra, the country's second-largest city. The area is populated largely by Shiite Muslims and has not seen the kind of violence directed at U.S. troops. A total of 132 British troops have died in operations in Iraq, the Defense Ministry says. More than 3,000 U.S. troops have been killed.

The British presence in Iraq has been declining since the March 2003 invasion. Three years ago there were roughly 8,500 troops.

DOJ_NMG_0134794

Blair has been a steadfast ally of Bush throughout the Iraq war. He argued that Iraq had to be made secure before withdrawal would be an option. Like Bush, Blair has seen domestic support for his course of action in Iraq decline as the war has continued.

The plan could mean Prince Harry, third in line to the throne, won't be deployed to Iraq. The prospect of Prince Charles' son, an army officer, going to war has been the subject of many stories in the British press.

Congressional Democrats said the move showed Bush should step up diplomatic efforts in Iraq.

"It is not in the interest of our troops to continue sending them in harm's way without a clear diplomatic strategy that will bring closure to this war," Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., said.

Stinson reported from London.

How Monument's Razing Might Preserve Iraqi Rift (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- The young Iraqis who hawk souvenirs in the shadow of Baghdad's best-known landmark -- the giant crossed-sword arches built by Saddam Hussein after the Iran-Iraq War -- had something new to sell yesterday: pieces of the memorial itself.

The Shiite Muslim parties that dominate Iraq's government had quietly given orders to dismantle the statues, which have dominated the capital's skyline for 17 years. As word spread, a few peddlers grabbed some of the green metal helmets, captured from Iranian soldiers in the 1980s, which had long been part of the so-called Hands of Victory. They were soon joined by American and British officials, who tore helmets of their own off the base of each statue to keep as souvenirs and who posed for pictures in front of the bright orange cranes that had been brought to the monument to do the actual demolition work.

For some of the gawkers, it was a chance to make a final visit to one of Iraq's most-recognizable monuments. For other Americans and Iraqis, however, it was cause for alarm -- and concern that the demolition of the monument would cause more than just aesthetic damage. Critics said the memorial's destruction would further fuel the country's intensifying sectarian strife and become another symbol of the central government's increasingly hard-line stance toward Iraq's Sunni Muslim minority.

"This monument represents a piece of our history," said Abu Sara, a Sunni computer engineer, as he heard the news. "The government is trying to wipe us away, in the present and in the past."

The government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite with ties to Tehran, ordered the dismantling without consulting the U.S. or making any formal public announcement. By nightfall, workers had torn the handles off several of the swords, punched large holes in the blades, and begun chipping away at the monuments' concrete bases.

Large orange construction machines were parked next to two of the swords, and demolition work is set to resume this morning. Aides to Mr. Maliki say they expect the memorial to be completely destroyed by the end of the week.

There are few monuments here that are as widely known -- or as controversial -- as the Hands of Victory memorial, which is an Iraqi Arc de Triomphe of sorts.

Mr. Hussein began building the monument in 1988 after the conclusion of Iraq's bloody war with Iran, which effectively ended in stalemate. H+H Metalform, the German firm that built much of the monument, said it had been given photographs of Mr. Hussein's forearms to use as models, according to a history of the memorial on the GlobalSecurity.org Web site.

When the monument was completed, each set of crossed swords reached approximately 140 feet into the sky. The blades of the swords were made, in large part, of metal melted down from the guns of fallen Iraqi soldiers.

Mr. Hussein inaugurated the arches in 1990 by riding under them on a white horse that was an allusion to the favorite horse of Hussein, the Shiite martyr killed near the Iraqi city of Karbala centuries earlier, according to the GlobalSecurity.org history. The long stretch of concrete between the two arches was later used for a series of Iraqi military parades overseen by Mr. Hussein and other top Iraqi officials.

After the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003, the section of downtown Baghdad housing the monument became part of the "Green Zone," the walled and heavily fortified compound housing thousands of Iraqi officials, U.S. military personnel and civilian officials, and foreign contractors. The stringent security measures protecting the Green Zone prevented insurgents from being able to target the edifice, but they also left the monument off-limits to the vast majority of Iraqis.

Early yesterday afternoon, Iraqi officials began alerting U.S. embassy staffers that a demolition order had been given. Word of the demolition plans spread quickly across the Green Zone, and soldiers, civilian personnel and contractors from countries ranging from the U.S. to Nepal soon descended on the memorial to take photographs or break off souvenirs.

One U.S. Army sergeant clambered up onto the base of one of the statues to pose for a photo but lost his footing and fell backward onto the concrete. He stood up, brushed himself off, and picked up a loose Iranian helmet to take home with him. "I'm going to have the most unique flowerpot in all of Tennessee," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134795

The jovial dismantling of the monument rubbed some of the soldiers the wrong way.

"What's the quote -- those who forget history are condemned to repeat it?" said Sgt. Harry Good, an Alabama native working on a government reconstruction team here. "I mean, Saddam was part of their history, too."

Afghan Suicide Bomber Wounds 6 Soldiers (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 20 — A suicide bomber disguised as a doctor blew himself up Tuesday morning at the opening of a hospital ward built by American forces in eastern Afghanistan, wounding six American soldiers as they tackled him at the entrance, officials said.

An American soldier was also killed farther north, in Kunar Province, on Monday, the United States military reported.

“A suicide bomber with explosives on his body and dressed in a white gown like a doctor entered the hospital where the ceremony was being held,” the governor of Khost Province, Arsallah Jamal, said in a telephone interview. The governor said he and about 50 guests had been just yards away when the bomber detonated the explosives.

An Afghan security officer and an American soldier had stopped the man, and when he tried to escape, the soldier grabbed him, the governor said. The man was shot in the leg, and then set off the bomb, he said. A hospital staff member was wounded.

The officials were cutting the ribbon of a new emergency ward built by the American military’s Provincial Reconstruction Team. The American soldier who was killed in Kunar Province, which borders Pakistan, was taking part in combat operations in Naray. A military statement on the operation did not give more details.

And on Tuesday, Afghan and NATO forces retook control of the Baqwa district of Farah Province, the government said. On Monday, the Taliban had seized the district from the local police.

A Problem Of Passivity (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

AFTER THE attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, there was a painful and sometimes bitter debate in this country about how two administrations could have failed to take decisive action against an obvious threat -- al-Qaeda's camps in Afghanistan. The Sept. 11 commission concluded that it was partly a "problem of imagination": Few U.S. officials considered the possibility that al-Qaeda was capable of reaching out from its remote base to stage devastating strikes on New York and Washington.

We know now that allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven can have terrible consequences for U.S. homeland security. And yet the Bush administration appears to be letting the threat develop again. For several months U.S. intelligence officials and independent observers have been telling journalists -- most recently at the New York Times -- that al-Qaeda has established several camps in the Pakistani territory of North Waziristan, along the Afghan border. Those camps are populated by Pakistani, Afghan and foreign militants; some may be Westerners who are being trained for attacks in Europe or the United States.

The camps have operated unhindered since at least September, when Pakistan's military ruler, Pervez Musharraf, agreed to a separate peace deal with local Taliban leaders. Since then, cross-border attacks by the Taliban into Afghanistan have tripled, according to the U.S. military. Taliban and al-Qaeda leaders in Waziristan have developed a "complex cooperative relationship," Lt. Gen. Karl W. Eikenberry, the outgoing U.S. commander in Afghanistan, testified before the House Armed Services Committee last week. Yet no action has been taken, either by the United States or by Pakistan, its nominal ally in the war on terrorism.

President Bush accepted and endorsed Mr. Musharraf's truce with the militants when it was reached. Now senior administration officials acknowledge that it has created serious problems. "A steady, direct attack against the command and control in Pakistan in sanctuary areas is essential," Gen. Eikenberry said. In separate congressional testimony, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "President Musharraf . . . has to do something." Mr. Musharraf has done nothing. Instead, he has continued to defend his deal with the Taliban and suggested that similar havens should be created in Afghanistan. The provincial governor who brokered the deal held a news conference last weekend at which he said the truce was a success and called the Taliban's terrorism against U.S. and NATO forces "a resistance movement, sort of a liberation war."

The administration's response to such statements -- and Pakistan's failure to act -- has been to heap praise on Mr. Musharraf and to express sympathy for the pressure he is said to be under. Such indulgence, which has gone on for five years while the general has tempered his action against Islamic extremists and suppressed Pakistan's pro-Western democratic parties, will be hard to defend if the consequences of allowing al-Qaeda a safe haven are unchanged. "Direct intervention against the sanctuary in Afghanistan apparently must have seemed . . . to be disproportionate to the threat," said the Sept. 11 commission report. Is that how the administration thinks of Waziristan?

DOJ_NMG_0134796

DOJ:

Interim U.S. Attorney For Northern California Sworn In (BAYCNS)

Bay City News Service, February 21, 2007

A career federal prosecutor was sworn in at a ceremony in San Francisco today as the interim U.S. attorney for Northern California.

Scott Schools, 44, who previously worked for the U.S. Justice Department in South Carolina and Washington D.C., was given the oath of office by Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker.

Schools told a courtroom gathering of federal lawyers and several judges, ``I'm very excited and honored to be here."

Schools was appointed last week by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to replace Kevin Ryan, who served in the top federal lawyer's job in San Francisco for 4 1/2 years.

Schools said after the swearing-in that he was about to hold his first meeting with his staff and was planning to tell the federal lawyers ``what my hopes and expectations are" for the job.

Schools will be in charge of about 115 lawyers in San Francisco, Oakland and San Jose who handle federal criminal cases as well as civil cases involving the U.S. government in coastal California from Monterey to the Oregon border.

Schools was most recently general counsel to the Justice Department's executive office, which gives guidance in ethics and employee matters to the 94 U.S. attorney's offices around the country.

Before that, he was second in command of the U.S. attorney's office in South Carolina four years and was interim U.S. attorney in that office for 10 months in 2001.

Under a provision of the federal Patriot Act reauthorization last year, Schools can remain in office as interim chief until a presidentially appointed U.S. attorney is confirmed by the Senate, which could be for the remaining two years of the Bush Administration.

Until the law was changed last year, the U.S. attorney general could appoint an interim U.S. attorney for only four months, after which the power to make a temporary appointment moved to the local federal court.

U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, has criticized the change in the law on the ground that it can be used to bypass the Senate confirmation process.

Editorial: Trading In U.S. Attorneys (PROJO)

The Providence Journal, February 21, 2007

The U.S. Senate should extend its inquiry into why the Bush administration has forced at least seven U.S. attorneys out of office. By tradition, presidents appoint these federal prosecutors when they first enter office. President Bush replaced nearly all those who had been appointed by Bill Clinton; President Clinton had done much the same before him. But it is odd for a president to remove his own choices, especially if they are performing adequately.

One who got the boot, Carol Lam, oversaw the corruption investigation that put California GOP Rep. Randy Cunningham in prison. Two others targeted in the probe, Kyle Foggo and Brent Wilkes, were indicted just last week. Until retiring last spring, Mr. Foggo was the No. 3 official at the Central Intelligence Agency. Mr. Wilkes is a San Diego-area defense contractor. The indictments were handed up just a few days before Ms. Lam's scheduled departure, raising the question of whether there was more to come — and whether it will now be pursued.

Also out is Bush supporter H.E. Cummins III, a U.S. attorney in Arkansas credited with stepping up prosecutions of drug and gun cases. He is being replaced by J. Timothy Griffin, a former deputy to presidential adviser Karl Rove. Another casualty, Kevin Ryan of San Francisco, took on backdated stock options and steroid use by Major League Baseball players.

In a hearing early this month, the Senate Judiciary Committee was not able to shed much light on these changes. Though the president is within his rights, a pernicious brand of politics seems to be at work. It seems clear, though not unusual, that friends and allies are being rewarded. More disturbing is the idea that certain investigations are perhaps being quashed.

An amendment tacked onto the reauthorized Patriot Act last year empowers the attorney general to replace U.S. attorneys for indefinite periods. Though Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales has vowed to submit new appointees' names to the Senate for confirmation, the law apparently does not require it. Previously, U.S. District Court judges had the power to make limited interim appointments. But Mr. Gonzales recently argued that this was improper: The judges might install their friends.

Some Democrats are pushing for a return to the old system, which seems better insulated from executive whims. The more heavily politicized these offices become, the less independently U.S. attorneys will act. The ultimate casualty is justice.

Editorial: U.S. Attorneys Get No White House Respect (TRICH)

Tri-City Herald (Kennewick, Paco, & Richland,, February 21, 2007

The firing of federal prosecutor John McKay of Seattle is lamentable, but the job of U.S. attorney is - always has been - steeped in politics.

And some of politics, sadly, is steeped in lying.

So the explanations out of the Department of Justice that McKay and five other U.S. attorneys were fired for "performance" issues call into question the source.

Seven months before McKay was forced to resign, he received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators, The Seattle Times reported.

"McKay is an effective, well-regarded and capable leader of the [U.S. attorney's office] and the District's law enforcement community," the team of 27 Justice Department officials concluded, according to a copy of their final report obtained by The Seattle Times.

Underscoring the mendacious assertions of "performance problems" by the Washington, D.C., bureaucracy is the discovery that at least four more of the six attorneys fired had recently received similarly positive evaluations of their job performance.

As McClatchy news service reporter Marisa Taylor wrote, the administration has been "forced to defend the firings in recent weeks after critics raised concerns that well-respected, competent U.S. attorneys known for their independence were being removed to make way for handpicked candidates who'd be less likely to buck the White House."

It seems a reasonable assumption that McKay and the others weren't well connected to the heavily political Attorney General's Office. Some may not possess the right ideological bent.

There's always been an element of political patronage in doling out these plum jobs, but the checks and balances against the worst abuses are no longer required.

Replacements for the ousted attorneys won't have to face potentially grueling confirmation hearings before the Senate unless the Bush administration agrees to it.

Count it as another unintended consequence of the war on terror.

As Taylor reported, Democrats now in control of the Senate have only recently discovered that "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales could use a little-noticed change in the Patriot Act to fill vacancies with interim U.S. attorneys for indefinite terms without Senate approval."

There's little doubt that McKay and at least most of the others weren't treated fairly. But fairness is separated from politics by more than just 605 pages in Webster's New World Dictionary.

It shouldn't work this way, but U.S. attorney appointments - and jobs - are among the most political in the country.

Replacements for the six, if they are indeed chosen as "handpicked candidates who'd be less likely to buck the White House," probably shouldn't make any long-range plans beyond January 2009.

No matter which party winds up in the White House, loyalty to George W. Bush will mean less then.

And the Senate Judiciary Committee has now voted to repeal the administration's authority to simply replace U.S. attorneys without seeking congressional approval.

If the Senate and House go along, they will help stymie the impulse to fire good attorneys for bad reasons.

Study On Privacy Protections Finds Citizens Distrust Security Agencies (NJTECHD)

By Andrew Noyes, National Journal's Technology Daily

National Journal's Technology Daily, February 21, 2007

The CIA, Homeland Security Department and National Security Agency are the least trusted federal agencies when it comes to protecting Americans' privacy, according to a new study by the Ponemon Institute.

The annual survey, which will be released Wednesday, asked more than 7,000 citizens whether they believe the government takes appropriate steps to safeguard personal information. Answers were mixed, but the overall trend suggested a decline in public trust since the think tank first studied the issue in 2004.

The NSA has suffered a substantial flogging by lawmakers and privacy advocates amid questions in the past year over its domestic spying in search of terrorists. It also was revealed recently that the CIA has been utilizing a special subpoena power of the 2001 anti-terrorism law known as the USA PATRIOT Act to comb bank and credit-card records.

Homeland Security and the Transportation Security Administration, which were evaluated separately in the survey, have experienced their fair share of controversy over the mining of information from government and commercial databases and a program that screens travelers entering the United States.

After last year's massive breach of more than 27 million military personnel's data, furthermore, the Veterans Administration fell from a top-five ranking in 2006 to just outside the bottom five in the 2007 Ponemon study.

DOJ_NMG_0134798

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' office also was among the least trusted of the 74 federal entities included in the poll.

"There's a clear correlation between bad publicity and poor privacy trust performance," survey author Larry Ponemon said. Previous studies "lacked a big headline negative event," whereas this time, there were several.

"Initiating more transparent operations and communications with the public is often the first step toward repairing damaged trust, but for obvious reasons, those are not options that agencies like the CIA or NSA can take," Ponemon said. The confidential nature of the agencies' operations "will always carry a certain cloud of mistrust with some."

Lisa Graves, deputy director of the Center for National Security Studies, said the study "rightly gives these agencies rock-bottom privacy trust scores." "Some politicians may believe they can make political gains by going along with the president's anti-terrorism policies that strip away Americans' privacy rights," she said. But the survey makes clear that Americans do not think the entities can be trusted to protect their rights, she said.

The U.S. Postal Service received Ponemon's top ranking for protecting privacy the third year in a row. Other notable high achievers were the FTC, its Bureau of Consumer Protection, the National Institutes of Health, and the Census Bureau.

The study's overall findings concluded that Americans remain concerned over a "loss of civil liberties and privacy rights," "surveillance into personal life," and "monitoring e-mail and Web activities."

While diminishing public trust for the NSA and VA was not surprising to privacy advocate Marc Rotenberg, the FTC "may not be out of the woods" given mounting public concerns about identity theft. "If the FTC doesn't get a better handle on that problem, the commission may find its own trust rating drop in the 2008 survey," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Oops! Orrick Associate Lets Slip Mercury Backdating Document (LAW)

By Scott Graham, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 21, 2007

A fourth-year associate at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe inadvertently disclosed a sensitive document about stock option backdating that the firm has spent the last five months fighting to keep under seal.

The document -- a complaint in a shareholder derivative action against former executives of Mercury Interactive Corp. -- contains explosive allegations against the executives and quotes extensively from e-mails in which the executives allegedly discuss backdating their own stock options.

"What do you want to do about [Chief Financial Officer Douglas Smith]'s option since the price is going up?" former General Counsel Susan Skaer is quoted asking CEO Amnon Landon in one e-mail. "Keep waiting?"

The complaint, Morillo v. Abrams, 1:05-cv-50710, had been filed under seal on Sept. 22 as part of a confidentiality agreement with the executives' lawyers -- but without judicial approval. The Recorder and two other news organizations have been trying since then to unseal the complaint and its supporting exhibits.

But a Dow Jones News Service reporter discovered Friday that Orrick associate M. Todd Scott had inadvertently filed the complaint publicly with a motion to stay the derivative action in October. The Wall Street Journal posted the complaint on its Web site over the weekend and wrote a story about it on page A-4 of Tuesday's print edition.

In a filing for an emergency hearing on Tuesday, Orrick partner James Kramer wrote that Scott thought the complaint had been filed under seal when Scott included it as an exhibit to his own declaration.

"At the time the exhibit was filed, counsel for Ms. Skaer intended for the exhibit to be filed under seal, and, indeed, believed the exhibit had been filed under seal," Kramer wrote. "Counsel continued in this belief until the afternoon of Feb. 16, 2007, at which time the court clerk notified all parties that the exhibit had not been filed under seal and was publicly available."

The Mercury executives -- represented by Orrick; Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati; Shearman & Sterling; and Farella Braun & Martel -- have been fighting vigorously against The Recorder, the San Francisco Chronicle and Bloomberg to keep the complaint confidential. The executives succeeded in January in getting the derivative action dismissed for lack of standing, but shortly thereafter Santa Clara County, Calif., Judge James Kleinberg ordered that the complaint be unsealed nevertheless.

The Mercury executives last week obtained an emergency stay from the 6th District Court of Appeal. Orrick also asked U.S. District Judge Jeremy Fogel to block Judge Kleinberg's order unsealing the motion.

On Tuesday, Kleinberg resealed the complaint, but only after it had been published by the Journal. He noted that it apparently had been "present and unsealed" among the 25 volumes of files held by the clerk's office for the past four months.

The complaint alleges that four former Mercury executives "grossly enriched themselves at the expense of Mercury by granting themselves (and their colleagues) millions of underpriced options to purchase Mercury stock."

DOJ_NMG_0134799

The complaint, by Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins partner Amber Eck, alleges that Skaer, Smith, former CFO Sharlene Abrams and former COO Kenneth Klein caused the company "to improperly pay out $164 million to themselves in unwarranted stock-option based compensation." The complaint states that $54 million of that $164 million is directly attributable to backdating.

It also states that Mercury spent $70 million in attorney fees investigating its stock option backdating problem.

COVER-UP ALLEGED

Mercury was one of the first companies to publicly admit problems with its options grants. The company was forced to restate earnings by $570 million following an internal investigation. Its board of directors took the rare step of joining plaintiff lawyers in a shareholder suit seeking damages from ousted executives. That changed after Hewlett-Packard Co. announced it had acquired the company last year.

The complaint accuses all four former executives of acting improperly. As for former GC Skaer, it alleges that she "created and falsified documents regarding the backdated options, personally selected backdating dates based on stock price, took minutes in the board and committee meetings where backdating was discussed, and was involved in covering up the backdating."

In one instance, Skaer was granted 25,000 options and Smith got 400,000 at a Feb. 12, 2002, board meeting. The options were backdated to Nov. 2, 2001, when the stock was trading some $12 lower. "This difference ... equates to a $4.8 million benefit to Smith, and a $303,500 benefit for Skaer," the complaint alleges.

Smith had begun lobbying for a low strike price in October 2001, when he sent an e-mail to CEO Landon with a blind copy to Klein, stating, "[A]ssume a $25 strike for new options (could we go back to the lows??). ..." The board voted to grant Smith his 400,000 options on Nov. 6, 2001, but put off pricing the grant because by then the company's stock was trading above the price Smith had suggested, according to the complaint.

"What do you want to do about Doug's option since the price is going up," Skaer e-mailed CEO Landon on Nov. 14. "Keep waiting?" The next month, Smith himself sent Skaer an e-mail proposing various dates that could be chosen, according to the complaint.

On Jan. 11, 2002, Landon e-mailed the compensation committee members, with a "cc" to Skaer, asking them to fax their "unanimous written consent" for the option grants to Skaer. The consent forms were dated Nov. 5, 2001, according to the complaint. The committee members faxed the forms to Skaer's office, but either Skaer or "someone at her direction" altered the forms by whiting out the Jan. 20, 2002, fax dates at the top of the pages, according to the complaint.

"Skaer's intentional deception is revealed, however, by the fact that, because one of the [consent forms] was apparently sent upside down, the actual fax date is listed on the bottom of the document -- a detail that Skaer overlooked and thus did not alter as planned."

At the actual Feb. 12 board meeting -- which Abrams, Klein, Smith and Skaer all attended -- the compensation committee members backed up the date by another three days, to Nov. 2, 2001, which locked in an additional $2.50 per share gain for Smith and Skaer, according to the complaint.

When Smith filed his so-called Form 5 listing the grant, he listed the previously agreed date of Nov. 5. In 2003, a legal assistant noticed the discrepancy and proposed filing an amended Form 5. But Skaer told him not to because the amount was "de minimus," the complaint alleges -- even though the difference was worth more than $1 million.

The complaint also quotes several other e-mails that seem to suggest knowledge of backdating. Payroll manager Susie Fregoso e-mailed Abrams on May 5, 1999, "[W]hat is the date for the April grant going to be? Right now I have it as April 7 with a price of $27.125. You had mentioned that this might change, any news?"

In an Aug. 3, 2000, e-mail to Fregoso about an employee's stock options that had already been granted, Assistant Controller Kathy Hawkes wrote, "I betcha that Sharlene [Abrams] will overrule these type of things ... and we will use her magic backdating ink. Let's see what happens!"

And another e-mail from Fregoso stated, "The reason the paperwork was not sent out is because the stock price drop made us change the grant date so that you could get the lower price. The 'new' grant is being approved next week by Sharlene[Abrams]/Amnon [Landon]. I know it has been a while, but believe me, you will be happier with the new price." The sentence concluded with a smiley face.

Fannie Won't Pay $44.4 Million In Bonuses (WSJ)

By James R. Hagerty And Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Fannie Mae, struggling to atone for a $6.3 billion accounting scandal, announced that it won't pay $44.4 million of shares in the company previously promised as bonuses to 46 current and former executives. The giant provider of funding for U.S. home mortgages said it will "take into income" that amount, previously expensed for unpaid share awards that were based on earnings growth that proved illusory.

In December, Fannie restated earnings for 2002 through mid-2004, reducing retained earnings by $6.3 billion, to correct dozens of violations of accounting rules. Some of those accounting violations helped maximize bonuses for executives, regulators have found.

The decision will cancel planned payments totaling about $11.4 million for former Chief Executive Officer Franklin D. Raines; $4.1 million for the current CEO, Daniel Mudd; and $3.4 million for a former chief financial officer, Timothy Howard, a spokesman said. The values are based on yesterday's closing price of $59.88 for Fannie Mae shares in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. Among other current senior executives, Robert Levin, chief business officer, will miss out on about $2 million of shares; Michael Williams, chief operating officer, $1.9 million; and Peter Niculescu, executive vice president, $600,000. The planned awards were for incentive-pay cycles that ended in 2003 and 2004.

The company also announced that it will eliminate a series of perquisites for executives, including free financial counseling, travel and country-club memberships. Fannie also is ending "gross-up" increases in compensation to cover taxes due on insurance provided by the company for officers.

Companies rarely take back money already paid to executives for results that prove to have been exaggerated. Partly because of the legal difficulties, most boards don't even try to recover the money, and those that do often face years of litigation. But some executives have repaid parts of their past compensation. For example, in 1998, then-CEO Lawrence Coss returned roughly a third of his $102 million 1996 bonus to Green Tree Financial Corp., now part of Conseco Inc., after a restatement wiped out $174 million of pretax profit on which the bonus was based.

Fannie may avoid some complications by withholding money that hasn't yet been doled out rather than clawing back sums already paid, but former executives could contest the decision. A lawyer for Mr. Raines declined to comment; a spokesman for Mr. Howard couldn't be reached immediately. Fannie's regulator, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight, or Ofheo, said it approved the decision to withhold the payments. Ofheo last year ordered Fannie to review compensation to top executives for the years in which Fannie violated accounting rules.

Mr. Mudd, a former General Electric Co. executive who joined Fannie in early 2000 as vice chairman and chief operating officer, received total compensation for 2000 through 2003 of $26.3 million. He became chief executive in December 2004 when the accounting scandal forced his predecessor, Mr. Raines, to resign. Mr. Mudd didn't receive a bonus for 2004, and his pay has been well below that of Mr. Raines since then. For 2006, Mr. Mudd received total compensation of about $14.4 million, up about 25% from a year earlier. That raise prompted an angry letter to Ofheo several weeks ago from four Republican U.S. senators -- Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, John Sununu of New Hampshire, Elizabeth Dole of North Carolina and Mel Martinez of Florida.

"We would like to know why Ofheo approved this 25% raise at a time when Fannie has paid almost $1.4 billion in accounting and consulting fees to clean up their financial mess and they are still two years behind on their financial reporting," the senators wrote. Congress is debating legislation that would tighten regulation of Fannie and its rival Freddie Mac.

Write to James R. Hagerty at bob.hagerty@wsj.com3 and Damian Paletta at damian.paletta@dowjones.com4

Fannie Cancels Executive Bonuses (WP)

By David S. Hilzenrath

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Fannie Mae's board has decided not to give out executive bonuses potentially worth $44.4 million for some of the years when the federally chartered housing finance company's earnings were misstated.

The stock awards had been on hold since early 2005 after the company was caught up in an accounting scandal. They could have totaled $11.2 million for Franklin D. Raines, former chairman and chief executive; $3.4 million for J. Timothy Howard, former finance chief; $1.1 million for Jamie S. Gorelick, a former vice chairman; and $4 million for Raines's successor as chief executive, Daniel H. Mudd, company spokesman Brian Faith said.

A total of 46 current and former executives were affected.

Under a long-term incentive plan, the payouts had been pegged to the company achieving a combination of financial and other goals. The District company recently corrected years of past financial results, acknowledging that it had overstated profits by $6.3 billion.

It was unclear how much money the executives could have received based on the restated results, and spokesmen for the company declined to say.

The awards, known as "performance shares," were one component of overall pay packages that typically included salaries, cash bonuses, stock options and other forms of compensation. The stock awards were granted on a rolling schedule, based on the company's performance over various three-year periods.

For instance, executives had already received the first installment of awards for a cycle covering 2001 through 2003, and the board is not trying to reclaim that money, spokesman Chuck Greener said. Those awards were worth $4.1 million to Raines, $1.4 million to Howard and $1.8 million to Mudd.

The board "determined not to pay" the second installment for that cycle and "determined that no award was due" with respect to a three-year cycle ending Dec. 31, 2004, Fannie Mae said in a report filed yesterday with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Regulators have alleged that Fannie Mae's senior management intentionally manipulated the company's accounting to hit earnings targets and maximize bonuses. Raines's pay totaled more than $90 million from 1998 through 2003, the Office of Federal Housing Enterprise Oversight said last year.

The agency has filed administrative charges against Raines, Howard and former controller Leanne G. Spencer, seeking to recoup more than $115 million of compensation plus penalties that could exceed $100 million.

The three former executives are contesting the charges.

Attorneys for Raines and Howard did not respond to requests for comment on Fannie Mae's announcement, which came after the markets closed yesterday.

OFHEO said it concurred with the board's decision not to issue the stock awards.

The action "was not directed at any specific individual but rather reflected the performance of Fannie Mae in the years 2001-2004," the regulatory agency said in a news release.

In addition to denying the bonuses, the board recommended "other actions regarding current employees" and the company "has undertaken disciplinary and remedial steps," the agency said. Neither the company nor the agency would elaborate on those other developments.

"With these actions OFHEO considers the board's required review of current officers and employees complete," the agency said.

Fannie Mae also announced that it was eliminating certain executive perquisites, such as company-owned country club memberships and payments for personal financial counseling, which help executives manage their money. In the future, executives would also be required to reimburse the company for personal use of corporate transportation, such as aircraft.

In 2003, Raines's compensation included $37,548 for tax counseling and financial planning services and $196,852 for personal use of company transportation, according to a Fannie Mae report. Mudd's compensation included $80,400 in club membership fees.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jury To Deliberate In CIA Leak Case (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo

AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Five weeks and 19 witnesses into the CIA leak trial, jurors are set to begin deciding the fate of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby.

Jurors heard a full day of closing arguments in Libby's perjury and obstruction trial Tuesday and are scheduled to begin deliberating Wednesday.

U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton said he planned to instruct the jury about legal issues Wednesday morning before sending them off to deliberate.

Libby, the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, is charged with lying and obstructing the investigation into the 2003 leak of CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity. He faces up to 30 years in prison if convicted, though he'd likely get far less under federal sentencing guidelines.

Plame is married to former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, who emerged in mid-2003 as an outspoken critic of the Bush administration's case for the Iraq war. Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald says Libby learned about Plame from Cheney and other officials in June 2003 and relayed it to reporters.

Attorneys left jurors with two very different impressions of the case. Prosecutors described a methodical effort by Libby to conceal the fact that he discussed Plame with reporters in June 2003. Defense attorneys recounted a confusing, sometimes contradictory month of testimony that they believe is too shaky to base a conviction on.

Plame was outed by reporter Robert Novak, who touched off an FBI investigation with a July 2003 syndicated column. Though Libby wasn't Novak's source, prosecutors say he feared he'd be charged with discussing classified information with other reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0134802

So, prosecutors say, Libby lied. He told investigators he learned about Plame from Cheney, then forgot about it until a month later, when he was surprised to hear it during a phone call with NBC's Tim Russert. Russert says the conversation about Plame didn't happen.

"It's simply not credible to believe he would forget this information about Wilson's wife," prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg said during closing arguments Tuesday. "It's ludicrous."

Libby's attorneys say it's the prosecution's story that doesn't make sense. Why, they ask, would Libby make up a story that hinges on Russert, someone Libby knew could be questioned?

And while prosecutors have shown that Plame came up in several conversations with government officials in mid-2003, defense attorneys say there's no proof Libby deliberately set out to lie when he spoke to investigators three months later.

"They haven't given you anything that says Mr. Libby didn't just have one of those moments that we all have in life where he thought something happened one way and it happened another," said defense attorney Theodore Wells.

Prosecutors used opening statements to remind jurors that one witness after another testified to discussing Plame with Libby. Zeidenberg pointed to a flow chart showing arrows tracking information from several officials to Libby and on to other sources. With each conversation, it became less likely the CIA operative would just slip Libby's mind, Zeidenberg said.

Wells presented a similar chart. Under each name and photograph, however, Wells noted their memory inconsistencies. Some changed their stories. Others seemed less certain in FBI interviews than they did on the stand.

Why is Mr. Libby being treated differently?" Wells told jurors. "He should not. Treat him fairly. Ask yourself: 'Did the government give me some evidence that he intentionally lied as opposed to, did he just forget?'"

Jurors To Begin Deliberations Today In Libby Perjury Trial (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Jurors shouldn't vent their anger over the war in Iraq on former vice presidential aide Lewis "Scooter" Libby, his defense attorney said Tuesday as Libby's perjury and obstruction trial neared completion.

"Don't … sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or about the Bush administration," a tearful Theodore Wells, Libby's chief defense attorney, told jurors during closing arguments.

If during deliberations a juror says, " 'He's a Republican, he works for Cheney, let's do him,' " that juror must be discouraged, Wells said.

Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald argued Tuesday that the Bush administration's attempts to discredit an Iraq war critic, and Libby's role in it, are at the heart of the case against Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff. "There's a cloud over the White House as to what happened here," Fitzgerald said. "Don't you think the American people deserve to know?"

Jurors will begin deliberating Libby's fate after instructions from federal Judge Reggie Walton today.

Libby, 56, is charged with lying when he told investigators and later grand jurors in 2003 and 2004 how he learned that Valerie Plame, wife of administration critic Joseph Wilson, worked at the CIA. Libby said he learned the information from Cheney, forgot, then heard it a month later from NBC newsman Tim Russert.

Russert testified in Libby's trial and to the grand jury that he didn't tell Libby about Plame.

Libby also faces charges of perjury and obstruction of justice based on a conversation about Plame with Matthew Cooper, then a Time magazine Washington correspondent.

In summations that lasted 6½ hours, the two sides presented starkly contrasting views of Libby and the case against him.

Only the shaky memories of two reporters with credibility problems held together the case against Libby, Wells said.

"It's what I mean by 'he said, she said,' " Wells said. "They want you to make a choice beyond a reasonable doubt that (would leave) my client's life destroyed."

Fitzgerald countered that Libby concocted the Russert story and lied about his conversation with Cooper to sidetrack an investigation into who leaked Plame's identity to reporters.

In February 2002, the CIA sent Wilson, a former ambassador, to investigate reports that Iraq was trying to buy uranium from the African nation of Niger.

No one was indicted for leaking information about Wilson's wife despite an investigation that lasted over two years.

Libby, Fitzgerald said, feared being fired or prosecuted for leaking confidential information. By sourcing the story back to reporters, he said, Libby believed his role would remain secret.

"He made a gamble that he's going to tell them a story about the rumors and hope it goes away," Fitzgerald said. "He threw sand in eyes of the FBI and grand jurors, he obstructed justice and he stole the truth from the judicial system."

The prosecution used a large interactive screen to rebut Libby's version of events. Peter Zeidenberg, a Fitzgerald assistant, posted in succession the names of eight people who spoke with Libby about Plame between June 11, 2003, and about July 10, when Libby said Russert told him about Plame.

"Ladies and gentlemen, that's not forgetting," Zeidenberg said. "That's lying."

Wells directed jurors away from those witnesses, whom he called "background evidence." Jurors must focus, he said, on the Russert and Cooper conversations at the core of the charges.

"This is just about different recollections of conversations with different reporters," Wells said.

It's "crazy," Wells said, to believe Libby invented that Russert told him about Plame. Libby, he said, didn't know Russert and believed investigators would likely call the newsman to verify the account. Russert's network, NBC, was hostile to the White House, Wells argued.

Libby's Memory Is At The Heart Of The Case (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt And Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

At I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial, his lawyers have argued that pressing matters of state prevented the former vice presidential chief of staff from accurately recalling events. But the question of Libby's guilt or innocence, which is expected to be in the hands of a federal jury today, may turn more on what he says he remembered, rather than what he says he forgot.

Again and again, meeting with the FBI and appearing before a grand jury, Libby recalled details of conversations with Vice President Dick Cheney and other administration officials. But when it came to discussions he had about the core issue in this case — his involvement in disclosing the identity of a CIA officer married to an administration war critic — he frequently drew a blank.

In closing arguments Tuesday, the government asserted that there was nothing wrong with Libby's memory: His repeated lies, the prosecution argued, were part of a calculated cover-up.

"Ask yourself if that pattern is just a convenient way of avoiding the truth," prosecutor Peter R. Zeidenberg said of versions of meetings that Libby recalled for investigators. Libby had "a great memory" when it came to remembering self-serving facts, the prosecutor said derisively.

Defense arguments

Defense lawyers strenuously rejected that characterization in their closing statements, attempting to shift the focus from Libby to prosecution witnesses — principally three journalists — whom they portrayed as the ones who were not credible and had memory problems.

Libby's lawyers contended that their client had no motive to mislead anyone and that it made no sense for him to lie — an action they said would jeopardize a long and distinguished career of government service.

"Scooter Libby's innocent. He didn't do anything. He didn't leak anything," said his lead attorney, Theodore V. Wells Jr. "Think about the madness of this prosecution."

The pleas ended a month of testimony and argument in a case whose backdrop was the march to war in Iraq and accusations that the administration had twisted prewar intelligence.

The defense has sought to portray Libby as a sympathetic figure who, on the orders of his boss, Cheney, got caught up in a "meat grinder" of dealing with reporters that left him fearing that White House political operatives were conspiring to "scapegoat" him.

Prosecution's side

The government has claimed that Libby's actions were driven by another sort of fear — realizing that he might have disclosed classified information about a CIA officer, Valerie Plame, whose husband had publicly criticized the way intelligence was used to justify invading Iraq. As a result, the prosecution argued, Libby chose to make up a story to cover his tracks.

Zeidenberg told the jury that the defense had failed to offer a shred of evidence to support the conspiracy theory. He said the testimony of a string of nine government witnesses proved that Libby was not credible.

"That's not a matter of 'misremembering' or 'forgetting,' " he said. "It's lying."

Defense lawyer William H. Jeffress Jr. responded that Libby did not behave like an ordinary criminal and had even produced notes, which proved helpful to the government, that "he would have ditched … if he was that kind of person."

Jeffress added that it made no sense for Libby to make up his central defense — that he learned about Plame from NBC's "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert — because Russert was "the world's most famous television newsman" who was bound to be questioned by investigators.

In their closing statements, both sides acknowledged the broad political issues underlying the case.

Wells pleaded with jurors not to allow their personal opinions of an unpopular war to affect their verdict.

DOJ_NMG_0134804

"Don't in this case sacrifice Scooter Libby for how you may feel about the war in Iraq or how you may feel about the Bush administration," Wells said. "You give him a fair shake…. This is a man with a wife and two children."

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald argued that Cheney's office was behind many of the prewar claims that Iraq had stockpiles of banned weapons and that it had aggressively sought to silence critics. "Let's talk straight," he said. "There is a cloud over the vice president."

Single page

In Closing Pleas, Clashing Views On Libby's Role (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Defense lawyers and prosecutors in the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr. made their final summations on Tuesday, offering the jury two starkly different ways to evaluate the evidence presented over the last few weeks.

In their closing statements, the prosecutors presented a detailed and businesslike summing up of their case that Mr. Libby willfully lied to both a grand jury and F.B.I. agents investigating the leak in the summer of 2003 of the identity of a C.I.A. operative, Valerie Wilson.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., Mr. Libby's chief defense lawyer, countered with an intensely emotional defense ending in a choked sob. He argued that Mr. Libby's testimony to the grand jury and his interviews with the Federal Bureau of Investigation may have contained inaccuracies but that they were the result of innocent memory lapses explained by his pressing schedule of national security issues.

Unlike the prosecutors, Mr. Wells stalked about the courtroom during his summation, his cadence and pitch varying, but his tone of outrage constant.

"If it turned out that what he said was wrong that doesn't mean he is a liar," Mr. Wells told the jury. "It means he may have misrecollected what happened."

Mr. Libby, who faces five felony counts, was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff in the summer of 2003 when Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed publicly. The jury is expected to begin its deliberations on Wednesday, after final instructions from Judge Reggie B. Walton.

In his closing argument, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, the chief prosecutor, said that disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity was used by the White House to discredit her husband's assertions that the Bush administration had distorted intelligence to justify invading Iraq. He said the disclosure of her name cast a cloud over the Bush White House in general and over Mr. Cheney in particular.

But Mr. Wells argued for the defense that when Ms. Wilson's name was first disclosed in the summer of 2003, Mr. Libby had been so preoccupied with growing questions about the inability of United States forces in Iraq to find any unconventional weapons, a principal justification for going to war, that he did not have time to pay attention to the issue of Ms. Wilson.

"The wheels are falling off the Bush administration," Mr. Wells said. "Thousands of young kids are on the ground there. It's a crazy period."

"This is a man with a wife and two children; he is a good person," Mr. Wells told the jury in his final words. "He's been under my protection for the last month. I give him to you. Give him back to me."

With that, Mr. Wells teared up, sobbed audibly and sat down.

Mr. Fitzgerald and Peter Zeidenberg, another prosecutor, told the jury that Mr. Libby learned about Ms. Wilson's role as a Central Intelligence Agency employee from several of his fellow Bush administration officials. He then discussed her with reporters, they said, as part of an effort to discredit the claims made by her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, that the administration had twisted intelligence about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium from Africa to justify going to war.

"Mr. Libby had a motive to lie and the motive matches up exactly with the lie he told," Mr. Fitzgerald told the jury. "He made up a story and stuck to it."

Ms. Wilson's identity was first disclosed in a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak. Only days before, The New York Times had published an Op-Ed article by her husband recounting how he had been sent to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq was trying to buy uranium for its weapons program. He asserted that there was no truth to President Bush's claim in the January 2003 State of the Union address that there was evidence of Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Africa.

Mr. Novak wrote that Mr. Wilson was chosen for the Africa mission by the C.I.A. at the suggestion of his wife. That assertion, echoed by other critics of Mr. Wilson, tended to diminish the importance of his trip, with its suggestion of nepotism.

Mr. Fitzgerald seemed for the first time to lend his weight publicly to the assertion by critics that Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed to punish Mr. Wilson and undermine his credibility.

Mr. Fitzgerald said the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's identity had left "a cloud over the White House over what happened" as well as a cloud over Mr. Cheney because he had been behind the effort to counter Mr. Wilson's charges.

Neither Mr. Libby nor anyone else was charged with unlawfully disclosing Ms. Wilson's identity. But Mr. Libby was charged with misleading the grand jury and investigators.

"Don't you think the American people are entitled to a straight answer?" Mr. Fitzgerald asked of the jury. He said that "a critic points fingers at the White House and as a result his wife gets dragged into the newspapers."

He said Mr. Libby "made a gamble, he threw sand in the eyes of the grand jury" rather than tell the truth and risk being prosecuted for leaking her name.

Mr. Zeidenberg began the day for the prosecution by telling the jury that the parade of witnesses the government had presented demolished the contention of Mr. Libby's lawyers that he merely had a bad memory and forgot a whole series of conversations he had about Ms. Wilson.

"He claims he forgot nine conversations with eight people over a four-week period," Mr. Zeidenberg said. He was referring to a former spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, a senior State Department official and two C.I.A. officials, all of whom testified that they had informed Mr. Libby in early July 2003 of Ms. Wilson's role at the agency and three reporters who spoke to Mr. Libby in that period. Mr. Zeidenberg then noted that Mr. Libby had sworn under oath that those people must have been wrong because he learned of Ms. Wilson's identity days later on July 10 or 11 from Tim Russert of NBC News.

Both sides agreed that Mr. Russert's testimony was crucial to the case.

Mr. Wells's response to the prosecution's claim of an avalanche of testimony from so many people was to try to convince the jury that only two of the witnesses counted in the indictment, Mr. Cooper and Mr. Russert.

Mr. Wells set about disparaging Mr. Russert's credibility and memory. "In a case where what is at stake is a man's freedom and reputation, you have to in this situation give the benefit of the doubt to Mr. Libby," Mr. Wells said.

Mr. Wells argued that Mr. Libby held one of the world's most high-stress jobs and was trying to prevent another attack like the ones on Sept. 11, 2001. "He was bombarded with a blizzard of information," Mr. Wells said, noting the intelligence briefings Mr. Libby received daily. "Those briefings would make your toes curl," he said.

Mr. Fitzgerald countered that Mr. Russert's testimony was not needed to convict Mr. Libby. "If Tim Russert were run over by a bus and had gone to the great news desk in the sky, you can still find plenty of evidence that the defendant lied," he said.

Scooter Jury Hears Of 'memory Lapse' (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

The trial of Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice-president's former chief of staff, closed on Tuesday with prosecutors accusing him of concocting a "ludicrous" story about how he learned the name of a CIA agent, while the defence called it "madness" to convict him on the basis of a witness "suffering public memory lapses".

Making closing arguments in the month-long perjury and obstruction of justice trial, which could see Mr Libby face up to 30 years in prison, the lawyers offered competing narratives to explain how and when Mr Libby discovered the identity of Valerie Plame, the wife of ambassador Joe Wilson who had emerged as a leading critic of the Iraq war.

Peter Zeidenberg, a prosecution lawyer, argued that Mr Libby had a clear motive to lie to protect his job and Vice-President Dick Cheney from whom he first learned the name of Ms Plame on June 11 2003.

He set out nine separate conversations during June and early July 2003 in which Mr Libby discussed Ms Plame with reporters and administration officials. "Is it conceivable that all those nine witnesses make the same error in their memory?" he asked. "This is a case of lying, not conspiracy."

The defence yesterday portrayed Mr Libby as so preoccupied with national security issues in his 14-hour work day that he merely forgot details about Ms Plame. They argue the case boiled down to the credibility of two men: Mr Libby and Tim Russert, an NBC talk show host and one of the most respected Washington journalists.

Mr Libby argued that he learned about Ms Plame from him and was "taken aback" to hear it during a conversation they had on or about July 10. Mr Russert, however, unequivocally denied that while giving evidence during the trial.

Theodore Wells, the main defence lawyer, sought to undermine the credibility of the prosecution witnesses in an effort to make the case as much about the media's ability to recall events accurately as his client's memory lapses.

"Mr Russert has memory problems," he said. "Do not convict Scooter Libby on the word of someone who is suffering public memory lapses."

The jury is due to begin its deliberations on Wednesday.

Libby 'Told A Dumb Lie,' Prosecutor Says In Closing Argument (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig And Amy Goldstein

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134806

Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff lied to investigators about his role in leaking a CIA officer's identity in order to keep his job and protect the White House from political embarrassment, prosecutors told jurors yesterday in the closing arguments of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby's perjury trial.

Pointing to a courtroom screen showing eight witnesses who contradicted Libby, Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald said it was no coincidence that Bush administration colleagues and reporters recalled Libby as intensely focused on undercover CIA officer Valerie Plame early in the summer of 2003, as her husband was publicly challenging the White House's rationale for going to war in Iraq.

"This is something important, something he was focused on, something he was angry about," Fitzgerald said. "He had a motive to lie, and . . . he stole the truth from the justice system."

Libby "told a dumb lie and got caught" when leak investigators refused to go away, Fitzgerald said. He added that Libby's lies had "left a cloud over the vice president" because Cheney's role in the leak remained unclear.

But two defense attorneys argued that Libby was a harried and hardworking public servant who was guilty only of forgetfulness about a relatively insignificant matter given his pressure-cooker job.

In impassioned, and at times disjointed arguments, the defense lawyers drew attention to numerous witnesses who had faulty or questionable memories and conflicting recollections. They said it was unfair to assume that the witnesses had made honest mistakes but that Libby's untruths were deliberate.

"If you're not sure, that's not guilty," said attorney Theodore Wells Jr. "It's impossible to say with any degree of certainty that Mr. Libby is engaged in intentional lying."

Libby is charged with five felonies: two counts of lying to FBI agents, two counts of perjuring himself in grand jury testimony and one count of obstructing the federal probe into whether Bush administration officials illegally leaked classified information by disclosing Plame's identity to reporters.

They say Libby lied when he told investigators he learned about Plame from NBC's Tim Russert and passed it along as unconfirmed gossip.

Libby has pleaded not guilty, contending he inaccurately remembered conversations that he recounted to FBI agents and a grand jury. No one is charged with the leak itself.

The 12-member jury will receive instructions from presiding U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton early today about how to weigh the high-profile case against Libby. Jurors are expected to begin deliberations before noon.

Plame is married to former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, whose accusations in 2003 that the Bush administration twisted intelligence to justify the war with Iraq set in motion events leading to the leak of his wife's name in a syndicated column by Robert Novak. Wilson's claims infuriated Cheney and others in the White House, and Cheney deputized Libby to contact reporters and rebut Wilson's claims.

Wilson turned out to be a potent critic. He had been sent to Niger by the CIA a year earlier to check on reports that Iraq had tried to obtain material for nuclear weapons there, and concluded that the reports were false. Within days of Wilson going public about his findings in July 2003 , the White House acknowledged that President Bush's State of the Union address should not have included the assertion that Iraq was trying to purchase uranium.

Fitzgerald told the jury yesterday that Libby was engaged in a campaign to make reporters skeptical of Wilson. His wife's post at the CIA and her role in suggesting him for the mission became a useful tool to insinuate that he wasn't qualified for the mission to Niger. The prosecutor disputed the defense's argument that Libby did not remember Plame because she was so trivial to him.

"To [Libby] she wasn't Valerie Wilson, she's wasn't a person," the prosecutor said, sipping from a plastic cup of water as he walked back and forth in front of the jury box. "She was an argument, a fact to use against Joe Wilson."

Prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg, summing up the government's evidence, said Libby "absolutely fabricates two conversations that never happened" -- with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper and NBC's Russert. He said Libby's claim that he didn't remember the conversations was "just not credible" because Cheney considered the matter very important and it commanded much of Libby's time.

Zeidenberg also said Libby had several motives to lie. The president had said he would fire whoever had disclosed Plame's identity, a criminal investigation had begun, and, at Libby's urging, Cheney had personally vouched for Libby, getting the White House to say publicly that Libby was not the leaker.

In the defense's closing argument, Wells countered that the case was simply "he said, she said." He contended that it was "madness" to try to convict Libby of a crime based on his foggy memory about fragments of conversations that were the subject of FBI questions three and four months after they took place.

"It's a case about different recollections between Mr. Libby and some reporters," Wells said. "This is an important trial, and I represent an innocent man."

DOJ_NMG_0134807

Wells said that Libby honestly believed he learned about Plame for the first time from Russert in a July 10, 2003, conversation -- a month after he was actually told about her by the vice president, Libby later acknowledged. Wells emphasized to the jury that Russert first told the FBI that he couldn't completely rule out discussing the subject with Libby because he talks to so many people.

"That's reasonable doubt right there," Wells said of an FBI agent's notes. "If you say, 'I believe Mr. Russert beyond a reasonable doubt,' my client's life would be destroyed. His reputation would be destroyed."

Defense attorney William Jeffress Jr. reminded the jury of the pointed questioning that Libby endured when Fitzgerald asked Libby several different ways about nearly every conversation he had in a two-month period in 2003.

"It's not easy being in a grand jury. And Mr. Libby was there for eight hours," Jeffress said. "If he got something wrong in eight hours of questioning, that wasn't an intentional lie. Which witness came in here that didn't get something wrong?"

Jeffress highlighted the conflict between testimony of former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, who said he had not told Washington Post reporter Walter Pincus about Plame, and Pincus's account, in which Fleischer was his source for that information. Jeffress said there were a lot of possible explanations, including that Fleischer lied.

"Of course, possibilities don't cut it in a criminal case," Jeffress said.

The Defense Rests, And Not A Minute Too Soon (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

For a brief moment yesterday, Scooter Libby was not a former White House aide on trial for perjury. He was an orphan in need of a loving home.

"He's been under my protection for the last month; now I'm entrusting him to you," defense lawyer Ted Wells told the puzzled jurors.

His voice breaking, the $700-an-hour lawyer pleaded: "Give him back! Give him back to me!"

Wells sobbed loudly and went back to his chair, where he sat staring at the floor and emitting the occasional sniffle.

Exactly what Wells was trying to achieve with this outburst -- if he intended it at all -- was a mystery. And that made it an appropriate coda for the defense's closing argument in the CIA leak case yesterday. Wells, who has successfully defended the likes of Robert Torricelli and Mike Espy, may yet win an acquittal from the jury, which will start deliberations today. But it won't be because of the cohesion of his closing arguments. Libby was alternately portrayed as a man who told the truth, a man who inadvertently misspoke, and the victim of conspiracies involving everybody from President Bush to Tim Russert.

Wells's shots rang out from every direction.

On his client: "He's not stupid, man."

On the prosecutors: "Think about the madness!"

On his opening argument: "Maybe I was drunk or something."

On prosecution witness Judith Miller: "Ms. Miller's gone. Boom!"

On Bush's chief strategist: "Karl Rove lied!"

On Bush's press secretary: "Gimme a break.' "

What he lacked in focus, Wells made up for in folksiness. He used words such as "skullduggery" and said White House intelligence briefings "make your toes curl." He credited his partner with "a Perry Mason moment in the courtroom" and informed the jury: "I'm gonna give you a homework assignment."

Wells returned repeatedly to a note written by Vice President Cheney expressing concern that Libby was being sacrificed to protect others. "Ted Wells didn't write that!" he exclaimed. Making a crawling motion, he elaborated: "I didn't crawl into the White House, get into a time machine and go back and forge the vice president's handwriting."

At times, Wells asserted that his client told the truth. "I represent an innocent person," he told the jury. "He didn't leak to anybody!" At other times, he portrayed Libby as benignly befuddled. "No question he's gotten some things wrong in the grand jury, no question about it," he granted. "It may turn out that Mr. Libby is totally confused." Or maybe he was tricked by prosecutors, who were "beatin' on him in the grand jury." Reasoned Wells: "Libby should not be penalized for having a different memory system from the investigators."

Of course, one man's "different memory system" is another man's perjury. And that's why Wells had a series of slides to accompany his argument with titles that read like political attack ads: "Serious questions have been raised about Russert's credibility. . . . No 'Smoking Gun' Documents. . . . Memory problems were common in this trial."

Some of the memory problems, as it happens, were Wells's. Just minutes into his argument yesterday, he confused Libby's grand jury testimony with his answers to the FBI; he quickly corrected himself. Earlier in the trial, Wells twice confused Steve Hadley, now Bush's national security adviser, with former CIA spokesman Bill Harlow. At another point, he absentmindedly read to the jurors from an exhibit of a newspaper article, neglecting to stop even as he pronounced "Copyright 2004, the New York Times." He resumed reading the article from the beginning before observing: "I read that already."

DOJ_NMG_0134808

After modest attendance throughout the Libby trial, yesterday's closing arguments were as packed as a JetBlue terminal; even the "overflow room" was overflowing with lawyers and journalists sitting on the floor. Peter Zeidenberg, leading off the closing arguments for the prosecution, delivered two hours of matter-of-fact chronology, detailing how Libby leaked the identity of a covert CIA operative and then said otherwise to the FBI and a grand jury.

Zeidenberg's low-key delivery only made Wells seem more flamboyant. Tall and mustachioed, Wells paced in front of the jurors, a vein in his neck protruding as he recited, indignantly, the various wrongs done his client.

"They were hanging him out to be a public scapegoat!" Wells said of Libby's colleagues in the White House. "Andy Card" -- Bush's chief of staff -- "blew him off!" Wells also held Cheney responsible: "The vice president of the United States had directed him to talk with Judith Miller." Nor did the defense stop there. "And President Bush was behind it, too," Wells argued.

Wells portrayed prosecution witness Russert, the NBC News Washington bureau chief, as the type of man who forgets where he parked his car. "Mr. Russert has memory problems," the lawyer told the jurors during a lengthy assault on Russert's gray matter.

The worst treatment, naturally, was reserved for the prosecutors, who were at least twice accused of "madness." Said Wells: "It's outrageous! Just outrageous! They haven't given you anything."

Wells had so thoroughly skewered his opponents that he lost track of time. Racing to finish before his allotted time expired, he skipped through slides with remarks such as "I got seven minutes here" and "Next slide!" and "Move!"

"Where am I on time?" he asked a colleague.

"You're over," came the answer.

"Yeah," Wells said, "but by how much?"

It was late in the afternoon when Wells finally finished the last of his slide show. He was practically breathless as he made his final tug at the jurors' heartstrings. "Give him a fair shake," he pleaded. "This is a man with a wife, two children." In the front row, Libby's wife, Harriet Grant, began to cry; after Wells uttered his closing sob, she gave a kiss on the cheek to Wells's mother, sitting in a wheelchair.

But Wells, overcome, was not so pleased. He returned to his chair, where he sat, staring at the floor, for 10 minutes. His colleagues kept their distance. Libby walked over to give his thanks, but the spent Wells, dispatching his client with a brief word, resumed his study of the courtroom floor.

Ted Wells, Center Of The Defense (WP)

By Linton Weeks, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Scooter Libby's Attorney Makes His Case for the Powerful

For most of the month-long trial, Ted Wells, Scooter Libby's high-priced attorney, had been all smiles. He laughed. He shared light moments with the judge, the jury and with his opponent, special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald. At one point Wells and Fitzgerald were so palsy-walsy, Judge Reggie B. Walton chastised them.

Yesterday, in his closing argument, he struck a much different note. Speaking to the jury, Wells said Libby "has been in my protection for the past month."

Now, he told them, he was turning Libby over to them.

Then, as he asked the jury to presume Libby's innocence and "give him back to me," Wells began to cry. He sat down at the defense table and wiped his eyes.

It was a strange moment in a strange case.

Before beginning his argument yesterday morning, he paced in front of the empty jury box. He stood in a corner --tall, athletic, mustachioed -- like a fighter imaging the bout to come. Under the outwardly gentle guise you could see an inner toughness of someone who will use any combination of punches to win big.

Family and friends came to watch him work. At one point he stopped to check on his 83-year-old mother, Phyllis, who sat in a wheelchair in the courtroom aisle.

There were moments when he seemed out of sync, checking on how much time he had left, hurrying through slides in his PowerPoint presentation.

At other times, he was impressive, trying to convince the jury that the prosecution was attempting to ruin Libby based on a few conversations with reporters. In charcoal suit, white shirt and red tie, he marched through pertinent evidence, occasionally lapsing into shtick.

DOJ_NMG_0134809

He said he didn't agree with the way the prosecution portrayed his opening argument. "Maybe I was drunk or something," he said, working the jury like a Jay Leno audience.

"Ted has a wonderful demeanor," says Stanley M. Brand, a Washington litigator who has worked with Wells. "He's a master tactician. He's a bulldog, but in a gentle way."

Brand considers Wells -- a native Washingtonian who is a partner in the New York-based firm of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison -- to be "one of the five best trial lawyers in the country."

Wells would not sit for an interview for this story. But through conversations and e-mails with friends, colleagues, his mother and others who know him well, a portrait emerges of a tough defense attorney who has mastered the balance between easygoing and hard-charging.

Often he stands up for the Big Guy, comforting the comfortable. When some political or corporate hotshot has been charged with white-collar wrongdoing, Wells is likely to come to the defense. He has championed the causes of ExxonMobil, Schering-Plough and Carnival cruise lines.

After all, somebody has got to do it.

He's had victories. He successfully represented Clinton administration agriculture secretary Mike Espy and former senator Robert Torricelli. In 1987, he represented Raymond J. Donovan, a former Reagan administration labor secretary, and others on fraud charges. When the prosecution rested, Wells did not put any defense witnesses on the stand, a minimalist maneuver for which he's famous. The jury announced 137 acquittals.

In 1999, Brand called Wells in as a fireman in the case of Clinton-Gore fundraiser Franklin Haney, who was in court on 42 counts of election law fraud. "Ted and I went to trial," says Brand. "Boom! Forty-two acquittals."

Wells has had failure, too. In 2001 he represented Mitsubishi in a criminal antitrust case. The company was accused of price-fixing. One reason he lost the case, he has said, is because a week before jury deliberations began, the movie "Pearl Harbor" came out.

Born in Washington in 1950, Theodore V. Wells Jr. grew up in a small rowhouse in Northwest. His mother -- known in the neighborhood as Ma Wells -- still lives there. "He was like an all-American boy," Phyllis Wells says of her son. "He didn't give me trouble."

She was a mailroom clerk at the Department of the Navy for 35 years. His father was a taxi driver with a sixth-grade education. When Wells was very young, his parents split. He was raised by his mother. He has a younger sister, Toni, who lives in the District, and several half-brothers and sisters from his father's other marriages.

"He did extremely well in school," his mother remembers. She says he kept track of his grades on a piece of paper and would make out his own report card before the official one was issued. Once in elementary school he received a grade he felt he didn't deserve. He went to the teacher, pointed out the error and she changed the grade. "He knew how to argue his case," Phyllis Wells says, "even back then."

At Coolidge High School, he was passionate about football. He played center. He was smart enough to help call the plays, recalls Wells's coach, Phillip Gainous, and was strong enough to protect the quarterback.

"He was a tough guy," Gainous says. "One time he broke his coccyx -- his tailbone. He didn't miss any games. We made a doughnut for him by cutting a hole in a piece of foam. We stuck it down his pants and sent him in. He played through the pain."

Gainous, now the principal at Blair High School, says that Wells was not an arguer. "But he would," Gainous says laughing, "debate with you."

At 6-feet-2 and 225 pounds, Wells was offered various college athletic scholarships. He chose Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass. After his first year, Wells quit the team to focus on academics.

About Wells "there was a kind of intensity I recognized early on," says Holy Cross classmate Edward P. Jones, a fellow Washingtonian who went on to win the 2004 Pulitzer Prize for Fiction.

As freshmen, Jones and Wells roomed in the same dorm. Jones remembers that one time he and Wells and several other students borrowed a car to go to New York to meet with law-school recruiters at Fordham University. The caffeine-fueled driver was sophomore and future Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas.

Wells graduated from college in 1972 and from Harvard University in 1976 with degrees in law and business. Along the way he married his high school sweetheart, Nina Mitchell. They were both 21. Today she is the secretary of state for New Jersey. They have two children: Teresa, 28, and Phillip, 26.

He worked for several New Jersey law firms over the years. He was national treasurer for Sen. Bill Bradley's presidential run in 2000. That same year became co-chair of the Paul Weiss litigation department.

He is proud of his longtime association with the NAACP Legal Defense and Education Fund. Last year, according to the National Law Journal, he helped defend desegregation education programs in two cases before the Supreme Court.

DOJ_NMG_0134810

He also prides himself on being one of the rare trial lawyers in the country with a national jury trial practice. Last year the National Law Journal named him Lawyer of the Year.

Longtime friend Vernon Jordan called Wells up on Super Bowl Sunday and asked him over to his house to eat some chili and watch the game. Wells thanked him but said he was too busy preparing for the Libby case. "He works very hard," Jordan says.

And as for Wells's demeanor, Jordan says, "you don't have to be an [expletive] to win cases."

Washington attorneys took the day off yesterday to watch his big-league matchup with Fitzgerald. Wells -- who didn't put Libby on the stand -- argued that his client is an innocent man with a bad memory. Fitzgerald said Libby lied under oath.

There in the middle of the courtroom, Wells was playing center again, helping call the plays and protecting the guy with the ball. Laughing in the beginning, crying in the end.

Justice Rebuffs Call For Berger Inquiry (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

The Justice Department says it is unaware of any new facts to support a call by the former chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee for a new investigation into the theft of National Archives documents by former National Security Adviser Samuel R. Berger.

Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling, in a letter Friday to the committee's new Democratic chairman, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California, said an "extensive investigation" led to a guilty plea by Mr. Berger in which he admitted removing the classified documents and the department "stands by its investigation."

"The department takes investigations regarding the mishandling of classified information and documents very seriously, and vigorously investigates and prosecutes those who endanger our national security," Mr. Hertling said.

His letter was in response to a report by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican and now the committee's ranking member, saying Justice gave Mr. Berger a "free pass" in its investigation and called for the committee to investigate the matter instead.

In a terse letter signed by 17 Republicans, Mr. Davis said the Justice Department was "unacceptably incurious" about Mr. Berger's visits to the Archives in May 2002 and July 2003 and never told the September 11 commission that he removed original, uninventoried documents. Mr. Davis also said the department failed to administer a polygraph examination, despite the test being part of a plea agreement Mr. Berger signed in exchange for a lesser sentence.

Mr. Berger, President Clinton's national security adviser from 1997 to 2001, pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material. He was fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years.

The material was removed while Mr. Berger was preparing to testify before the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States, which was investigating intelligence and security failures.

David Marin, the oversight committee's Republican staff director, said the Justice Department told the September 11 commission that it had everything Mr. Berger removed from the Archives and that the nation's national-security exposure was "zero."

But, he said, no one told the commission -- including September 11 commission Executive Director Philip Zelikow and General Counsel Dan Marcus -- that Mr. Berger had access to original documents, which he could have taken without detection.

"We wanted the highest possible level of assurance that Mr. Berger did not take other documents," Mr. Marin said. "We still have the same concerns. Obvious investigative tools were not used. If you do not look, you will obviously not find the evidence."

In his letter, Mr. Hertling said the Justice Department and the FBI devoted "significant resources" to the Berger probe, conducted more than 50 interviews, inspected the Archives facilities, and reviewed thousands of pages of documents. He also disputed the report's conclusion that the department did not inquire about Mr. Berger's first two visits to the Archives.

"Neither Mr. Berger nor any other witness provided the department with evidence that Mr. Berger had taken any documents beyond the five referenced in the plea agreement," he said.

Berger Case Still Roils Archives, Justice Dept. (WP)

By R. Jeffrey Smith, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

In a chandeliered room at the Justice Department, the longtime head of the counterespionage section, the chief of the public integrity unit, a deputy assistant attorney general, some trial lawyers and a few FBI agents all looked down at their pant legs and socks.

While waving his own leg in the air in illustration, Paul Brachfeld, inspector general of the National Archives and Records Administration, asked the group rhetorically if "something white" could be easily mistaken if it was wrapped around their legs, beneath their pant legs.

Under debate during the Nov. 23, 2004, meeting was Brachfeld's contention that President Clinton's former national security adviser Samuel R. "Sandy" Berger could have stolen original, uncatalogued, highly classified terrorism documents 14 months earlier by wrapping them around his socks and beneath his pants, as National Archives staff member John Laster reported witnessing.

Brachfeld said he was worried that during four visits in 2002 and 2003, Berger had the opportunity to remove more than the five documents he admitted taking. Brachfeld wanted the Justice Department to notify officials of the 9/11 Commission that Berger's actions -- in combination with a bungled Archives response -- might have obstructed the commission's review of Clinton's terrorism policies.

The Justice Department spurned the advice, and some of Brachfeld's colleagues at the Archives greeted his warnings with accusations of disloyalty. But more than three years later, as Brachfeld and House lawmakers have pushed new details about Berger's actions onto the public record -- such as Berger's use of a construction site near the Archives to temporarily hide some of the classified documents -- Brachfeld's contentions have attracted fresh support.

A report last month by the Republican staff of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee said for the first time that Berger's visits were so badly mishandled that Archives officials had acknowledged not knowing if he removed anything else and destroyed it. The committee further argued that the 9/11 Commission should have been told more about Berger and about Brachfeld's concerns, a suggestion that resonated with Philip Zelikow, the commission's former executive director.

Zelikow said in an interview last week that "I think all of my colleagues would have wanted to have all the information at the time that we learned from the congressional report, because that would have triggered some additional questions, including questions we could have posed to Berger under oath."

The commission's former general counsel, Dan Marcus, now an American University law professor, separately expressed surprise at how little the Justice Department told the commission about Berger and said it was "a little unnerving" to learn from the congressional report exactly what Berger reviewed at the Archives and what he admitted to the FBI -- including that he removed and cut up three copies of a classified memo.

"If he took papers out, these were unique records, and highly, highly classified. Had a document not been produced, who would have known?" Brachfeld said in an interview. "I thought [the 9/11 Commission] should know, in current time -- in judging Sandy Berger as a witness . . . that there was a risk they did not get the full production of records."

In an April 1, 2005, press conference and private statements to the commission, the Justice Department stated instead that Berger had access only to copied documents, not originals. They also said the sole documents Berger admitted taking -- five copies of a 2001 terrorism study -- were later provided to the commission.

Those assertions conflicted with a September 2004 statement to Brachfeld by Nancy Kegan Smith, who directs the Archives' presidential documents staff and let Berger view the documents in her office in violation of secrecy rules. Smith said "she would never know what if any original documents were missing," Brachfeld reported in an internal memo.

In a letter to House lawmakers last week, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard A. Hertling did not address the issue of why the department told the commission so little. But Hertling wrote that in numerous interviews, "neither Mr. Berger nor any other witness provided the Department with evidence that Mr. Berger had taken any documents beyond the five."

Hertling said the department "stands by its investigation" and believes the guilty plea it negotiated with Berger on April 1, 2005, "was the best one possible in light of the available evidence." He also criticized the Archives staff for failing at the time to confront Berger, search him or contact security officials, saying this failure "had to be weighed against the evidence."

Brachfeld has similarly expressed frustration that Smith and others who suspected Berger of wrongdoing chose not to inform him of their suspicions until more than a week after Berger's last visit to the Archives. "If I had been notified, I would have put cameras in the room. I would have caught him leaving with documents on him. . . . We could have had FBI agents around the facility. . . . He would have been arrested," Brachfeld said.

Brachfeld pressed Justice Department officials on six occasions in 2004 to make a fuller statement to the commission about Berger's actions, to no avail. He also contacted Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine, who organized an April 2004 meeting between Brachfeld and Justice officials that convinced him that "these issues had to go before the 9/11 Commission," according to two people present.

But in a notification to the commission the following month, the department did not mention that Berger had cut up documents, that he reviewed uncatalogued originals or that Brachfeld worried that Berger's theft was greater.

In the Hertling letter, the department noted obstacles in its investigation. The FBI was not advised of the case until Oct. 15, 2003, almost two weeks after Smith concluded that Berger had stolen documents. By then, Archives General Counsel Gary

DOJ_NMG_0134812

Stern had called Berger and former Clinton lawyer Bruce Lindsey about it and obtained two documents from Berger, who surrendered them at home after first denying they were in his possession.

The letter also said that six months after beginning the probe and well after Berger testified to the commission, "the Department had not yet asked Mr. Berger any questions, as he had not yet agreed to an interview." Berger's lawyer, Lanny Breuer, said Berger first spoke to the FBI in March 2005 and was interviewed a second time in July of that year, after his April 1, 2005, guilty plea to unauthorized removal and retention of classified material.

Judge Deborah A. Robinson imposed a stiffer penalty in the case than the Justice Department sought, fining Berger a total of $56,905, canceling his security clearance, and requiring monthly reporting to a probation officer for two years. Breuer said Berger has also picked up trash in Virginia parks for 100 hours to fulfill a community service requirement, and he criticized the renewed attention to Berger's case.

"It never ceases to amaze me how the most trivial things can be politicized. It is the height of unfairness . . . for this poor guy, who clearly made a mistake," Breuer said.

Some of Brachfeld's colleagues have not been cheered by his new congressional support. An Archives lawyer, who Brachfeld said was one of those involved in the Berger case, this month sent Brachfeld an e-mail accusing him of poor judgment and stating that "I don't think it comes as a great surprise if I were to venture the opinion that senior management at this agency have serious problems with the manner in which your office conducted itself . . . during the Berger investigation."

On Friday, Archivist Allen Weinstein assured Brachfeld in writing, however, that this criticism did "not reflect either my views or the views of the overwhelming majority of NARA employees."

Inquiry Of Campbell Staffers Wears On (HILL)

By Mike Soraghan

The Hill, February 21, 2007

It may have been forgotten by many, but the corruption investigation of the office of former Sen. Ben Nighthorse Campbell (R-Colo.) isn't over.

The FBI and the Justice Department are pursuing the case, records show, nearly three years after it was opened and more than two years after Campbell left office. But charges have yet to be levied and an explanation as to why it's taken so long to wrap up has yet to be offered.

"I don't understand why it would take so long," said Tom Gorman, who heads a Denver-based, anti-drug task force and complained to the Justice Department that Campbell's office pressured him to award a no-bid contract. "It didn't seem to me to be that complicated of a case."

Campbell, too, said he's eager to put the investigation behind him, stressing that he has been told he is not a subject of the investigation. Investigators have not interviewed Campbell.

"Senator Campbell is eager to learn the results of the Department of Justice's investigation into the alleged actions of a former staff member," a Campbell spokeswoman, Kate Dando, said.

The "former staffer" is Campbell's onetime chief of staff, Ginnie Kontnik, who resigned just before the allegations surfaced. The Justice Department's anti-corruption unit is investigating a no-bid contract that Campbell and Kontnik tried to steer to a company co-owned by one of Campbell's top fundraisers. More sensationally, Kontnik allegedly shook down an underling for a $2,000 kickback in 2002.

A Jan. 12 letter from the Justice Department Criminal Division, obtained by The Hill, denied a request for documents about the investigation, saying they "relate to open and on-going law enforcement proceedings being conducted by the Public Integrity Section," referring to the department's anti-corruption unit.

The letter said releasing documents could interfere with the investigation.

A former Campbell staffer who came forward with the kickback allegation, Brian Thompson, said he figures the investigation has been shelved, even if the department says it's still open.

"I haven't talked to or seen anyone in this in a long time," Thompson said. "I think the FBI's interviewed everybody they can interview."

Since the Campbell allegations surfaced, the Justice Department has started an investigation of former Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff and sent him to prison. Former Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio) is also on his way to prison on related charges.

The allegations helped to tip the balance of power in the Senate. Amid the revelations, Campbell reversed his plan to seek a third term. He was replaced by a Democrat, Ken Salazar.

A Department of Justice spokesman, Bryan Sierra, declined to comment on the investigation or whether its status has changed since the date of the letter. Attempts to reach Kontnik were unsuccessful.

DOJ_NMG_0134813

Since announcing his retirement, Campbell used unspent campaign funds to pay more than $150,000 in legal fees to the firm of Patton Boggs.

The investigation does not seem to be impeding Campbell's seven-figure lobbying job in Holland & Knight's Washington office. His client roster lists nearly 20 firms, including United Air Lines, the PGA Tour, the Washington Metro Transit Authority and the National Indian Gaming Association. Campbell and his firm recently landed the Seneca Nation of Indians.

Kontnik, Thompson and most of Campbell's other former staffers have been interviewed by the FBI, according to press accounts. Dando said the former senator always encouraged his former aides to cooperate.

Former District of Columbia U.S. Attorney Roscoe Howard said the secrecy of the investigation makes it difficult to determine whether prosecutors are sitting on the case or actively pursuing it. The case could be in someone's drawer, Howard said, or prosecutors could be negotiating a deal with one suspect and building cases against others.

"At Public Integrity, I don't think they're particularly aggressive," Howard said. "The nature of their targets makes everybody a tad gun-shy, but they don't just sit on a case to sit on a case."

The allegations surfaced days after Kontnik resigned from Campbell's office in 2004.

Thompson, who had worked under Kontnik in Campbell's suburban Denver office, told the Denver Post that Kontnik gave him a bonus in 2002, but demanded $2,000 back so she could pay her divorce attorney.

Kontnik confirmed the basics of Thompson's account, but said the money was reimbursement for legitimate "political-slash-Senate-related expenses."

She said she got the money "under an arrangement previously agreed to by the senator [Campbell]," but then backed off, saying, "He might not have technically signed off on it."

Gorman's no-bid contract allegations became public after Campbell announced his retirement in March 2004. Records showed that Campbell and Kontnik worked to steer a $1.15 million appropriation to Thinkstream Inc. The company was co-owned by Michael Smith, Campbell's 1992 campaign-finance chairman. Gorman and the directors of his task force resisted awarding the contract without bidding.

Kontnik's attorney "categorically" denied wrongdoing in the Thinkstream matter, but not in the case of the alleged kickback.

FBI, DOJ Continues Probe Of Wisc. Travel (AP)

By Ryan J. Foley, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ: Probe Into Wisconsin's State Travel Contract Continues

MADISON, Wis. (AP) -- The FBI and the state Department of Justice are continuing their investigation into Gov. Jim Doyle's administration, investigators said.

With one state employee convicted of steering a travel contract to a company with political ties to the governor, the criminal probe "remains open," the state Division of Criminal Investigation said in a letter to The Associated Press.

The disclosure means an investigation that distracted Doyle during his first term in office and gave ammunition to his critics could continue into his second. Doyle has not been accused of wrongdoing and has defended his administration from accusations of corruption.

The news came in DCI administrator James R. Warren's Feb. 14 response to a public records request for documents relating to the agency's investigation of the travel contract.

Warren turned over more than 50 pages detailing the probe that led to last summer's conviction of Georgia Thompson, a state purchasing supervisor, on federal fraud charges.

But he declined to release an additional 105 pages, including 40 pages of FBI reports, that he said involve "persons other than those who testified at the trial of Georgia Thompson."

Their release would undermine the probe, he said. Warren also blacked out the identities of two people from the released records.

"DCI's investigation remains open, and releasing identifying information about these individuals would interfere with that ongoing investigation," he wrote.

Prosecutors said Thompson steered a contract to a company whose executives gave $20,000 to Doyle's re-election campaign. She is serving 18 months in prison. After her trial, U.S. Attorney Steven Biskupic in Milwaukee told reporters the probe was not over.

Doyle's opponent in the November election, Republican Mark Green, repeatedly claimed Doyle's administration was facing "an ongoing FBI investigation." But the probe seemed to fizzle out as months went by with no additional action.

Doyle's former top aide, Marc Marotta, figured prominently at Thompson's trial last June. Prosecutors introduced evidence showing he met with Adelman Travel Group officials before the bidding process and his phone line traded calls with company executives on a key date of the competition.

Marotta served as secretary of the Department of Administration from 2003 to October 2005.

He did not testify at the trial and said afterward that he promised investigators he would not discuss his role in the award of the contract. But he broadly denied wrongdoing and kept a low-profile during Doyle's re-election campaign despite his role as chairman.

In the DOJ files, investigators note Thompson worked beneath two political appointees who worked for Marotta. Doyle's aides have argued the trial proved Thompson acted on her own -- despite some jurors' belief that higher-ups were involved.

Mike McCabe, director of the Wisconsin Democracy Campaign, which tracks political donations, said investigators last asked his group for information on Doyle's campaign donations weeks before the Nov. 7 election.

"I have not heard a peep since then," he said. "That's the last inkling we had about the nature of the investigation. It gave us the sense it was ongoing, it was both state and federal authorities involved, but that's all I know."

Kevin St. John, spokesman for Attorney General J.B. Van Hollen, declined comment. Administration spokesman Scott Larrivee referred questions to investigators.

Surprising New Evidence In The John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case (WREG)

WREG-TV, February 21, 2007

MEMPHIS, TN -- Today there is surprising new evidence in the John Ford Tennessee Waltz Case. With video and audiotapes, the FBI says Ford took thousands of dollars in bribes.

The hearing this afternoon is about the Rolex watch Ford said he received as a gift from Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman. FBI agents seized the diamond-studded Rolex when they arrested Ford in May 2005 and now Ford's defense is trying to get the watch thrown out as evidence in the former Senator's corruption trail.

Today the government unveiled proof that the watch is relevant in the bribery case by introducing new undercover audio and video tapes.

At one point, Ford is heard saying to an undercover FBI agent that he is going to receive a $50,000 Rolex because he did Hyneman a big favor. He then tells the agent that Hyneman is a "rich white boy".

He is on video again later, showing off the Rolex and telling another FBI agent that he paid zero for the watch because he did the developer a big favor by saving them up to $1.5 million dollars.

Prosecutors are also trying to prove that Ford eased fines for environmental fines on some of Hyneman's projects and according to the govenment, this is why Ford got the watch.

John Ford Goes To Court Over Rolex Watch (WPTY)

WPTY-TV, February 21, 2007

We have new information on the bribery charges against John Ford.

Prosecutors want John Ford's Rolex watch to be used as evidence during his upcoming bribery trial.

They say prominent developer Rusty Hyneman gave Ford the watch in return for a favor, but the defense says Ford bought the $32,000 watch.

After hours of hearing arguments from prosecutors and the defense, the judge did not make a decision Tuesday about whether John Ford's Rolex watch can be used as evidence during his Tennessee Waltz bribery trial.

John Ford spent today in court over something similar to this $32,000 Rolex watch. In the end, the judge didn't decide whether it can be used as evidence in Ford's bribery trial.

His attorney Mike Scholl says, “We're just here to argue the motion today and whatever time the judge needs it's his decision so we're not anxious to push anything or anxious for a decision one way or another.”

Prosecutors say Memphis developer Rusty Hyneman bought Ford the watch.

They say Ford met with Hyneman on October 4, 2004 to talk about Hyneman's state environmental violations.

On Oct 14, Hyneman bought a $32,000 Rolex watch. On Oct 15, Ford tells an undercover FBI agent on a videotape that he needs his Rolex from Rusty Hyneman.

On November 19, Ford shows an undercover FBI agent a Rolex and says he did Rusty Hyneman a "big favor."

Rusty Hyneman plead the fifth amendment in court today when asked about the Rolex watch.

His lawyer Jim Garts says, “They're basically on a fishing expedition on that and we advised Mr. Hyneman that he could exercise his constitutional right.”

Ford's lawyers say there's no proof Hyneman gave Ford the watch.

On Jan. 31, 2005, Ford changed his story. Ford told an undercover FBI agent he bought the watch.
FBI agents acknowledge Hyneman has not saved any money for state environmental violations he faces.
We also learned some new information about Ford's involvement with E-cycle.
That's the fake FBI company he's accused of taking bribes from.
Just months before his arrest, Ford was suspicious of the company.
During a conversation with FBI informant Tim Willis, Ford asks Willis, "Are they legit?"
He also asks Willis if he is working for the FBI.
Ford tells Willis, "If you are, just tell me. I got a gun. I'll just shoot you dead."
John Ford's trial starts on April 9th.
He is accused of taking bribes in return for sponsoring legislation for the fake FBI company called E-cycle.

Judge Mulls Decision After Ford's Rolex Hearing (WHBQ)

By Amy Cowman
WHBQ-TV, February 21, 2007

Memphis, Tenn. (WHBQ FOX13 MyFoxMemphis.com) -- The prosecution scored a partial victory in former state Senator John Ford's Tuesday Tennessee Waltz hearing. At the center of the court appearance is a $40,000 Rolex watch and a question over whether it was a gift or a bribe.

Former state Senator John Ford and his attorney's walked out of federal court with not much to say.

"We're not really going to comment on the hearing half," said Ford's attorney Michael Scholl. "The proof came out in the hearing as it is and the judge hasn't made a decision. So we'll wait on that decision."

Judge J. Daniel Breen did deny the defense's request to suppress the watch due to the way it was seized, saying the government had the right to seize it, but the judge still wants more proof on the relevance of the Rolex before he allows it into trial.

Ford declined to comment after the prosecution showed several taped conversations between Ford and undercover officers.

The conversations included segments where Ford referenced a $50,000 Rolex watch he said he paid nothing for and received from developer Rusty Hyneman in return for saving him more than a million dollars in fines.

Hyneman's attorney's advised him to plead the fifth on the witness stand.

"It was a bunch of embellishment by Senator Ford as to what happened," said Hyneman's attorney, Jim Jartz. "There were four or five different versions, one of those was apparently the state's theory. But pick which one and there's just no point in Mr. Hyneman subjecting himself to that when he's not a defendant."

The defense argued Ford never saved Hyneman money on fines, also they argued Ford paid for his own Rolex watch and made an even swap with Hyneman for a different watch, saying Ford boasted about things that weren't true.

Defense attorneys said the judge probably won't rule on whether the Rolex will be admitted until once the trial has begun.

Ford's trial is set to begin on April 9.

Memphis Developer Refuses Testimony On Ford Watch (WMC)

WMC-TV, February 21, 2007

Prosecutors and Defense Attorneys battled for hours over whether the now-infamous wrist watch should be allowed into evidence.

The judge is going to take some time to make that decision.

And some highly-anticipated testimony turned out to be a waste of "time."

We've shown you video of former Senator John Ford "caught on tape" before.

The feds say he took cash in exchange for political favors.

It's the same reason they say he accepted a Rolex watch from developer Rusty Hyneman.

Hyneman was as evasive outside court Tuesday as he was inside. He pleaded the 5th on every question concerning his relationship with Ford. In other words, he answered nothing.

"He's not a defendant, he's not on trial, he's not been charged with anything," said Hyneman's attorney Jim Garts. "So, there's really no point in him giving testimony in that courtroom," he added.

Prosecutors want the watch presented as evidence during Ford's upcoming corruption trial.

They say it proves Ford is willing to take a bribe. They presented audio and video tape of Ford boasting about the watch.

At one point, he's heard saying that he is going to receive a $50,000 Rolex because he did Hyneman a big favor.

He later tells an undercover agent that Hyneman is a quote "rich white boy."

"Whatever time the judge needs, it's his decision," said Ford's attorney Mike Scholl. "So, we're not anxious to push anything to anxious for a decision one way or the other," he added.

As usual, Ford was not willing to comment, for the most part. Reporter Jason Miles asked him what kind of watch he is currently wearing.

"You don't need to know that," Ford replied.

The judge might not make a decision about Ford's Rolex until his trial begins April 9th.

Sen. Cooper Intoxicated, Speeding, THP Charges (TENN)

By Leon Alligood, Staff Writer

The Tennessean, February 21, 2007

Lawmaker hurt in Feb. 7 wreck

State Sen. Jerry Cooper was legally drunk when he rolled his sport-utility vehicle on Interstate 24 earlier this month after attending three legislative receptions, the Tennessee Highway Patrol said Tuesday.

The Democrat from Morrison, 58, who was already free on bail on federal fraud charges, was charged with drunken driving and speeding in connection with the Feb. 7 one-vehicle wreck in Rutherford County.

As for how drunk he was, the THP wasn't saying Tuesday. A spokesman refused to disclose details of the charges, including the senator's blood-alcohol level and the estimated speed of his vehicle.

"Until it's been served, we cannot release the warrant," said Mike Browning, spokesman for the THP.

The legal threshold for drunkenness in Tennessee is 0.08.

Cooper was seriously injured in the wreck and is convalescing at home from rib fractures, a concussion and a severe arm injury. He will be arrested or required to turn himself in "when he is physically able," according to the THP statement.

Last week, Cooper's doctor said the senator would need months to heal. It wasn't clear Tuesday how long the senator could wait before being booked on the charges.

District Attorney General William Whitesell of Murfreesboro, whose office will prosecute the case, did not return a phone call Tuesday.

Efforts to contact the senator or his attorney, Jerry Summers of Chattanooga, were not successful. Neither returned calls.

In light of the accident, Summers has asked the judge in Cooper's fraud case to postpone the March 5 start date of the trial.

Information from The Associated Press was used in this report.

Contact Leon Alligood at 615-259-8279 or at lalligood@tennessean.com.

One On Trial Blames Another: His Twin Brother (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 21, 2007

Andre L. Henry - who stands accused of violent crimes against a police officer, two banks, two grand-jury witnesses, and eight fast-food restaurants - has offered jurors in his trial an unusual defense.

The man secretly recorded in a prison cell confessing?

Not him, Henry testified. It was his twin brother; they had traded cells in prison.

"We figured, why not?" Henry told jurors. "Who would know?"

A federal jury in Philadelphia is expected to begin deliberating Henry's fate this morning. If convicted of the most violent charges - including car-jacking and solicitation to murder - he probably faces life in prison.

In closing arguments yesterday, Assistant U.S. Attorney Michelle Rotella mocked Henry's assertion, and said the government had provided ample evidence that Henry doesn't have a twin brother.

"His story is just absurd," Rotella told the jury.

Federal officials say Henry is an extremely violent man. In addition to the charges in this case, he faces state murder charges and, according to grand jury testimony, was investigated for an alleged plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall.

The alleged 2003 plot against shoppers and commuters at the Center City mall had not been previously reported. Henry was never charged with terror-related crimes; he and his lawyer, Christopher Warren, have denied that any attack was planned.

Jurors in his trial have not been told directly about the alleged Gallery plan. But during cross-examination, Henry unexpectedly began to talk about it, accusing Rotella of fabricating evidence against his family.

"When the public hears about domestic terrorism, they're going to want to know what happened," Henry said. "Were these guys actual terrorists? What happened?"

DOJ_NMG_0134817

"You were arrested, Mr. Henry," Rotella shot back. "That's what happened."

The government's best evidence of a terror plot is the secret recording of Henry made by his cell mate - an unredacted copy of which was reviewed by The Inquirer.

At one point, Henry, who is a black Muslim, said on tape that the purpose of the blasts, timed for rush hour near the Market East SEPTA station, would represent "domestic terrorism" against white Americans.

At another point on the recording, however, Henry said the purpose would be to divert Philadelphia police long enough to pull off a major bank robbery.

"Prior to robbing the bank, he was going to plant 17 pipe bombs in the Gallery," the cell mate, Kreg Williams, said during grand-jury testimony.

When Henry was arrested on a parole violation in 2003, agents from the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said they had found materials for making pipe bombs in his trunk.

In the basement of Henry's home, agents said, they found a Glock pistol, a Fanchini shotgun, a Marlin rifle, a Romanian AK-47 assault rifle, a Point Blank bulletproof vest, $14,000 in pink-dye-stained cash, and photos of Henry and others holding weapons.

As Henry sat in prison on the parole charge, the ATF received a letter from Williams.

"Henry's case is much more involved than the weapons...," Williams wrote. "I can wear a wire and get all the evidence on tape."

Williams, a self-styled jailhouse paralegal, was fitted with a wire. Under the guise of helping Henry prepare his legal case, Williams got him to talk.

Besides speaking about the alleged Gallery plot, Henry was recorded speaking about a car-jacking, a plan to kill a grand-jury witness, a 2003 shoot-out with a Philadelphia police officer, and two bank robberies.

In a tape excerpt played at trial, Henry described one of the bank robberies: "I jumped over the counter, and I emptied the drawers, and I told the manager to open up the... vault."

Henry is also charged with making straw gun purchases - using women who did not have criminal records to buy his weapons, including six assault rifles.

In closing arguments, Warren reminded jurors that most witnesses against Henry had testified hoping to reduce their prison sentences. The lawyer also noted that authorities had failed to obtain incriminating fingerprints or DNA from a trove of evidence, including the cash, seized at Henry's home.

Capano's U.S. Appeal Detailed (AP)

By Randall Chase

AP, February 21, 2007

DOVER, Del. - Thomas Capano's lawyer argued in a federal appeal yesterday that a judge had violated the convicted killer's constitutional right to a fair trial by refusing to let the jury consider charges other than murder and by allowing hearsay testimony.

In a 71-page brief supporting Capano's habeas corpus petition, attorney Joseph Bernstein said the Delaware Supreme Court had erred in upholding the judge's decision to give the 1998 jury only two options: acquittal or conviction for first-degree murder.

Under a 1980 U.S. Supreme Court ruling, a defendant in a capital murder case is entitled to jury instructions that include lesser offenses if any evidence supports those offenses, Bernstein told the Associated Press.

Capano, now 56, acknowledged in his trial that he had dumped the body of Anne Marie Fahey, who was Gov. Tom Carper's scheduling secretary, into the Atlantic Ocean, but said her death had been an accident.

"If you're on a jury and you hear that, and you only have two options, what are you going to do?" Bernstein said. "Even if you don't think it was intentional murder, you're not going to let him go."

Capano, once a wealthy and politically connected lawyer, was convicted of shooting Fahey, 30, in 1996, allegedly because she was breaking off an affair with him.

Bernstein also argued in the federal appeal that hearsay testimony by Fahey's friends and psychotherapists should have been excluded from the trial.

In 2001, the state Supreme Court upheld Capano's conviction, his death sentence, and Judge William Swain Lee's decision to reject lesser offenses such as manslaughter or criminally negligent homicide.

While finding that Capano's trial included "obvious hearsay," the Supreme Court said Lee had admitted it with careful limiting instructions to the jury.

Certain inadmissible hearsay testimony did not amount to reversible error, the court added.

DOJ_NMG_0134818

"What we're saying is that, under state law, the Delaware Supreme Court was wrong," Bernstein said.

He said the overturning of Capano's death sentence last year and subsequent sentencing to life in prison without parole did not affect his federal appeal.

"When the jury was originally instructed, it was a capital case," he said.

Loren Meyers, a criminal appeals attorney with the state Department of Justice, did not immediately return a telephone call seeking comment on Bernstein's filing. The state has until April 16 to file an answer.

Elmira Man Admits To Child Porn Charge (ELMSG)

Elmira (NY) Star-Gazette, February 21, 2007

John R. Maggese, 44, pleaded guilty today to a felony charge of possession of child pornography, according to a press release from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Maggesse was accused of having child pornography on a computer he owned from July 2003 through August 2005, the release stated. He received the images over the Internet; some of the images showed children under 12 years old.

Maggese is scheduled to be sentenced at 2 p.m. May 24 in U.S. District Court in Rochester. The charges carry a maximum penalty of 10 years imprisonment, a $250,000 fine, or both.

Investigator Pleads Guilty To Fraud Against Law Firms (LAW)

By Mark Hamblett, New York Law Journal

New York Law Journal, February 21, 2007

A Montana man Tuesday pleaded guilty to defrauding law firms involved in major litigation by claiming to have proof of illegal activity by opposing counsel and parties.

Michael Lair, 46, headed consumerdefense.com Inc., which held itself out as a consumer complaint investigator and researcher for large fraud cases. Tuesday, Lair admitted to defrauding attorneys and litigants of more than $311,000 in 2003 and 2006 as he pleaded guilty to four counts of wire fraud before Southern District of New York Judge John Keenan.

Under a plea agreement with Assistant U.S. Attorney Helen Cantwell, Lair is expected to be sentenced to serve somewhere between 2 years and 3 months to 2 years and 9 months in prison.

The victims of the fraud included two of Manhattan's top litigation firms, Morvillo, Abramowitz, Grand, Iason; Anello & Bohrer; and Kasowitz, Benson, Torres & Friedman.

While the guilty plea Tuesday covered the litigation involving the Morvillo and Kasowitz firms, prosecutors had been prepared to obtain a superseding information that would have charged Lair with attempting to defraud 10 other firms in litigation in New York and other parts of the country.

Tuesday, with defense attorney Leonard Joy by his side, Lair told Judge Keenan, "I agreed with a number of law firms to supply information about the parties involved in legal actions in which the law firms were involved. I charged the firms' fees knowing that I did not have and could not have obtained such information."

Name partner Robert Morvillo was representing former AIG Inc. Chairman Maurice Greenberg in a dispute with the insurance giant when he was approached by Lair in 2005 with an offer to sell sensitive information about the company and opposing counsel.

Lair then allegedly turned around and tried to sell information to the opposing counsel about illegal and unethical acts purportedly committed by the Morvillo firm, when, in fact, he had no such information.

The Morvillo firm paid Lair $75,000 on behalf of Greenberg to provide information about alleged misconduct by AIG auditor PriceWaterhouseCoopers, but Lair never provided any information.

He then approached lawyers for AIG and said he had been hired by the Morvillo firm to hack into the company's computers and obtain telephone and e-mail records -- also a fabrication, according to the government.

Following Lair's arrest in November, Michael Bowe of Kasowitz Benson said Lair contacted him in March 2006, claiming to have information on hedge fund SAC Capital, which was being sued by Bowe's client, pharmaceutical company Biovail Corp., for allegedly colluding with analysts to publish misleading reports that damaged the company's stock price.

The Kasowitz firm paid Lair less than $5,000 for travel expenses to New York but never received any information from him.

"We paid $5,000 in travel expenses for one meeting that went nowhere," Bowe said Tuesday. "We never paid any money for services or information."

Lair also tried, prosecutors said, to have SAC Capital's lawyers pay $50,000 for the "information" that the Kasowitz firm had hired him to hack into SAC's computers.

According to the complaint the FBI had already been alerted to Lair's activities and agents were monitoring his communications with SAC's lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0134819

Morvillo could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

In addition to the two named New York law firms, the information filed against Lair alleged that between 2003 and 2006 he also defrauded 10 other law firms. He allegedly received $10,000 from New York attorneys involved in trade secrets litigation; $50,000 from an attorney representing an Internet services company in litigation with hedge funds; $25,000 from an attorney weighing whether to start litigation against a software development company; and $35,000 from an attorney representing an investor against a computer software company and its outside auditors.

The other firms were not named.

Cantwell is also seeking the forfeiture of $311,000, which represents the total Lair received from the 12 firms.

Lair, who has been behind bars since his arrest in November, is scheduled to be sentenced March 21.

Lawyer Admits Stealing More Than $20 Million (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

WHITE PLAINS (AP) - A lawyer pleaded guilty to stealing more than $20 million from a bank and at least one client, spending the loot on vacation homes, a wedding and generous salaries for his employees, authorities said.

Under a deal with prosecutors, Anthony Bellettieri, 53, faces more than a decade in prison after admitting in federal court to bank and mail fraud dating to at least 2003.

Bellettieri, a real estate lawyer, stole the funds through check kiting - taking money from his law firm's escrow account and writing checks on another account to cover the escrow account's losses.

According to J.P. Morgan Chase, the primary victim, the tactic worked partly because he used checks with a printed error. The scheme fell apart after the bank issued correct checks in November.

Prosecutor Cynthia Keefe Dunne said the stolen money paid for, among other things, a swimming pool at Bellettieri's Pleasantville home, a family wedding, high salaries for the law firm's workers and condos in Miami Beach and Aruba.

Five Plead Guilty To Bilking Investors In Years-long Scam (SDUT)

By Kelly Thornton, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 21, 2007

Ring's victims were mostly churchgoers

SAN DIEGO – Five men have pleaded guilty in federal court to defrauding investors of $20 million in a long-term scam that preyed mostly on churchgoers.

John Harrell, the ringleader of the scam, admitted he recruited investors with bogus schemes and then spent all the money on himself and other members of the enterprise, said prosecutor Jason Forge.

Harrell pleaded guilty Tuesday before U.S. District Judge Thomas Whelan to fraud, conspiracy and money laundering charges. He faces a sentence of up to 335 years in prison, Forge said.

The others – Ocean Beach liquor store owner Gregg Stavros, Daniel Anderson, Kenneth Hodgell and John Reitz – pleaded guilty to fraud and tax charges, and each faces a maximum of 10 years in prison.

One of the bogus stories used to lure investors: Descendants of Mormon church founder Joseph Smith had created a $1.6 trillion trust fund held overseas, and investors were needed to bring the money back home.

“Mr. Harrell and his co-conspirators utilized a complex fraud scheme to steal millions through promises of high rates of return with no risk,” said Dan Dzwilewski, head of the FBI office in San Diego.

“He also preyed on his victims' religious faiths and their suspicion of government. Today's result will make others think twice before defrauding the American public.”

The defendants used investor money to pay their rent, to pay for privately chartered flights, and to rent cars for themselves, Forge said. The rental car bill was more than $400,000 per year. The defendants targeted many of their victims through churches.

The massive fraud ring operated out of an Ocean Beach liquor store and a Mission Valley apartment complex. Millions of dollars were laundered through Stavros' Chris' Liquor Store in Ocean Beach, officials said.

Authorities described the organization as “a cult-like investment scheme” that operated out of San Diego beginning in the late 1980s.

Former Judge Collapses As He Is Sentenced For Child Porn Possession (LAT)

By Christine Hanley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134820

Ex-Orange County jurist Ronald C. Kline quickly recovers. He must serve 27 months in prison and register as a sex offender.

A former Orange County judge collapsed in a Los Angeles federal courtroom Tuesday moments after being sentenced to 27 months in prison for possessing child pornography, bringing a dramatic end to a case that tested privacy rights and nearly fell apart because of a computer hacker's role in the investigation.

Ronald C. Kline was standing with his hands in his pockets and swaying slightly as U.S. District Judge Consuelo B. Marshall indicated he would do prison time. Kline's knees suddenly buckled, and he fell backward, with his eyes closed, into the arms of one of his attorneys.

A nurse and paramedics rushed to the courtroom. . They monitored his heart and administered other tests on the 66-year-old Kline. He was on his feet about a half-hour later, and his attorneys said he was well enough to sit through the rest of the hearing.

When it resumed, Marshall also ordered Kline to serve three years of strictly supervised probation. During that time, he cannot use the Internet or possess any technology — including a cellphone — that would allow Internet access without prior written approval.

Other conditions bar him from lingering within 100 feet of schools, parks and other common gathering points for children under 18. He must also register as a sex offender for the rest of his life.

Marshall said she based her ruling on a variety of factors, including a recommendation by probation officers that Kline serve from 27 to 33 months, the seriousness of the offense, Kline's lack of prior criminal history and his acceptance of responsibility.

Assistant U.S. Attys. Gregory W. Staples and Deirdre Z. Eliot said they were satisfied with the sentence, even though they had asked for the maximum 33 months.

The prosecutors spent a good deal of the hearing chronicling Kline's pursuit of an 18-year-old man he met while both were enrolled last year at a treatment center for sexual disorders. Kline had been ordered by the facility's staff to stay at least 10 feet away from the teen, who is described in court records as emotionally and developmentally disabled. Instead, Kline wrote him letters and asked him to move in.

Kline's attorneys were seeking probation for their client, arguing that he had accepted responsibility and was voluntarily undergoing rigorous treatment for what they described as a sex addiction. . They repeatedly pointed out that Kline broke no laws by interacting with the 18-year-old, who was legally an adult.

"This is a tragic case," said Paul S. Meyer, one of his attorneys. "Our client has obviously suffered throughout this entire ordeal."

Kline, who has been confined to his Irvine home and has had to wear an electronic monitoring device since his arrest, was ordered to surrender to U.S. marshals by May 21. He has never spoken publicly about the allegations. Given the chance to address the court Tuesday, Kline said he owed an apology to society in general and people he had met over the years.

"The problem is, I can't think of a way to say it to make any of it right," he said. "It would be a lifetime of apologies for what I did."

Appointed to the Orange County Superior Court bench in 1995, Kline enjoyed an impeccable reputation as a civil judge and was running unopposed for his second six-year term until he was arrested in November 2001 and charged with seven counts of possessing child pornography on his home and courthouse computers.

The investigation began after Bradley Willman, a Canadian hacker who saw himself as a computer cop, used a virus to gain access to Kline's home computer and download explicit diary excerpts about the judge's sexual desires and more than 1,500 pornographic photos of young boys.

Willman forwarded his findings to a Colorado-based Internet watchdog group, Pedowatch, which contacted Irvine police. Warrants were obtained months later that allowed searches of Kline's home and courthouse computers.

The case became a national spectacle and set the stage for one of Orange County's strangest elections. Talk radio hosts Ken and John of KFI-AM (640) set up a makeshift studio outside Kline's home, reading his diary entries in their daily broadcasts and urging voters to elect one of eleven write-in candidates challenging him for the judicial seat.

After the widespread publicity surrounding Kline's arrest, a former neighbor came forward with allegations that he was molested by Kline 25 years earlier. That case was dismissed in 2003 when the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated a California law that had waived statutory limits for old sex crimes.

That same year, the federal case also appeared to have collapsed amid a legal debate centered primarily on the credibility of the computer hacker and the timing of his "break-in."

DOJ_NMG_0134821

Prosecutors argued that Willman played a limited role in their investigation and worked independently of any police agency. But defense attorneys equated Willman to a government agent and said his computer invasions were a "21st century wiretap" to secretly monitor, remove and deliver incriminating files to police.

In separate rulings, Marshall sided with the defense and suppressed the diary excerpts and photos found on his home and courthouse computers, concluding that the evidence was the fruit of the earlier illegal search of Kline's home computer by the hacker, who saw himself as working for police. And, she concluded, as an agent for the police, that hacker had needed a warrant to conduct the search legally.

But prosecutors appealed her decision. And in October 2004, the case was resurrected by a three-judge panel of the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals. In an unpublished opinion, the justices ruled that the Canadian hacker was not working for the police when he accessed the judge's hard drives and therefore did not violate Kline's privacy rights. They found that even though there was ample evidence to support the contention that Willman was acting with the intent to assist law enforcement, there was no evidence that any police agency knew of his search beforehand.

In December 2005, months after the U.S. Supreme Court declined to hear Kline's appeal, he pleaded guilty to four counts of possessing child pornography on his home computer and computer disks.

Owner Vows A Hassle In Escort-service Probe (WT)

By Jim McElhatton

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

A California woman who is the target in an ongoing criminal probe into the operation of her District-based escort agency has told federal authorities she will "make life miserable" for former customers and employees unless her case is dropped, government attorneys say.

"I cannot emphasize to you the terrible and quite unnecessary ramifications this case (civil and/or criminal) will set off, if permitted to advance for both sides," Deborah Jean Palfrey wrote in an e-mail to the U.S. Attorney's Office. "The press will have a field day at each of our expense."

Government attorneys referenced the e-mail in a recent motion to postpone civil forfeiture proceedings against Miss Palfrey pending the outcome of a criminal investigation. But an attorney for Miss Palfrey wants to move forward with the civil case, filing court papers last weekend detailing an attempt to depose former Clinton campaign adviser Dick Morris.

Mr. Morris, a news commentator who resigned from the Clinton campaign in 1996 amid a scandal involving escort services, is "the only customer of the service who has publicly admitted using the services for 'legal' sexual activity," Miss Palfrey's attorney wrote in court papers.

Attempts to reach Mr. Morris were not successful yesterday.

Miss Palfrey, of Vallejo, Calif., has been the target of a two-year investigation by the Internal Revenue Service and U.S. Postal Service into whether she illegally earned money from prostitutes working as escorts for her business.

Miss Palfrey has not been charged criminally.

In October, federal agents seized more than $427,000 in cash and stocks from Miss Palfrey. In pleadings, authorities say the criminal investigation is ongoing.

Miss Palfrey's forfeiture attorney, Montgomery Blair Sibley, said yesterday he is seeking to depose Mr. Morris because the one-time presidential adviser already has admitted using escort services in the District in the mid-1990s, including, he said, Miss Palfrey's business, known as Pamela Martin & Associates.

"The only reason we mentioned Dick Morris is that he had publicly come out," Mr. Sibley said. "We are trying to keep the names of the other hundreds of clients private. ... Nobody wants a circus."

The U.S. Attorney's office declined to comment on the case yesterday.

In recent filings, Assistant U.S. Attorney William R. Cowden expressed concern about what he called Miss Palfrey's "recent threat to harass potential witnesses whose identities remain secret ... through calculated public disclosures of former customers' and former co-workers' identities."

Mr. Cowden also said authorities want to hold off on the pending civil seizure proceedings because it could affect the ongoing criminal investigation.

He said Miss Palfrey's attorney wants the government to turn over the names of cooperating witnesses. That could compromise the ability of criminal investigators to gather confidential information, he wrote.

"At this point, no good purpose would be served by facilitating claimant's apparent effort to expose and potentially embarrass former customers and co-workers of her 'full service' escort agency," Mr. Cowden wrote.

Mr. Sibley declined to comment on the contents of Miss Palfrey's e-mail. But he disputed the idea Miss Palfrey might seek to "make life miserable" for clients and former employees.

"She's not looking to make life difficult for anyone," Mr. Sibley said.

According to Mr. Cowden's memo, Miss Palfrey's note to government attorneys also warned, "I can state with unequivocal certainty this situation will be a long and unpleasant one. ..."

Ex-ORNL Subcontractor Found Guilty In DOE Scheme (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), February 21, 2007

A lauded Oak Ridge businessman may soon be trading pinstripes for prison stripes.

A jury in U.S. District Court on Tuesday convicted Reginald Hall, 54, of conspiracy to commit money laundering for a scheme to plunder money from the U.S. Department of Energy via fake invoices submitted as a subcontractor for the Oak Ridge National Laboratory.

Jurors also found Hall guilty of money laundering and theft of government property. He was acquitted, however, of mail fraud and obstruction of justice.

The same jury returned a guilty verdict against Hall associate David Reeder for an act of money laundering but acquitted Reeder, who ran a subcontracting firm known as Biosphere, of conspiring with Hall to pull off a larger money laundering scheme.

Jurors, who heard days worth of testimony in a trial presided over by U.S. District Court Judge Tom Varlan, also found Hall's firm, Advanced Integrated Management Services Inc., guilty in the money laundering conspiracy.

Attorney Doug Trant, who represented Reeder, said his client plans to appeal.

So, too, does Hall, according to attorney Tom Dillard, who represented Hall along with attorney Wade Davies.

"Mr. Hall is disappointed in the verdicts on the convictions," Dillard said. "He maintains, as he always has, that no one was defrauded and that he always performed excellent work. He does plan to appeal and hopes ultimately to be vindicated."

Varlan has set a June 12 sentencing hearing.

Assistant U.S. Attorneys Trey Hamilton and Greg Weddle prosecuted the case. Agents Randall Kizer and Rick Sample with DOE's Office of the Inspector General, Agent Bob Gibson of the FBI and Lt. Art Schettini of the Tennessee Valley Authority Police Criminal Investigation Division headed up the probe.

According to testimony, Hall once worked at ORNL but in 1995 formed AIMSI, a quality control consulting firm, and began winning a series of subcontracts with ORNL's prime contractors, including current management firm UT-Battelle.

Hamilton alleged that Hall began submitting invoices for work not performed and used associates like Reeder and Stanley W. Stevens, who pleaded guilty and testified against Hall, to help launder his ill-gotten gains.

UT-Battelle communications chief Billy Stair declined to comment on the verdict. When asked how the firm handled the aftermath of the probe, Stair said the "laboratory responded in two ways: We closely reviewed related contracts to make sure they were in order. We also stressed to our staff the need for heightened awareness of the checks and balances in our procurement system."

Hall and Reeder remain free on bond pending sentencing, as does Stevens.

Frank Munger contributed to this story. Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

Pr. George's Official Opened Fire Unprovoked, Deliveryman Says (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

A senior Prince George's County homeland security official who last month shot two unarmed furniture deliverymen opened fire without provocation after angrily ordering the men to leave his home, the surviving mover said in a statement provided last night to law enforcement authorities.

Keith A. Washington, who is also a county police officer, was combative almost from the moment the movers arrived at his Accokeek home, said Robert White, who worked for a contractor delivering for Marlo Furniture. "As we were leaving we reached the top of the steps, and the customer said, 'I know how to get you the [expletive] out of my house' and I heard gunshots," White said in the statement.

Later, White said, he listened as he lay bleeding while Washington falsely reported that the men he shot had attacked him with a pipe. "I remember sitting there on the ground thinking to myself, I can't believe this is how it is going to be," said White, 36, who dictated the statement from his hospital bed to his attorney. His co-worker, Brandon Clark, 22, died of his wounds Feb. 2 without giving a statement.

Washington has not spoken publicly since the shooting. A source familiar with the investigation has told The Post that, in a brief report filed immediately after the incident, Washington alleged that the movers were in a part of the house where they were not supposed to be. Police have said that Washington told them he acted in self-defense.

Washington, a former driver for County Executive Jack B. Johnson (D), did not respond yesterday to a call seeking comment. A police union attorney, Steven E. Sunday, also did not return a call.

Police initially said they would probably charge the movers with assault but have since backed off that comment, saying they would make no determination until their investigation is complete.

White's attorney, Michael J. Winkelman, has not allowed police to interview his client, whose criminal record includes a burglary conviction, in part because of the possibility that police might try to build an assault case against White. In addition, Winkelman said he is concerned that White's providing a statement before Washington does so might allow Washington to fabricate a story that blames the movers in the shooting.

Police have declined to say whether Washington has given a complete statement in the investigation, but sources said yesterday that a subpoena compelling him to appear before a grand jury has been issued. The sources spoke on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing.

Winkelman said he and White decided to give State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey the signed three-page statement, which Winkelman also provided to The Post, because he worries that Washington, now on paid administrative leave, might be permitted to return to work. "We didn't feel we could wait any longer," Winkelman said.

Johnson has said Washington should not continue as deputy director of homeland security -- a job Johnson gave him two years ago -- but should return to the police department, where he is a corporal. The case has attracted wide attention in part because of a pattern of previous complaints against Washington, 45.

In the statement, White said he waited in the movers' truck Jan. 24 while Clark met Washington in his home. He said Clark, 22, returned and said, "Man, this guy is looking for a fight."

White said Clark then telephoned a supervisor. Officials have confirmed that such a call took place, and Clark's girlfriend has said the supervisor instructed the deliverymen to give Washington whatever he wanted.

Washington directed the movers to an upstairs bedroom, White said, where they set down the new bedrails. White said Washington pushed Clark, who was then on his knees, and crudely ordered him to leave the house.

White said Washington grew angrier when Clark asked him why he had not disassembled the other bed, parts of which were to be taken away by the movers. Washington shoved him again, White said, and answered: "Man, now you are going to tell me what to do in my house? Get the [expletive] out of my house."

White said he and Clark headed for the stairs. Clark, walking backward and holding up his hands "in the surrender position," told Washington he did not want to fight, White said.

Washington opened fire. Clark was struck first, White said. White laid his injured co-worker down and began to search for a cellphone. "I then heard a few more shots and realized I had been shot," White said.

When Washington stepped back into the bedroom, White said, he tried again to locate the phone.

"The customer must have seen me move because he shot me in the knee and said, 'I told you not to move,' " White said.

Washington, his gun still pointed at the two men, then telephoned someone he appeared to know, White said. " 'These two dudes just broke up in my house, and I shot both of them and they are here bleeding all over my carpet,' " White quoted Washington as saying. " 'They beat me up real good. . . . Yeah, they hit me with a pipe.' "

County police have said Washington was injured seriously enough to require treatment at a hospital but have declined to describe his injuries.

As they lay bleeding, White said, he and Clark pleaded with Washington, asking that he give them a phone or call for help. The first police officers to arrive appeared to believe the deliverymen were intruders, White wrote. One handcuffed Clark, White said, and the other told White, " 'Man, what are you doing in this house? You know you just broke into a cop's house?' "

It was only then, White said, that he realized Washington was a police officer. White said that the responding officer looked surprised when White said he and Clark were deliverymen and that the officer then ordered another officer to remove Clark's handcuffs.

Winkelman said White, who was shot in the chest, knee and abdomen, was readmitted to a hospital yesterday because of a possible infection.

Staff writer Candace Rondeaux contributed to this report.

Body Found In Plaza Rubble Believed To Be Gunman (WP)

By Steve Vogel

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Frederick authorities yesterday recovered a body believed to be that of a man who they say shot at police and started a fire that gutted a shopping plaza Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0134824

The body, which was found about 12:30 p.m. behind the locked front door in the rubble of a destroyed liquor store at the Frederick shopping center, has been sent to the chief medical examiner's office in Baltimore for identification.

Frederick police were still trying to piece together how James Douglas's visit to a liquor store ended up in an inferno that destroyed the Antietam Village Center.

Police say Douglas, 30, of Frederick, walked into Jim's Liquors at the shopping plaza on Oppossumtown Pike about 12:30 p.m. Monday, showed the owner a handgun and ordered him out of the store.

When two officers pulled up, Douglas fired at least one shot at them through the store's glass door, police said. "They were approaching the business and they heard two shots," said Lt. Thomas Chase, a spokesman for Frederick police. "One came through the window and they heard it go past."

About 1:45 p.m., smoke was spotted coming from the liquor store. Police said they think boxes of liquor were ignited to start the blaze, and the alcohol acted as an accelerant. The fire soon spread to the adjoining stores, destroying a bank, a coffee shop, a sandwich shop, a medical supply store, a hair salon and a dry cleaner. "It was quick and it was massive," said Chase, who witnessed the fire. "Once it went to the rafters, it was gone."

Police initially characterized the incident as an attempted armed robbery, based on the first calls for assistance to the liquor store, but they said they are unsure what actually happened.

"That's part of the investigation, to find out if it was a robbery or something else," Chase said. "It's much too early to draw any conclusions."

As of yesterday evening, no weapon had been found in the rubble. "We're still looking for the handgun," Chase said.

Yesterday afternoon, fire marshals, police detectives and construction workers moved through the blackened remains of the plaza. A yellow excavator picked out pieces of debris. Large red dumpsters had been set up in front of the liquor store to block the view of the recovery operation.

Shortly after the body was discovered, a group of Douglas's relatives stood on the sidewalk just outside a chain-link fence erected around the site, staring forlornly at the recovery operation. "Just let us grieve in peace," one woman in the group said. A police chaplain stood with them, offering words of consolation.

Jamie Ketterman, who said she is the mother of two of Douglas's children, stood across the street, huddled in a blanket, watching as authorities prepared to remove the body. She said Douglas had been with her and the children earlier Monday. "He disappeared and came here, and that's where he stayed." Ketterman began crying and could not speak further.

Friends of Douglas's, who lived in a nearby apartment complex, gathered at the scene yesterday and angrily disputed police accounts of the incident.

Talisha Easterling, who said she and Douglas had been friends since childhood, said that she spoke to him by cellphone during the standoff and that her friend said he was not going to harm anyone.

"Tell them to leave me alone," she quoted Douglas as telling her. "I'm coming out as soon as I finish smoking a blunt."

Another friend, Britnie Bell, said she also doubted that Douglas would have shot at police and burned down the shopping center. "He always told me, 'There are two kinds of people in this world: fools and damn fools,' " Bell recalled. "He wasn't a damn fool."

Chase said police repeatedly encouraged Douglas to surrender peacefully while speaking to him via cellphone during the standoff.

Chase said police fired no shots. "When we're fired upon, our first response is to seek cover," he said. "We don't fire back indiscriminately."

Court records show that Douglas was found guilty of several criminal offenses in recent years, including possession of a deadly weapon and drinking in public.

But friends described him as a friendly and well-known neighborhood figure who helped residents dig out from the recent snow. He was also a proud father, they said. "He's got five kids; they're all boys," Bell said. "How's it going to be for them not to have a father figure?"

Staff researcher Meg Smith contributed to this report.

Why I Oppose The Death Penalty (WP)

By Martin O'malley

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

In evaluating whether Maryland's criminal death penalty should be replaced with life without parole, one must be guided by the answers to two basic questions:

Â· Is the death penalty a just punishment for murder?

Â· Is the death penalty an effective deterrent to murder?

DOJ_NMG_0134825

Most of us would point to the execution of John Thanos, here in our state, as an example of a "just" application of the death penalty. Thanos murdered three teenagers, at random, by shooting them point-blank. He expressed no remorse, even declaring in court that he wished he could bring his innocent victims back to life to kill them again. In the end, he demanded to be executed and was. Most Marylanders felt, basically, that "hanging was too good" for John Thanos.

Did this one relatively humane execution balance out a violent murder -- much less three violent murders? Can any execution really be said to "even the ledger" for the taking of another's unique life?

Contrast that with the case of Kirk Bloodsworth, also in Maryland, who was convicted and sentenced to death for rape and murder in 1985. Eight years later, DNA evidence proved his innocence and he was released. In Illinois, 12 people have been executed since 1977. But over that same time, 18 death-row inmates have been released after evidence proved they were innocent.

These examples prompt a deeper question. Notwithstanding the executions of the rightly convicted, can the death penalty ever be justified as public policy when it inherently necessitates the occasional taking of wrongly convicted, innocent life? In Maryland, since 1978, we have executed five people and set one convicted man free when his innocence was discovered. Are any of us willing to sacrifice a member of our own family -- wrongly convicted, sentenced and executed -- in order to secure the execution of five rightly convicted murders? And even if we were, could that public policy be called "just"? I do not believe it can.

But what about the deterrent value of the death penalty? Does the use of the death penalty -- while rarely, if ever, "just" -- save more innocent lives than it takes? The evidence indicates that it does not.

In 2005, the murder rate was 46 percent higher in states that had the death penalty than in states without it -- although they had been about the same in 1990. And while the murder rate has gone down across the board since 1990, it declined by 56 percent in states without the death penalty but only 38 percent in states that have it. It would appear that the death penalty is not a deterrent, but possibly an accelerant, to murder.

And what of the tremendous cost of pursuing capital punishment? In 2002, Judge Dale Cathell of the Maryland Court of Appeals wrote that, according to his research, processing and imprisoning a death penalty defendant "costs $400,000 over and above . . . a prisoner serving a life sentence." Given that 56 people have been sentenced to death in Maryland since 1978, our state has spent about $22.4 million more than the cost of life imprisonment. That's nearly $4.5 million "extra" for each of the five executions carried out. And so long as every American is presumed innocent until proven guilty, the cost of due process will not go down.

If, however, we were to replace the death penalty with life without parole, that $22.4 million could pay for 500 additional police officers or provide drug treatment for 10,000 of our addicted neighbors. Unlike the death penalty, these are investments that save lives and prevent violent crime. If we knew we could spare a member of our family from becoming a victim of violent crime by making this policy change, would we do it?

And if the death penalty as applied is inherently unjust and lacks a deterrent value, we are left to ask whether the value to society of partial retribution outweighs the cost of maintaining capital punishment. While I am mindful of and sensitive to the closure (and in some cases the comfort) that the death penalty brings to the unfathomable pain of families that have lost loved ones to violent crime, I believe that it does not.

Human dignity is the concept that leads brave individuals to sacrifice their lives for the lives of strangers. Human dignity is the universal truth that is the basis of ethics. Human dignity is the fundamental belief on which the laws of this state and this republic are founded. And absent a deterrent value, the damage done to the concept of human dignity by our conscious communal use of the death penalty is greater than the benefit of even a justly drawn retribution.

The writer, a Democrat, is governor of Maryland.

Officer Charged With Molesting, Photographing Woman During Traffic Stop (WP)

By Raymond McCaffrey

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

An Anne Arundel County police officer was charged with a sex offense yesterday, accused of coercing a woman to bare her breasts during a traffic stop, then molesting and photographing her. He told her she could avoid jail if she exposed herself, police said.

Joseph Mossmiller, 22, who joined the department in May, was charged before a District Court commissioner with a fourth-degree sex offense, second-degree assault, false imprisonment and misconduct in office, police said.

Three other officers were suspended in connection with the incident. Police declined to identify them or disclose what the led to their suspensions with pay except to say that they were also rookies but had not been at the scene of the traffic stop Jan. 20.

DOJ_NMG_0134826

According to charging documents filed in District Court, the 18-year-old woman was driving with a female passenger whom she had just picked up at a bar when she was pulled over by a marked police car in the Pasadena area.

According to the documents, Mossmiller "lectured her about the dangers of drinking and driving" before telling her to follow him as he drove toward her home. En route, Mossmiller pulled into a library parking lot, where he "told the girls to stay," returning about 10 minutes later, the documents say. The driver, "out of fear, chose to wait for the officer."

Police said Mossmiller then led the woman to the adjacent Community United Methodist Church parking lot, at 8680 Fort Smallwood Rd. in Pasadena, and asked her to step out of the car.

"He administered several field sobriety tests and then told her that if she and her friend showed him their breasts, then she would not go to jail," the documents say.

Although the passenger refused, the driver "began to lift her shirt," the documents say. Mossmiller "told her that was not good enough. He then placed his hand on her exposed breast and took a photograph utilizing the camera on his cellular telephone."

After the driver was told "that she was free to leave," she drove to a nearby police station to report the incident.

Mossmiller was released on his own recognizance yesterday after initially being sent to the county detention facility when he was unable to post a $250,000 bond, police said.

For Youths, A Grim Tour On Magazine Crews (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Two days after graduating from high school last June, Jonathan Pope left his home in Miamisburg, Ohio, to join a traveling magazine sales crew, thinking he would get to “talk to people, party at night and see the country.”

Over the next six months, he and about 20 other crew members crossed 10 states, peddling subscriptions door to door, 10 to 14 hours a day, six days a week. Sleeping three to a room in cheap motels, lowest seller on the floor, they survived some days on less than $10 in food money while their earnings were kept “on the books” for later payment.

By then, Mr. Pope said, he had seen several friends severely beaten by managers, he and several other crew members were regularly smoking methamphetamine with prostitutes living down the motel hallway, and there were warrants out for his arrest in five states for selling subscriptions without a permit.

“I knew I was either going to be dead, disappeared or I don’t know what,” Mr. Pope said.

After persuading his manager to let him leave, Mr. Pope was dropped off, without a ticket, $17 in his pocket, at a bus terminal near San Antonio, more than 1,000 miles from home.

More than two decades after a Senate investigation revealed widespread problems with these itinerant sellers, and despite several highly publicized fatal accidents and violent crimes involving the sales crews in recent years, the industry remains almost entirely unregulated. And while the industry says it has changed, advocates and law enforcement officials say the abuses persist.

In interviews over seven months, more than 50 current and former members from almost as many crews painted a similar picture of life on the road.

With striking uniformity, they told of violence, drug use, indebtedness and cheating of customers during their cross-country travels, often in unsafe vehicles and with drivers who lacked proper licenses.

“The stories about life on crew you hear from these kids are almost unbelievable,” said Officer George Dahl of the Louisville, Ky., Metro Police Department, who estimated that his department had cited or arrested more than 70 sellers for assault, unlawful solicitation or drug possession in the last two years. “But you get them alone and start hearing the same sort of thing over and over from different crews and you start believing them.”

In Collinsville, Ill., Daniel Burrus scrolled through digital photographs of bloodied faces as he described how, on a crew he helped manage for several years, men who missed their sales quota were forced to fight each other.

In Flagstaff, Ariz., Isaac James sat with his wife and newborn daughter as he told how he and others on his mag crew — as they are typically called — stole checkbooks, jewelry, medicine-cabinet drugs and even shoes from customers’ homes.

Last October, Jonathan Gagney joined a mag crew to escape the “crack scene” back home in Marlborough, N.H. But one night last month, he called this reporter from a bus station in St. Petersburg, Fla., to say he had just sneaked away from his motel to run away from his crew.

“All I know is this guy got beaten and there was blood all over the motel wall,” Mr. Gagney said, his voice shaking.

Earlene Williams, director of Parent Watch, an industry watchdog group, said her organization got about 10 e-mail messages or calls a day, double the number since 2003, seeking help from sellers, their families or lawyers.

DOJ_NMG_0134827

"Publisher's Sweepstakes is a lot smaller than it used to be, and so the magazine industry is less able to get subscriptions that way now," Ms. Williams said, explaining why she was seeing an increase in problems with crews. "And the telemarketing no-call list has also pushed the publishers away from telemarketing and toward door-to-door crews."

Last year in response to a similar increase in calls, the National Runaway Switchboard began training its operators to handle the cases.

A Complex Industry

Dan Smith, a lawyer for the National Field Selling Association, which represents about 60 percent of the magazine sales industry, estimated that 2 percent to 3 percent of all magazine subscriptions, or at least $147 million worth in 2005, were sold by door-to-door salespeople, up from about 1 percent, or at least $69 million in 2000. But the Magazine Publishers Association disagreed with Ms. Williams and Mr. Smith. It does not believe that door-to-door magazine sales have grown, and estimated that they account for 1 percent of sales.

The industry consists of layers. While the bulk of subscriptions are sold directly by publishers and through direct mail, insert cards and the Internet, many magazine publishers also hire clearinghouses. These companies then subcontract with crew managers who hire door-to-door sellers. These layers of middlemen, and the small percentage of total subscription revenue involved, may help explain why publishers, who are always eager to increase readership, have been unwilling or unable to prevent mag crews from operating.

Just who uses mag crews is in dispute. Crew members and the National Field Selling Association say many of the largest publishers use magazine crews or clearinghouses that rely on them. But of the five largest publishing companies — Time Inc., Condé Nast, Hearst, Meredith and Reader's Digest Association, which collectively make up nearly half the industry as measured by advertising revenue — four said they did not use mag crews or did so only sparingly.

A representative for Reader's Digest said, "A portion of our subscriptions come in through third-party agents, who may in turn subcontract to local vendors."

Dozens of magazines are listed on order forms offered by crews, including Reader's Digest, Rolling Stone and Redbook.

Rolling Stone declined to comment. A representative for the Hearst Corporation said that in recent years it had stopped hiring clearinghouses that use crews. But when subsequently asked why Redbook, a Hearst publication, appears among magazines sold by one crew, a Hearst representative e-mailed, "We constantly fight unauthorized agents," adding, "It's an ongoing battle."

Generally, the clearinghouses get about 40 percent of the subscription money and the publishers about 10 percent. The crew leaders get the other 50 percent, out of which they pay all expenses on the road, including the sellers' commissions.

"Nobody is forced or pushed to do anything," said Tim Peek, manager and recruiter for New Generation, a crew based in Vero Beach, Fla.

Drugs and violence are forbidden, and some sellers make $1,000 per week, which is kept in a savings account for them, Mr. Peek said, adding, "If they don't want to work, they don't make money."

John Wigman, the manager of Mr. Pope's crew, Periodical and Publications Connections, said, "I don't see why you don't tell about all the kids on drugs that we help out." Asked to elaborate, provide names or respond to Mr. Pope's accusations, Mr. Wigman refused and hung up.

Mr. Smith said he viewed most stories of drug use and physical abuse as exaggerations. "I don't put a lot of stock in them because, to be brutally frank with you, abuse is like beauty. It's in the eyes of the beholder," he said. "A loud voice, anything, can be called abuse."

While there may be a few shady operators, he said, the industry has cleaned itself up over the years, and his organization has helped through broad distribution of pamphlets on professional courtesy and ethics, yearly training seminars for members and one-on-one discussions with managers who have problems on their crews.

By pressuring members to perform background checks on new hires, the association has cut the number of crimes and cheating perpetrated by sellers, Mr. Smith said. No one is forced to stay on crew, he added, since the association pays for a bus ticket home for any crew member who wants to leave.

But labor and law enforcement officials said that since many sellers were runaways or high school dropouts or were from dysfunctional families or poor neighborhoods, they had fewer options and were reluctant to report mistreatment or leave.

Many former sellers also said they kept quiet about problems out of fear of violence against them or those they left behind.

Sellers reported having adopted fake names upon joining a crew, being beaten if they attracted police attention and receiving mail sent from home only after it was opened by the company's central office. "What happens on crew, stays on crew" was a common refrain.

DOJ_NMG_0134828

An escape from small-town boredom or overbearing parents, working on a mag crew is a lifestyle more than a job, and it brings good times with the bad. Like gangs, crews become family, sellers said, and the camaraderie of shared experiences is a bond not easily broken.

"You're involved in bad stuff, you're seeing bad stuff and they tell you, 'No negativity,' " said Jennifer Steele, 23.

In September 2004, Ms. Steele said, she was drugged and raped by two men who were partying with crew members at a motel in Memphis, where her crew, Precision Sales, was staying. When her manager told her to go back to work the next day, she said she "threw a fit." But she did as she was told, and worked part of the day before filing a police report and having a rape kit performed. She stayed with the crew for another seven months before quitting.

"I know it sounds crazy," Ms. Steele said. "But I believed my manager when he said he would never let that happen again, and I believed him when he said my mom had told him she didn't care about me."

In January 2006, Ms. Steele left her crew and was placed in the witness protection program during an investigation of her former managers, who were accused in the beating and kidnapping at gunpoint of her boyfriend from a city bus, an incident that was caught on videotape and led to the conviction of one person for kidnapping for ransom and assault with a deadly weapon.

"They're frustrating cases," said Sgt. Jeanine Lum of the Norwalk Sheriff's Station in Norwalk, Calif., near Los Angeles, who was involved in the investigation.

"The ones we arrest at the doors often just need to be sent home," Sergeant Lum added, "while the real culprits are back at the hotel or in some office somewhere."

Few Legal Protections

Regulating the industry has been difficult because the companies, many of them operating only out of post office boxes, are small and frequently change names.

"The local police can't keep up because the crews leave the state before they get alerted and the feds don't bother with them because they say it is a state's issue," said Connie Knutti, who investigated several crews before she retired in 2005 as manager of field enforcement for the Illinois Department of Labor.

The sellers have few labor protections because they are classified as independent contractors, which also insulates the companies from regulation, taxes and liability. Categorized as outdoor sellers, the door-to-door peddlers are also exempt from most federal and state minimum wage and overtime requirements.

A majority of former crew members said that while they occasionally made several hundred dollars a week, most of the time they received little more than the daily allowance of $15, while the rest of their earnings stayed on the books to cover expenses. Many also said that subscriptions for magazines were never actually fulfilled.

On any given day, said Mr. Smith, the association lawyer, there are probably about 2,500 people, typically ages 18 to 24, selling magazines door to door.

But when state and federal labor department officials held a conference in 1999 to discuss concerns about the industry, a panel concluded that the number of sellers was probably closer to 30,000, said Darlene Adkins, vice president of public policy for the National Consumers League's Child Labor Coalition. That organization ranks traveling magazine sales among the five worst jobs for teenagers.

Catherine Barbour said it was the constant traveling and working in dangerous areas that most worried her when her daughter, Tracy Jones, said she was joining a crew. "I told her no, absolutely not," Ms. Barbour said. "But she was 18, so what could I do?"

On Nov. 15, Ms. Jones disappeared while selling subscriptions at a Pilot Truck Stop in North Little Rock, Ark. Ms. Jones was found 11 days later, stabbed to death, in a ditch near Route 61 in southwestern Memphis.

Up at 7 a.m., typical crews start the day with a sales meeting where they rehearse their pitches. "We're selling magazines to earn points in a contest to win a trip abroad" is the standard and sometimes fictitious spiel. Around 9 a.m., the crews pile into vans to be dropped off at the day's territory. They switch neighborhoods every several hours and often work as late as 10 p.m.

"You work hard during the day, but you also party pretty hard at night," said Stephanie Blake, 23, who wrote an e-mail message in November to Earlene Williams at Parent Watch because she said she wanted to tell the positive side of the work.

While she and others used methamphetamine, Ms. Blake said it was mostly marijuana, alcohol and sex that filled the nights.

"But there is a lot more to crew than that," she said, recounting having made some of her best friends, including her fiancé, working on the crew. Coming from Evansville, Ind., Ms. Blake said she relished the chance to see the country. The expense-paid trips to Walt Disney World in Orlando, Fla., and a resort in Mexico were more fun than she had ever imagined having, she said. "I still miss it sometimes," she added.

About a half hour into the conversation, however, Ms. Blake's tone began to shift. "I have to admit, some things did get to me about crew life," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0134829

The 100 sit-ups and pushups for every number a seller was below her daily quota felt "cultish," she said. The beatings were also unsettling. But the most galling part, Ms. Blake said, was the unfulfilled promise of big money.

When she and her fiancé finally decided to leave their crew in December 2003, Ms. Blake said, they sneaked away late one night from the motel near Houston where they staying. Asked why she left without demanding to be paid what was still "on the books," she said, "These aren't the types who you just go up to and ask to settle up."

Michael Simpson is one reason.

For two years starting in February 2004, Mr. Simpson, a stocky former high school lacrosse player from Newburgh, N.Y., worked on several crews as an "enforcer." His job, he said, was to beat crew members upon a manager's request.

If sellers missed quota regularly or complained about the job, Mr. Simpson, 23, said he hit them while in their room or when they were alone in the van. On more than 30 occasions, he estimated, he and several other enforcers drew blood. In three instances, ambulances were called, he said. Dealing with the police was not a problem.

"You have one kid saying he was jumped and 20 others plus two managers saying he stole something or broke into a room and assaulted a girl," Mr. Simpson said. "Who do you think the cops are going to believe?"

Daivet McClinton, 23, an enforcer who worked with Mr. Simpson, said talking in front of others about wanting to quit invited the worst beatings.

Asked if they ever went overboard, both men recalled an incident in November 2005 involving an 18-year-old recruit from Dayton, Ohio, named Rudy. "All we were told was that Rudy had shoved and disrespected the manager," Mr. Simpson said.

For 10 uninterrupted minutes in a motel stairwell in San Francisco, Mr. Simpson, Mr. McClinton and four other enforcers beat Rudy unconscious, Mr. Simpson and Mr. McClinton said. One held his mouth shut. Two others pinned down his arms and legs. Tearing off his shirt, they pressed a flaming lighter into his back. Mr. Simpson kicked him in the face and body. "I stopped because I ran out of breath," Mr. Simpson said.

Rudy, they said, was taken away in an ambulance.

Darting a glance at his new girlfriend and his chin quivering momentarily, Mr. Simpson explained why he decided to leave last February. "I'd gone from being a kid who was afraid of hitting people in the face to someone who was using objects," he said.

Still, some current crew members said the work had helped them turn their lives around.

"I was in and out of juvenile facilities, and now I'm actually going somewhere," said Jordan Friedley, standing in a shopping mall in Oceanside, Calif., near San Diego, where, for two days, a reporter shadowed two crews, Magnificent Sales and Thoroughbreds, both from Alliance Service Company. "They keep things on the up and up, no drugs or none of that, and I bring in $700 a week."

Asked about incidents in the last five years involving the two crews, including two fatal drug overdoses and the deaths of two crew members in the crash of a crew van, Mr. Friedley fell silent.

Crystal Hall, who helps manage the crews, said: "We've cleaned things up. Everyone is drug-tested now. They show up dirty, they're gone. Those who stay have plenty of chance to make money."

The Money 'Flows Up'

Since pay is purely on commission, Mr. Smith, the association lawyer, said that only the best sellers survived and that about 20 percent of recruits left in less than a month.

Matt Ward, a former bookkeeper for several crews, said there were other reasons for the high attrition. "Money in this industry flows up," Mr. Ward said. "It doesn't trickle down."

For about two years starting in 1998, Mr. Ward did bookkeeping for several crews with American Community Services, a company with several hundred sellers that is based in Indiana. It is owned by two of Mr. Ward's brothers, LeVan and Albert Ellis, who declined to answer questions both over the telephone and sent by certified mail.

Mr. Ward said that while the company should be commended for sticking to its strict antiviolence policies, he left in 2000 after becoming uncomfortable with what he saw while he was keeping the books.

"The sales agents remain almost always in the red while the managers, car handlers and everyone else is in the black almost from the start," Mr. Ward said between shifts at a restaurant in downtown Washington, where he now waits tables.

Of the more than 400 sales agents whose accounts Mr. Ward said he handled, he estimated that fewer than 40 left the company having made money. The rest spent their earnings on the road or, more often, to cover their daily deductions for room expenses, gas and meals.

This is not a new criticism. In 1987, during the Congressional investigation of the industry, the Senate committee reviewed the records of one company and found that of its 418 sellers, 413 had finished the year in debt to the company, even though the company itself had reported large annual profits.

Ms. Williams, from Parent Watch, said her organization advised customers not to buy from the sellers or to let them in the house, but to offer them a phone to call home or her organization's phone number to help anyone who might want to arrange a bus ticket home. She said her organization had lobbied for legislation to prevent sellers from being categorized as independent contractors and to provide them with minimum wage and safety and health protections.

DOJ_NMG_0134830

“Leave these kids off radar as they are now,” Ms. Williams said, “and the abuses will continue.”

Teen 'Sport Killings' Of Homeless On The Rise (CNN)

By Ashley Fantz, Cnn

CNN, February 21, 2007

MILWAUKEE, Wisconsin (CNN) -- All Nathan Moore says he wanted to do was smoke pot and get drunk with his friends.

Killing Rex Baum was never part of the plan that day in 2004.

"It all started off as a game," Moore said.

The 15-year-old and his friends were taunting the homeless man -- throwing sticks and leaves -- after having a couple of beers with him.

No big deal, Moore says, but he's sorry for what came next.

It was a mistake, he said, a sudden primal surge that made him and his friends Luis Oyola, 16, and 17-year-old Andrew Ihrcke begin punching and kicking Baum.

"Luis says 'I'm gonna go hit him,' We're all laughing, thought he was joking around,'" but he wasn't, Moore concedes. "We just all started hitting him."

They hurled anything they could find -- rocks, bricks, even Baum's barbecue grill -- and pounded the 49-year-old with a pipe and with the baseball bat he kept at his campsite for protection.

Ihrcke smeared his own feces on Baum's face before cutting him with a knife "to see if he was alive," Moore said.

After destroying Baum's camp, the boys left the homeless man -- head wedged in his own grill -- under a piece of plastic where they hoped the "animals would eat" him.

Then, Moore says, they took off to grab a bite at McDonald's.

Baum's murder was indicative of a disturbing trend.

A National Coalition for the Homeless report says last year, there were 122 attacks and 20 murders against the homeless, the most attacks in nearly a decade. (Coalition report on 2006 homeless attacks)

Police found Baum's body two days after the teens attacked him.

They bragged about it around town. Police picked them up and they described what happened.

Ihrcke told police that killing "the bum" reminded him of playing a violent video game, a police report shows.

All three teens pleaded no contest to first degree reckless homicide charges and went to prison.

Moore recently turned 18 at Columbia Correctional Institution in Portage, Wisconsin, where he is serving a 15 year sentence.

"When [the beating] stops, you say, 'What did we just do?'" he told CNN. "There's no rational explanation." (Watch teen explain how "game" became tragedy)Teenage 'amusement'

"It's disturbing to know that young people would literally kick someone when they're already down on their luck," said Michael Stoops, the executive director of the Washington-based National Coalition for the Homeless. "We recognize that this isn't every teenager, but for some this passes as amusement."

Criminologists call these wilding sprees "sport killing," -- largely middle-class teens, with no criminal records, assaulting the homeless with bats, golf clubs, paintball guns. (Watch how nights are cold, fearful for Milwaukee homeless)

Some teens have even taped themselves in the act. Others have said they were inspired by "Bumfights," a video series created in 2002 and sold on the Web that features homeless people pummeling each other for the promise of a few bucks.

A segment called "Bum Hunter," hosted by a Crocodile Hunter-like actor wearing a safari outfit, shows him "tagging" homeless people by pouncing on them and binding their wrists.

The distributors of "Bumfights" have claimed they've sold hundreds of thousands of copies.

But the company has had to deal with a couple of legal issues unrelated to the Baum case.

Last year, three former homeless stars of "Bumfights" won a civil suit against filmmakers. Santa Monica attorney Mark Quigley, who represented Rufus Hannah, known as "Rufus the Stunt Bum" to series' fans, said he is unable to disclose the amount of the settlement.

Also, in July 2006, a California judge ordered "Bumfights'" producers Ryan McPherson and Zachary Bubeck to spend 180 days in jail for failing to perform community service related to guilty pleas they previously entered to charges of staging illegal street fights.

"Bumfights" directors did not answer CNN's request for an interview. Attacks across the nation

DOJ_NMG_0134831

Incidents of teen-on-homeless violence dotted the map last year. Florida racked up at least six such attacks in 2006. (Homeless attack across U.S.)

In Lauderhill, four teens were arrested after they allegedly videotaped themselves beating, dragging, and stealing from a homeless man.

The victim has not been found, but the four face one charge each of strong-armed robbery.

Earlier this month, teens in Corpus Christi, Texas, videotaped themselves attacking a homeless man.

Commander David Torres said police arrested a 15-year-old and are looking for at least one more teenager and a 22-year-old who described on tape what they were about to do before they jumped on the man. (Read full story)

On the other side of the nation, former Oregon State University student Joshua Grimes stands accused of shooting and injuring a homeless man from his perch in a fraternity house window.

He has not yet entered a plea, but, according to a police report, he cried to detectives after the October shooting, telling them, "I didn't mean to shoot him."

At least three homeless people in Kalamazoo, Michigan, reported being attacked by teens on bicycles during a 10-day span in October, according to the homeless coalition.

In Huntsville, Alabama, six teens -- one of them 13 -- beat a homeless man with golf clubs, the coalition reported. But perhaps the most shocking of these examples was 2006's first recorded case of teen-on-homeless violence.

On January 12 in Fort Lauderdale, Florida, a surveillance camera captured two teens beating a homeless man with bats.

Prosecutors say 17-year-old skateboarder Tom Daugherty, 18-year-old Brian Hooks, a popular hockey team captain, and a third unseen teen, Billy Ammons, a high school dropout, assaulted two more homeless men that night.

One of them was 45-year-old Norris Gaynor. A witness, Anthony Clarke, told police and CNN last year that he saw the three teens approach Gaynor as he slept on a park bench. Daugherty began whacking Gaynor with a bat, Clarke said. (Watch two teenagers beat a cowering homeless man with bats)

As Gaynor lay dying, Ammons shot him with yellow paintballs, later remarking that the beating felt like "teeing off," police said.

Gaynor was beaten so badly his own father didn't recognize him. Facing life in prison, the teens face trial for murder later this year. They have each pleaded not guilty to one count of first-degree murder and two counts of attempted murder. (Read full story)Lingering questions

Stoops and Brian Levin, a California State University hate crimes expert, say common themes run through teen-on-homeless violence. The attackers are almost always boys, peer pressure and mob mentality sweep away caution, and parents don't suspect their children could be capable of such actions.

Laura Simpson didn't. Her son, Justin Brumfield, is serving an 11-year prison stretch in California.

In August 2005, Brumfield and William Orantes, both 19, beat 56-year-old Ernest Adams with bats. Adams emerged from a coma three weeks later with dents in his skull, permanent scars and no vision in one eye, the Los Angeles Times reported. Orantes is serving a three-year sentence.

Simpson, a sixth-grade teacher, says she is still tormented by her son's actions and wonders if her son's irritability was more than typical teenage moodiness.

She has other questions: Was her son, a natural follower, just succumbing to peer pressure? Was he that into "Bumfights"? Did he see the fear in Adams' eyes when he raised the bat to strike him?

In a sad irony, she had adopted him; his mother was a homeless drug addict, a revelation he had learned not long before the beating and which his attorney used to explain his rage.

Her son has told her he is sorry for what happened, but her questions remain unanswered.

"As a parent, of course you're going to question yourself," she said. "It was just hard to comprehend. The first thing was, 'Not Justin. There has to be a mistake,'" she said. "You think you know everything that's going on and you don't."

When the mob mentality takes over, even the perpetrators may not comprehend what's going on.

Back at the prison in Wisconsin, Nathan Moore seems baffled by his own actions. Killing Rex Baum now registers like a "blur" or "dream," he says.

Moore and his friends knew Baum from around town. Life had been painful for the homeless man from the start; alcohol eased it. As a kid growing up in Milwaukee, when his home life became too rocky, a neighboring family took him in. He drifted through school and a brief stint in the military, his friends say, a wanderer, a loner. (Audio Slide Show: Remembering Rex Baum)

Homeless for years, he defied Wisconsin winters by constantly walking around the city, bundled in a coat patched with duct tape. For a few dollars, he pumped gas, shoveled snow off driveways, and walked neighborhood dogs.

More than 100 people came to Baum's funeral. Someone sent a newspaper clip of the story to Moore in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0134832

"Every day I wish I could take it back," he said. "I seen [the] repercussions among everyone. I didn't think about any of this when [the beating] was going on."

Half A Shield Is Better Than None (NYT)

By Geoffrey R. Stone

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

AS the new Democratic Congress moves ahead decisively on a panoply of issues, it should confront a particularly pressing one: freedom of the press. Congress should expeditiously enact a federal journalist-source privilege law, which would protect journalists from compelled disclosure of their sources' confidential communications in the same way psychiatrists and lawyers are protected. Importantly, neither Congress nor the press should be unwilling to compromise when the alternative is to forgo such a privilege altogether.

A strong and effective journalist-source privilege is essential to a robust and independent press and to a well-functioning democratic society. It is in society's interest to encourage those who possess information of significant public value to convey it to the public, but without a journalist-source privilege, such communication will often be chilled because sources fear retribution, embarrassment or just plain getting "involved."

As we have seen over the past several years, particularly with the federal investigation of the leak of the identity of former C.I.A. operative Valerie Plame, the absence of a journalist-source privilege leads to confusion, uncertainty and injustice. At the hands of unrestrained federal prosecutors, journalists have taken a serious battering.

There is nothing novel in the call for such a privilege. At present, 49 states and the District of Columbia recognize some version of it. The federal government is long overdue to enact such a privilege as well. This issue has often been before Congress, but Congress has consistently failed to act, in part because the press has stubbornly insisted that anything less than a perfect privilege is unacceptable. We must move forward. The press can no longer afford to let the perfect be the enemy of the good.

Of the jurisdictions that protect a journalist-source privilege, only 13 states and the District of Columbia do so absolutely, meaning that under no circumstances can the state override the journalist's right to withhold privileged information. The advantage of the absolute privilege is that it provides clarity and certainty to sources, journalists, lawyers and courts. The disadvantage is that in some situations, it could deprive law enforcement of critical information.

In 36 other states, the journalist-source privilege is qualified, meaning that the government can require a journalist to reveal confidential information if the government can prove that it has exhausted alternative ways of obtaining the information and that the information is necessary to serve a compelling state interest.

So how would a qualified privilege work at the federal level? The issue most often arises over matters of national security. Suppose, for example, a journalist reports that she has been informed by a reliable source that an unidentified major building in New York City will be blown up by terrorists the following day. It would seem irresponsible, indeed insane, to allow the reporter to refuse to disclose the identity of the source. Certainly, the government has a compelling interest in forcing the reporter to reveal the name of the source so it can attempt to track him down and possibly prevent the attack.

The trouble is that even in this situation, the matter is not free from doubt. Without the protection of an absolute privilege, the source might not have been willing to disclose the information to the reporter in the first place. Public officials are certainly better off knowing that a threat exists, even if they do not know the identity of the source, than knowing nothing at all. Thus, breaching the privilege in even this seemingly compelling situation might in the long-run prove counterproductive to protecting national security.

Nonetheless, such situations are more hypothetical than real, and they should not determine the shape of the privilege we enact. If the press has to compromise by endorsing a law that would enable the government to pierce the privilege in order to address an imminent and grave threat to national security, it should do so. There is little gain in sacrificing the privilege altogether because of a struggle over an abstract principle that would govern situations that have never happened in American history and are unlikely to happen in the future. Politics is, as they say, the art of compromise.

A serious journalist-source privilege is imperative to the national interest. It should be high on the list of Congress's priorities for 2007. And it should be held hostage neither to hypothetical nightmare scenarios nor to the press's stubborn, if principled, insistence on more than it really needs.

CIVIL LAW:

Supreme Court Tosses $79.5 Million Verdict Against Cigarette Company (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court tossed out a $79.5 million award to a smoker's widow Tuesday in its first ever case testing punitive damages in a personal injury dispute.

The decision limits when jurors may consider the harm a company caused people who were not part of the case.

The 5-4 ruling is a victory for Philip Morris USA, which won another chance to challenge an Oregon jury's punitive damages award that was 97 times the actual damages for the death of Jesse Williams, a longtime Marlboro smoker.

IN-DEPTH: Court's opinion | On Deadline: Share your thoughts

The ruling follows a recent trend by the court to set criteria for awarding punitive damages, which are used to punish a defendant and deter wrongdoing. The justices found that jurors might have improperly considered the harm to numerous other Oregonians hooked on cigarettes.

William Ohlemeyer, vice president of Philip Morris USA, said the decision will ensure that companies are punished "only for harm caused to the plaintiff, and not to strangers."

Robert Peck, who represents Williams' widow, called the ruling "extremely narrow" and said juries generally were not trying to boost damages based on direct harm to third-parties.

The court did not rule on a second, more closely watched claim from Philip Morris that the award was "grossly excessive."

Tuesday's ruling could affect an array of cases that arise from an individual's injury, but have in the backdrop harm to other people, such as cases against automakers or drug companies.

Williams successfully sued Philip Morris for negligence and deceit after her husband died of lung cancer in 1997. She claimed that the company engaged in a fraudulent campaign to minimize the dangers of smoking. The jury awarded $821,000 in actual damages and $79.5 million in punitive damages.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stephen Breyer said the trial judge's instructions may have unconstitutionally led the jury to punish Philip Morris directly for harm to other smokers. He said evidence of such harm may be used to show that the company's misconduct was particularly reprehensible — a factor that may be considered in the amount of punitive damages, but one that is restricted.

The case now returns to Oregon courts.

Dissenting were Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

Supreme Court Voids $79.5 Million Award In A Tobacco Suit (MCT)

By Stephen Henderson

McClatchy Newspapers, February 20, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Supreme Court on Tuesday further tightened limits on punitive damages, tossing out a $79.5 million judgment against tobacco giant Philip Morris because jurors had agreed to the award, in part, to punish the company for harming people other than the plaintiff.

The ruling is a significant victory for businesses and their advocates, who've complained that the court's old rules allowed lawyers to win class action-sized judgments in individual lawsuits.

"Plaintiffs won't be able to incite jurors to assess runaway awards based on purported injuries to others," said Lori Nugent, a lawyer with the Cozen O'Connor law firm who specializes in defending corporations in punitive-damages suits. "Juries will evaluate punitive damages based solely on the defendant's conduct toward the plaintiff. This is a significant swing of the pendulum toward returning fairness to courtrooms across the country, and will make a meaningful difference in numerous cases that are set for trial and on appeal right now."

The decision extends a line of high-court rulings that have placed constitutional limits on punitive damage, a novel and somewhat controversial approach that's drawn sharp criticism even from some of the justices.

Tuesday's 5-4 ruling, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, said awarding damages to punish a company for harming nonparties to a suit amounted to taking property without due process. Breyer added: "to permit punishment for injuring a nonparty victim would add a near standardless dimension to the punitive damages equation. How many such victims are there? How seriously were they injured? Under what circumstances did injury occur? The trial will not likely answer such questions as to nonparty victims."

Tuesday's ruling involved a judgment obtained by Mayola Williams after her husband, Jesse, a smoker for 47 years, died of lung cancer. Williams alleged that Philip Morris, now part of Altria Inc., misled her husband into thinking that smoking was safe.

The jury found that Jesse Williams and Philip Morris were equally responsible for his death, and awarded his widow $800,000 in compensatory damages. But it went further, finding the company liable for $79.5 million in punitive damages for a campaign of deceit that allegedly led to health problems for smokers throughout Oregon. None of those smokers was a plaintiff in Williams' suit, yet the judgment reflected their injuries.

DOJ_NMG_0134834

The trial judge reduced Williams' award, but the Oregon Court of Appeals reinstated the larger amount and the Oregon Supreme Court upheld that judgment.

Breyer said that was unfair.

"A defendant threatened with punishment for injuring a nonparty victim has no opportunity to defend against the charge, by showing, for example in a case such as this, that the other victim was not entitled to damages because he or she knew that smoking was dangerous or did not rely upon the defendant's statements to the contrary," Breyer wrote.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts and Justices Anthony Kennedy, David H. Souter and Samuel A. Alito Jr. agreed with Breyer.

Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia, Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Clarence Thomas dissented.

The court's split in the case defies the crude political categorizations of the justices, and as a result is a poignant example of the court's tendency to cleave along strictly judicial lines in many cases.

Thomas and Scalia, for example, objected to Tuesday's ruling for the same reasons they've resisted all the court's decisions limiting punitive damages: They don't think that the Constitution addresses the issue.

That puts them at odds with Roberts, Alito and Kennedy, the remaining justices in the court's politically conservative wing. Kennedy long has agreed that the Constitution's due-process requirements prevent excessive punitive judgments. Roberts and Alito embraced that thinking for the first time on the high court in Tuesday's ruling.

Stevens' vote represents a departure for him on this issue; he penned the 1996 ruling that established constitutional limits for punitive damages, but said Tuesday's ruling went too far.

High Court Rejects $79.5 Million Award In Philip Morris Case (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court on Tuesday tossed out a $79.5 million punitive damage award won by a smoker's widow against Philip Morris, ruling that Oregon jurors improperly considered harm to other smokers in punishing the tobacco giant.

By a 5-4 vote, the Court said that a state violates the Constitution's due-process clause when it uses a punitive damage award to punish a defendant for injuries suffered by "strangers to the litigation," in the words of Justice Stephen Breyer, who wrote the majority opinion.

"A defendant threatened with punishment for injuring a nonparty victim has no opportunity to defend against the charge," Breyer wrote.

Business advocates applauded the ruling as a major body blow, grounded in the Constitution, against high punitive damage awards.

"This is a huge, huge win for corporate defendants," said Lori Nugent, chair of the enterprise risks practice of Cozen O'Connor in Chicago, and author of a state-by-state guide on punitive damages. "Lawyers who exhort jurors to send a message; that has to stop now. It rips the guts right out of a case."

But plaintiffs groups say the decision won't change much, especially since the Court on Tuesday also said that harm to others could still be considered by jurors in determining the defendant's level of "reprehensibility."

"Ultimately, I don't think this is going to be very significant. The Court was slaying dragons that don't exist," said Robert Peck, who argued the case on behalf of Mayola Williams, widow of longtime Oregon smoker Jesse Williams, whose estate won the case against Philip Morris. On remand to Oregon, Peck said, the case could still result in a significant punitive damage award.

The ruling also disappointed some business groups because it explicitly stopped short of setting numerical limits on excessive punitive damages -- a holy grail for critics of the tort system. The Court's sidestep caused some tobacco-company stocks to dip on Wall Street after the ruling.

The decision in Philip Morris USA v. Williams represented the first time Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr. showed their stripes on an issue that scrambles the usual alliances on the Court. Both Roberts and Alito joined the Breyer majority, along with Justices Anthony Kennedy and David Souter. In dissent were Justices Clarence Thomas -- who sees no limit to punitive damages written in the Constitution -- and Justices John Paul Stevens, Antonin Scalia and Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

It was also the first time that evidence of tobacco-company misconduct, dug up by years of discovery in litigation, was before the Court, albeit in the background. But Breyer's majority made scant mention of the evidence or of any particulars of Williams' case.

DOJ_NMG_0134835

Commentators and dissenters questioned how the Court's ruling will be applied in real courtrooms. Breyer said judges will have to be vigilant in ensuring that jurors only consider harm to others in assessing reprehensibility, not in deciding the level of punitive damages. "State courts cannot authorize procedures that create an unreasonable and unnecessary risk of any such confusion occurring," Breyer said.

"It seems, then, that jurors can think about harm to others in deciding that the conduct was awful enough to merit punitive damages" in the first place, said Michael Krauss, torts professor at George Mason University School of Law. "But then they can't think about it anymore, because when they set the amount of the damage award, the Court is saying it has to reflect only the harm to the plaintiff. You'll have to wash your brain out" between steps.

Krauss adds, "How you force the jury into this intellectual straightjacket isn't clear. What is clear is that this issue will be back before the Court."

Ginsburg in her dissent also predicted that the task of guiding jurors will be difficult. "A judge seeking to enlighten rather than confuse surely would resist delivering the requested charge."

She added that the majority should have shown greater respect to the Oregon Supreme Court and other state courts that have tried "diligently to adhere to our changing, less than crystalline precedent."

In another key business ruling from the Northwest on Tuesday, the Court ruled unanimously in favor of Weyerhaeuser, the timber company, in a dispute over "predatory bidding." Ross-Simmons, a sawmill company, claimed that Weyerhaeuser tried to drive it out of business by bidding up the price of red alder logs to a level that Weyerhaeuser could afford to pay, but Ross-Simmons could not.

In a ruling by Thomas, the Court agreed that the same standard used in antitrust "predatory pricing" cases should apply to bidding or buying cases -- a standard that is difficult for plaintiffs like Ross-Simmons to meet.

Supreme Court Puts New Rules On Damage Awards (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

An Oregon jury violated constitutional principles of fairness when it levied a $79.5 million punitive-damages award against the Philip Morris tobacco company in a single smoker lawsuit.

In a 5-to-4 decision announced Tuesday, the US Supreme Court struck down the verdict because it said the jury violated due-process protections when it sought to punish the tobacco company for injuries suffered by nonparties to the litigation.

Writing for the majority, Justice Stephen Breyer said the jury could consider Philip Morris's alleged deceptive conduct toward all smokers in Oregon in determining the reprehensibility of its conduct. But he said the jury could not then punish Philip Morris for that same conduct without violating the tobacco company's constitutional rights.

In reaching its decision, the court avoided addressing the most closely watched issue in the case: whether a nearly $80 million punitive-damages award for the widow of a smoker is constitutionally excessive.

"The Constitution imposes certain limits in respect both to procedures for awarding punitive damages and to amounts forbidden as 'grossly excessive,' " Justice Breyer writes. But he said the court would address only the procedural issue and leave it to the Oregon courts to address the issue of excessive punitive damages during any retrial.

The decision is important because it represents a move by the high court to impose constitutional limits on punitive-damage awards. But the decision also exposes sharp differences within the court on the issue.

Justices John Paul Stevens, Clarence Thomas, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg all filed dissents. Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Thomas joined Justice Ginsburg's dissent.

"While apparently recognizing the novelty of its holding, the majority relies on a distinction between taking third-party harm into account in order to assess the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct – which is permitted – from doing so in order to punish the defendant directly – which is forbidden," writes Justice Stevens in his dissent. "This nuance eludes me."

"A murderer who kills his victim by throwing a bomb that injures dozens of bystanders should be punished more severely than one who harms no one other than his intended victim," Stevens writes.

"There is no reason why the measure of the appropriate punishment for engaging in a campaign of deceit in distributing a poisonous and addictive substance to thousands of cigarette smokers statewide should not include consideration of the harm to those 'bystanders' as well as the harm to the individual plaintiff," Stevens writes.

The decision stems from an Oregon lawsuit filed in 1997 against Philip Morris by Mayola Williams after her husband, Jesse, died following a diagnosis of lung cancer. Mr. Williams had smoked three packs of cigarettes a day for 45 years.

Lawyers for Philip Morris told the jury that Williams accepted the risks of smoking despite government warnings about the dangers of cigarettes and tobacco.

DOJ_NMG_0134836

Mrs. Williams's lawyers countered that Philip Morris perpetrated a massive fraud by pushing an addictive and dangerous product on unsuspecting consumers. Tobacco company officials adopted a strategy of casting doubt on government health warnings, the lawyers said. The firms offered just enough of a crutch to allow addicted smokers – like Mr. Williams – the justification and reassurance to go ahead and ignore the government's warnings and continue their smoking habit, the lawyers told the jury.

Business and industry groups have been following the case, hoping the high court would use it to inject a higher level of predictability into American tort law. Business associations complain that in many states they face open-ended liability from jurors who view corporations as deep pockets capable of paying any penalty.

On the other side, trial lawyers, consumer groups, and health organizations were hoping the high court would back away from earlier efforts to limit what a majority of justices had viewed as excessive punitive damages. These groups see the threat of large punitive-damage awards as an effective deterrent against wrongdoing and as a positive force in society.

Justices Overturn Tobacco Award (WP)

By Robert Barnes, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

$80 Million Penalty Is Called Excessive

The Supreme Court yesterday overturned a nearly $80 million verdict intended to punish the Philip Morris tobacco company for endangering the lives of smokers, and the justices set limits on how jurors can decide to make big business pay for wrongdoing.

The court's narrowly written 5 to 4 decision said an Oregon court had improperly let jurors calculate the harm done to many in deciding damages paid to an individual.

The court ruled that the Constitution's due-process clause forbids a state to use punitive damages to punish a company for injury it inflicts upon others who are "essentially, strangers to the litigation," according to the majority opinion, written by Justice Stephen G. Breyer.

The case was seen at the beginning of the term as one of the most important business decisions that the court would make under new Chief Justice John Roberts Jr., and it was clearly a victory for Philip Morris and other big companies. It continues the reasoning in the court's recent rulings that punitive damages -- aimed at punishing a company and deterring more wrongdoing -- must be proportionate to the wrong committed.

But in sending the case back to Oregon courts for further litigation, the justices sidestepped a decision that industry had most wanted: whether to set a solid cap on how much could be awarded for punitive damages, perhaps based on a specific ratio to the actual damages done to the individual who brought the suit.

Still, business advocates praised the decision.

"This is a really important case for the business community, and a big win," said Robin Conrad, senior vice president of the National Chamber Litigation Center of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. She said it would be valuable to insurance companies, automakers, pharmaceutical manufacturers and other firms that have been hit with huge punitive-damages awards in recent years.

But Robert S. Peck, the Washington lawyer who represented the Oregon smoker's widow who brought the suit, said the decision "slays a dragon that didn't exist." Peck contended that the jury calculated its large award not on the number of other victims but on the company's profitability, and he predicted that Oregon courts will "reaffirm" that they "did the right thing."

How the jury decided the amount to award is unclear, and confusion at the Supreme Court oral arguments foreshadowed the justices' ultimate decision. "Isn't perhaps the better course to send this back to them . . .?" suggested Justice David H. Souter, who voted with the majority to do just that.

The case involved Jesse Williams, a Portland janitor who smoked at least two packs of Marlboros every day for 45 years and died of lung cancer in 1996. Philip Morris, now owned by Altria Group, had denied during that time that its cigarettes were addictive, and at trial, lawyers for his estate told the jury to consider the damage done to other smokers in Oregon.

The attorney for his widow, Mayola Williams, told the jury to "think about how many other Jesse Williams in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been."

The jury awarded Mayola Williams $821,000 in compensation and then tacked on the $79.5 million punitive award. (Not all states allow punitive awards; in Oregon, 60 percent of the award goes to the state, Peck said.) The nearly 100 to 1 ratio of punitive damages to compensatory damages is far outside the "single-digit" ratio the Supreme Court suggested in previous cases, but a firm limit has never been set.

The majority opinion issued yesterday agreed with Williams that the jury could hear evidence of harm to others to show that a company's conduct was reprehensible, which could increase the punitive-damages award.

DOJ_NMG_0134837

But Breyer wrote a "jury may go no further than this and use a punitive damages verdict to punish a defendant directly on account of harms it is alleged to have visited on nonparties."

Dissenting justices said they wondered how a judge could properly instruct a jury to consider what Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg called our "less than crystalline precedent."

The majority "relies on a distinction between taking third-party harm into account in order to assess the reprehensibility of the defendant's conduct -- which is permitted -- from doing so in order to punish the defendant 'directly' -- which is forbidden," Justice John Paul Stevens wrote. "This nuance eludes me."

The court's split in recent decisions limiting punitive damages is far different from the ideological differences that are apparent in many decisions on social issues. Breyer was joined by Roberts and Justices Samuel A. Alito, Anthony Kennedy and David H. Souter.

Stevens, who in the past has supported limiting the amounts of punitive awards, joined Ginsburg and Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

The case was sent back to the Oregon Supreme Court, which had upheld the large punitive award. Breyer wrote that the application of the court's standard may "lead to the need for a new trial, or a change in the level of the punitive damages award."

The case is Philip Morris USA v. Williams, case No. 05-1256. Also yesterday, the court ruled 5 to 4 that a Florida death row inmate could not challenge his conviction in the federal court system because he missed a one-year filing deadline.

High Court Denies Altria Damages, Sets No Formula (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Vanessa O'Connell

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court's move to throw out a $79.5 million award against Altria Group Inc.'s Philip Morris USA was another boon for corporate defendants. But it wasn't the knockout blow against punitive damages that business had sought.

The 5-4 ruling turned on the court's finding defendants can't be punished for harms suffered by consumers who aren't party to a lawsuit. But the justices refused to impose a formula, sought by business groups, that would limit punitive-damage awards.

· The News: The Supreme Court tosses out a $79.5 million punitive- damages award against Philip Morris.

· The Background: The court was asked to look at whether defendants could be punished for harm suffered by those who weren't party to the lawsuit.

· The Outlook: Judges likely will instruct jurors to avoid multiplying the harm of a single plaintiff to reach a punitive damage award, potentially reducing the size of such awards.

The ruling extended a string of recent decisions reining in the penalties juries can impose on corporate wrongdoers. Judges now will be more likely to instruct jurors to avoid simply multiplying the harm done to a single plaintiff to reach a punitive-damage award.

"If there are 10,000 widgets sold," a jury can't mechanically fix punitive damages by multiplying compensatory damages 10,000 times, said Sherman Joyce, president of the American Tort Reform Association, an industry group that filed a friend-of-the court brief siding with Philip Morris.

The original case turned on a jury award to Mayola Williams, who was awarded $821,000 in compensatory damages and nearly 100 times that amount in punitive damages in a lawsuit after the death of her husband, Jesse, in 1996. The state court jury in Oregon found his death was caused by cigarettes.

Writing for the five-member majority, Justice Stephen Breyer found that punitive awards partly based on harm to nonparties "amount to a taking of 'property' from the defendant without due process."

At the same time, recognizing that punitive damages are intended to punish wrongdoing and deter its recurrence, the court observed "that conduct that risks harm to many is likely more reprehensible than conduct that risks harm only to a few," so juries may take such factors into account when awarding damages.

"This nuance eludes me," wrote dissenting Justice John Paul Stevens. He argued there was no practical difference between directly punishing the defendant for harming third parties and increasing the punishment because harm to a single plaintiff was more "reprehensible" given its potential harm to others.

An immediate beneficiary of the ruling could be Merck & Co., which now faces some 28,000 lawsuits over its painkiller Vioxx.

Trying each complaint separately, Merck has won eight liability trials to date and lost four. One verdict in Merck's favor later was tossed out by a state court judge, while two Los Angeles state court cases resulted in mistrials Jan. 18. In all four losses, meanwhile, juries awarded plaintiffs punitive damages ranging from $1 million to $229 million. Two of the damage awards were later automatically reduced under Texas state law.

DOJ_NMG_0134838

Though the U.S. Constitution makes no mention of punitive damages, the court in recent years has found that some awards are so high as to violate due process.

In 1996, the justices threw out a $2 million punitive award won by a consumer who learned that his car salesman had concealed the fact that a new BMW had been damaged and repainted before sale. A 5-4 court, in an opinion by Justice Stevens, found the amount "grossly excessive" after considering the actual damages the plaintiff suffered, civil penalties for similar misconduct and the defendant's "degree of reprehensibility."

In 2003, in a 6-3 opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy, the court rejected a 145-to-1 punitive-to-compensatory damage ratio. A Utah court had awarded the damages to a policyholder who contended State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. had misled her into believing it would cover her liability for a car accident. The court suggested that "single-digit multipliers are more likely to comport with due process" than larger ones.

Industry groups were hoping the court would follow that ruling with an ironclad rule against double- or triple-digit multipliers. But the court said it need not reach that issue.

Bob Peck, the lawyer who represented Mrs. Williams, suggested the impact of the ruling would be muted. Jurors rarely multiply the victims to reach punitive awards, he said. The $79.5 million award in his case, he said, could be understood as "precisely 2.5 weeks' profit" for Philip Morris.

At the Supreme Court, Philip Morris argued that the original Oregon trial judge failed to instruct the jury in the proper way to consider harm to third parties. The judge declined to issue the company's proposed jury instruction, which would have advised that "although you may consider the extent of harm suffered by others" in assessing a proper penalty for Mr. Williams's death, "you are not to punish the defendant for the impact of its alleged misconduct on other persons, who may bring lawsuits of their own...."

Justice Breyer found that this jury instruction would have set the proper balance. Imposing damages for harm to nonparties would violate the Constitution's Due Process Clause, because the defendant would have no chance to defend against the charges, he wrote. Moreover, permitting such factors "would add a near standardless factor to the punitive damages equation."

The decision was notable as well for the split it signaled between Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, who have held that the Constitution didn't contemplate any limits on punitive damages, and the court's two newest members, Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito.

The chief justice and Justice Alito joined the majority along with Justices Anthony Kennedy and David Souter. Justices Scalia and Thomas joined the dissent by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, who wrote that the Oregon jury had properly considered "the extent of harm suffered by others as a measure of reprehensibility."

The case returns to the Oregon Supreme Court, which could order a new trial or issue a new opinion comporting with yesterday's decision.

The decision is unlikely to have an impact on class-action litigation, because in such lawsuits mass numbers of plaintiffs are formally represented.

Punitive damages are alleged in a majority of the pending cases against Philip Morris, which as of year end faced 196 pending suits brought by individual smokers, 10 class actions concerning smoking and health claims and 20 class-action lawsuits concerning its "light" cigarettes, among other litigation. In a number of states where antitobacco suits are pending, punitive damages don't exist, or are limited, tobacco lawyers note.

Justices Overturn $79.5 Million Tobacco Ruling (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — The Supreme Court on Tuesday overturned an Oregon jury's award of $79.5 million in punitive damages against Philip Morris on the ground that jurors might have improperly calculated the figure to punish the cigarette maker for the harm it caused to smokers other than the man whose widow brought the case.

Although of limited scope, the 5 to 4 decision was a victory for the cigarette industry and for other corporate defendants whose products or behavior have caused widespread injury and who are thus likely to face skeptical or hostile juries.

The court was tightly focused on a question of procedural fairness: the need, in the majority's view, to make sure that juries do not punish defendants for harm to others who are not parties to the lawsuit, or who even may have brought their own lawsuits previously and lost. "The due process clause prohibits a state's inflicting punishment for harm caused strangers to the litigation," Justice Stephen G. Breyer wrote in the majority opinion.

The court thus steered clear of the issue that most animates the debate over punitive damages: whether a punitive damage award that is much greater than the compensatory damages awarded by the jury can be considered unconstitutionally excessive. In this case, the ratio of punitive to compensatory damages was nearly 100 to one, but the court did not address the issue despite Philip Morris having raised it.

DOJ_NMG_0134839

What happens next in this lawsuit may provide an early indication of the practical significance of the court's ruling, as far as it went. The case now goes back to the Oregon Supreme Court, which has options ranging from reinstating the award to ordering a new trial. The original trial of the suit, brought by Mayola Williams, whose husband, Jesse, died of lung cancer after smoking two packs of Marlboros a day for 45 years, took place in 1999.

Mrs. Williams's lawyer asked the jury to "think about how many other Jesse Williams in the last 40 years in the state of Oregon there have been." The trial judge rejected a request by Philip Morris for an instruction warning the jury that "you are not to punish the defendant for the impact of its alleged misconduct on other persons."

The Supreme Court on Tuesday did not require any particular wording in the form of a jury instruction. But Justice Breyer said that state judicial systems had a constitutional obligation to avoid "an unreasonable and unnecessary risk" that a jury would calculate the punitive damages based on harm to those not before the court.

The issue is complicated because, under the Supreme Court's precedents, the "reprehensibility" of a defendant's conduct is a factor that a jury is explicitly directed to consider in setting a punitive damages award. Justice Breyer acknowledged that harm to others can serve as a measure of reprehensibility, and that jurors will necessarily consider it. That was appropriate, he said, as long as courts "provide some form of protection" against jurors seeking "to punish the defendant for having caused injury to others."

Sheila L. Birnbaum, a punitive damages specialist with Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom in New York, said the court was requiring jurors to "unring the bell" in a way that might prove difficult. "It's very hard for jurors to disregard something they have heard," she said.

Ms. Birnbaum, who successfully argued the most recent punitive damages case heard by the court before this one, on behalf of the State Farm insurance company in 2003, added that the decision was nonetheless "a step in the right direction" for corporate defendants because it would require trial judges and appellate courts to be attentive to the guidance that jurors receive.

Justice Breyer's majority opinion, Philip Morris USA v. Williams, No. 05-1256, was joined by Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and by Justices Anthony M. Kennedy, David H. Souter and Samuel A. Alito Jr. The dissenters were Justices John Paul Stevens, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas.

It is typical for the court's punitive damages rulings to cut across the usual ideological lines. In fact, the only real surprise was the vote by Justice Stevens, who had previously voted with the court's majority to support limits on punitive damages.

In his dissenting opinion, Justice Stevens said he was "firmly convinced" that those earlier decisions were correct. But he said that "in my view the Oregon Supreme Court faithfully applied the reasoning in those opinions to the egregious facts disclosed by this record." He said that "no procedural error even arguably justifying reversal occurred at the trial in this case."

The court's two new members, Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito, succeeded justices who supported limits on punitive damages, as they themselves did on Tuesday. But the narrowness of the court's opinion and its avoidance of the excessiveness issue raised the question of whether, beneath the surface stability, the court's polarity may have shifted.

In the State Farm case that Ms. Birnbaum argued four years ago, the court overturned a punitive damage award that was 145 times greater than the compensatory award. "Few awards exceeding a single-digit ratio" would meet the test of due process, Justice Kennedy wrote then for a 6-to-3 majority, a strong statement that made the court's failure on Tuesday to address the 97 to one ratio in the Philip Morris case all the more curious. (The Oregon jury awarded Mrs. Williams $821,000 in compensatory damages.)

To hold that a damage award is unconstitutionally excessive requires the court to accept the argument that the due process clause contains a substantive component as well as a procedural one. It is on this basis that Justices Scalia and Thomas, who do not accept the modern doctrine of "substantive due process," have dissented from the leading punitive damages decisions.

It is not implausible that Chief Justice Roberts and Justice Alito might share that view. Whether they do might become apparent if the Oregon Supreme Court reinstates the punitive damages verdict and Philip Morris comes back before the justices with a new appeal based on excessiveness.

The dissenters tweaked the majority for what they characterized as judicial activism and refusal to give state courts proper respect. "I would accord more respectful treatment to the proceedings and disposition of state courts that sought diligently to adhere to our changing, less than crystalline precedent," Justice Ginsburg said in an opinion that Justices Scalia and Thomas also signed.

In a prepared statement, William S. Ohlemeyer, vice president and associate general counsel of Philip Morris, a unit of Altria, said the decision would give the company "an opportunity to fully and fairly defend itself in this and other cases."

DOJ_NMG_0134840

Market analysts generally viewed the decision as positive for industry. “Despite a more narrow opinion than we had hoped for, we view the ruling as a positive as it effectively limits the size of punitive damages in future cases,” said Christopher R. Growe, an analyst at A. G. Edwards & Sons, in a note to investors.

In recent months, investors have pushed Altria’s stock to record highs, in part because they believe the litigation environment against tobacco companies has significantly improved. On Tuesday, Altria’s stock closed at $85.95, down 25 cents.

Reward To Smoker's Widow Nixed By Top Court (WT)

By Gregory Lopes

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court yesterday took away almost $80 million awarded to the widow of a longtime smoker and threw into doubt the prospects of future high-dollar jury awards against businesses.

A divided Supreme Court ruled 5-4 in favor of Altria Group, the parent of Richmond company Philip Morris USA and Kraft Foods, which contested an Oregon Supreme Court's upholding of an earlier verdict that forced the maker of the popular Marlboro cigarette to pay $79.5 million in damages.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer, writing for the majority, said a punitive-damages award based on a jury's desire to punish a defendant for harming those who are not parties to the lawsuit amounted to taking property from the defendant, which would be a violation of the constitutional right of due process. Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Samuel A. Alito Jr., Anthony M. Kennedy and David H. Souter made up the rest of the majority.

However, the court refused a request from the tobacco giant that it set a clear limit on the size of punitive damages awarded in tobacco cases.

"This decision is a big deal because it will have a tremendous impact on other industries facing similar litigation," said Robin Conrad, senior vice president of the National Chamber Litigation Center at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "The court's decision now provides businesses with additional protection against juries' arbitrary awards of punitive damages."

Jonathan S. Franklin, a D.C. lawyer, agreed, saying the ruling that juries can't consider the harm to others "limits the ability of plaintiffs to argue for enormous damage awards."

"This is not just a victory for the tobacco companies," he told the Associated Press, but it's good for any company that might be subject to product liability suits in which punitive awards might be involved.

But Justice Clarence Thomas, in his dissent, said the ruling leaves the court with no clear stance on punitive damages.

"Today's opinion proves once again that this court's punitive damages jurisprudence is 'insusceptible of principled interpretation.' "

The court's decision leaves U.S. juries to ponder punitive damages under this rule: The jury may consider actual or potential harm to others in deciding how reprehensible a company's conduct was, but may not punish the company for the harm caused to others.

"The court took a big wooden spoon and stirred up the swamp, making the view muddier than ever," said Steve Emmert, chairman of the appellate practice subcommittee for the Virginia state bar's litigation section. "I am convinced that this ruling will lead to confused juries looking to confused judges for guidance."

States will have some flexibility to determine the rules that will help minimize jury confusion over the standard set yesterday.

The justices did not split down party lines, further bolstering reaction from lawyers that yesterday's decision leaves punitive damage law on murky ground. The court last placed limits on such awards in 2003.

Mr. Emmert said the decision is likely to result in smaller dollar amounts awarded to defendants but will not slow the number of cases brought to courts around the country.

Just over one-fifth of U.S. adults smoked cigarettes in 2005, down from one-quarter of the country's adults a decade ago.

Mayola Williams sued Philip Morris for fraud on behalf of her husband, a two-pack-a-day smoker for 45 years, who died of lung cancer nine years ago. She argued the jury award was appropriate because it punishes Philip Morris' misconduct for a decades-long "massive market-directed fraud" that misled smokers into thinking cigarettes were not dangerous or addictive.

Philip Morris argued that the jury should have been told explicitly that other smokers must prove their own cases.

"We believe that this decision will provide Philip Morris USA with an opportunity to fully and fairly defend itself in this and other cases," said William S. Ohlemeyer, Philip Morris USA vice president and associate general counsel.

"There are clearly constitutional limits to the imposition of punitive damages, and today's decision makes clear that state courts must properly instruct juries on those limits to ensure that they are punishing only for harm caused to the plaintiff, and not to strangers."

DOJ_NMG_0134841

But the day was not a total success for cigarette makers, as the high court turned down the industry's bid to eliminate a 75-cent-per-pack fee on Minnesota residents that the state imposed to help pay for rising health care costs.

Reynolds American Inc., R.J. Reynolds Tobacco, Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco and Philip Morris said the fee unconstitutionally requires the companies to pay beyond the 1998 $200 billion settlement agreement the industry reached with states.

"This decision doesn't leave us anywhere to go," said David Howard, a spokesman for R.J. Reynolds. "It could give other states the opportunity to look at a similar tax. We think it is double dipping and would oppose it as a violation of the master agreement [1998 settlement]."

Shielding The Powerful (NYT)

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court's decision yesterday overturning a nearly $80 million punitive damage award against Philip Morris is a win for corporate wrongdoers. It stretches the Constitution's guarantee of due process in a way that will make it easier for companies that act reprehensibly to sidestep serious punishments.

It also provides unsettling new evidence that the court is more concerned about — and more willing to protect — the powerful than the powerless.

An Oregon jury awarded Mayola Williams, the widow of a cigarette smoker, about $821,000 in compensatory damages and $79.5 million in punitive damages. Ms. Williams argued that Philip Morris had spent 40 years denying the connection between smoking and cancer, even though it knew cigarettes were deadly. The Oregon Supreme Court upheld the punitive damages award, saying that Philip Morris's actions had been "extraordinarily reprehensible." By keeping Oregonians smoking longer than they otherwise would have, the court said, the company's actions would, "naturally and inevitably, lead to significant injury or death."

By a 5-to-4 vote that did not follow the usual ideological lines, the court ruled that the award was improper because it punished Philip Morris for harm done to people who were not part of the lawsuit. There is nothing unusual, or wrong, about courts considering the broader impact of a wrongdoer's misdeeds. As Justice John Paul Stevens noted in dissent, "A murderer who kills his victim by throwing a bomb that injures dozens of bystanders should be punished more severely than one who harms no one other than his intended victim." The fact that Philip Morris hurt so many other smokers along with Jesse Williams is surely relevant to its punishment.

The court in recent years has become increasingly activist when it comes to defending the rights of corporations by striking down punitive damage awards. And yesterday's ruling continues that trend. It expands the notion of due process. And it overturns the decisions of a jury and a state supreme court.

Unfortunately, the court has been far less activist when ordinary people seek protection or challenge their punishments. The ruling stands in particular contrast with the court's 2003 decision that the Eighth Amendment's ban on "cruel and unusual punishments" did not bar California, under its "three strikes" law, from sentencing a man to 50 years in prison for stealing $153.53 worth of videotapes. Yesterday's decision is another disturbing sign that — as the current court reads the Constitution — powerful parties have more rights than regular people.

Class Actions In Drag (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

The Supreme Court dealt another blow against runaway tort damages yesterday in a long-running case between Philip Morris and the late Jesse Williams, a heavy smoker whose Marlboro habit killed him. Maybe next time the Justices will go even further and provide some clearer guidance to lower courts.

The question before the High Court was how far a jury could go in awarding "punitive" damages, especially where the behavior being punished was deemed "reprehensible." In the original lawsuit, the jury awarded Mr. Williams's widow $79.5 million in punitive damages on top of $821,000 in compensatory damages, a tidy ratio of 97-1.

The opinion of the 5-4 majority, written by Justice Stephen Breyer, never addressed whether this ratio was "excessive," as the court has done in other recent cases. Instead the majority, which included Chief Justice John Roberts and Justices Samuel Alito, Anthony Kennedy and David Souter, ruled that Philip Morris had been punished not only for harm to Williams, the deceased, but to other smokers in the state -- a back-door class action, in effect.

This seems a sound impulse on a number of grounds. Our courts are already riddled with enough class actions without turning single-plaintiff cases into more of the same through the punitive-damages process. And awarding damages based on harm to what Justice Breyer calls "strangers to the case" risks seeing businesses dunned many times over when multiple plaintiffs sue over the same harm. The majority opinion concluded that harm to others could be taken into account in determining how "reprehensible" a tort was, but could not be figured into the punitive-damages award "directly."

DOJ_NMG_0134842

Ruth Bader Ginsburg was joined in dissent by Clarence Thomas, Antonin Scalia and John Paul Stevens. She argued, with some cause, that Justice Breyer's opinion was trying to maintain a distinction without much difference. And it is true that the Court offered little in the way of objective standards -- such as a firm ratio between compensatory and punitive damages -- to determine when a defendant was likely being punished for harm to others. But in affirming that procedural safeguards against excessive damages were necessary, at least the Court took another step in the direction of reining in huge punitive awards.

It is noteworthy, too, that the Court's two newest members joined the majority here. Justices Thomas and Scalia have long been skeptics of limitations on punitive damages and of the "substantive due process" arguments that lie behind yesterday's ruling. But in joining the majority, the Court's newest Justices demonstrated their awareness that, when punitive-damage awards grow large enough, real issues of justice and fairness (and thus due process) are implicated.

The Court currently has a petition before it to hear another punitive-damages case, this one involving a rollover in a Ford Explorer SUV. The case would give the Justices another opening to address what safeguards are necessary to ensure that the rights of defendants and plaintiffs alike are respected when it comes to the evidence and arguments that can be presented to ring up huge damage awards. In the long run, it may be that procedural safeguards on how these cases are argued and how juries are told to weigh the evidence could make judicial limits on outsize punitive damages less important, but yesterday's ruling in Philip Morris v. Williams is unlikely to be the final word.

Yesterday's ruling looks to be one more example of what Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals Judge J. Harvie Wilkinson III has astutely called the High Court's recent tendency toward "split the difference" jurisprudence. Rather than rooting decisions in the Constitution or statutory text, such reasoning tends to "relax constraints on judicial discretion" and thus augment the power of judges over the other branches, as Judge Wilkinson put it last year in the Stanford Law Review. We'd add that this habit is a specialty of Justices Breyer and Kennedy, both of whom love to play the role of King Solomon.

In any case, inflicting gigantic damages in civil cases without standards to guide either judges or juries are a real problem, despite what Justices Thomas and Scalia seem to believe. And in ruling that standards have to be applied in how these cases are argued -- and not only in the number that is finally arrived at -- the Court may have hit upon an important area for reform. But thanks to the Court's willingness to split too many differences, Philip Morris can't exhale just yet.

Surgeon, Chiropractors Charged In $6 Million Fraud Schemes (ATLBIZ)

Atlanta Business Chronicle, February 21, 2007

A federal grand jury handed down two separate health-care fraud indictments today, charging a total of five health-care providers with fraudulently billing approximately $6 million, principally for a back pain procedure.

According to the U.S. Attorney's office, Howard Berkowitz, 59, of Atlanta; Arthur Hargraves, 66, of Douglasville; and Daniel Puffenberger, 51, of Kissimmee, Fla., were each charged with five counts of health care fraud that they allegedly committed as owners of the Associated Spinal Care Network in Douglasville. The indictment alleges that Berkowitz was an orthopedic surgeon and the medical director of Associated Spinal Care, while the two other defendants were chiropractors. The indictment alleges that Associated Spinal Care, at the direction of the three, billed Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Georgia for over $3 million relating to the procedure from 2001 through 2005.

In another indictment, William Stearns, 45, of Marietta, Georgia, and Steven Levine, 50, of Roswell, were charged with health-care fraud and other violations that they allegedly committed as owners of the Comprehensive Care Medical Group in Marietta. Comprehensive Care, at the direction of Stearns and Levine, allegedly billed Blue Cross/Blue Shield of Georgia for approximately $1.8 million for the procedures in 2003 and 2004.

Separately, Stearns also allegedly submitted fraudulent bills to Blue Cross relating to a procedure in which an electrical stimulation machine was attached to the surface of a patient's body. The indictment alleges that Comprehensive Care fraudulently submitted over $1.5 million in bills for that procedure.

The cases are being investigated by the FBI.

Nine Doctors Indicted For Billing Fraud (OCR)

By Blythe Bernhard, The Orange County Register

Orange County Register, February 15, 2007

Total of 18 are accused of scheme to bilk Medicare.

Santa Ana federal grand jury indicted nine doctors and nine others Wednesday on charges of performing unnecessary treatments on mentally ill and elderly adults, and for fraudulently billing Medicare for more than $12 million.

DOJ_NMG_0134843

Physicians Paul Lessler, 68, of Corona Del Mar, Xinming Fu, 45, of Irvine, Michael Wayne Chapman, 53, of Cypress and David Todd Asher, 39, of Fullerton were among those charged with various counts of health care fraud, money laundering and conspiracy.

An attorney for Lessler said he hadn't yet read the indictment and declined to comment further.

According to the indictment, from 2001 to 2004 the doctors allegedly paid recruiters to find patients for respiratory therapy, regardless of their need for treatment. The recruiters would target boarding facilities for the elderly and physically or mentally disabled, including Royal Healthcare, a 66-bed facility in Anaheim.

A woman who answered the phone at Royal Healthcare declined to comment.

Administrators at the facilities were typically paid $100 per resident they referred to the recruiter, federal prosecutors said. Residents were lured to the near-daily treatments with soda, candy and doughnuts.

The treatments on dozens of patients included inhaled medications and chest manipulations. In some cases the treatments weren't performed, prosecutors said. Other times a respiratory therapist would perform the treatments without a physician's supervision, which is not allowed under Medicare rules.

"These people are being touched and given medications based on the payment of a kickback as opposed to medical necessity," said Assistant United States Attorney Jeannie M. Joseph. "I think it's egregious."

The doctors billed Medicare more than $12 million for the treatments, including some that were allegedly performed while the doctors were out of state. Treatments also were falsely billed as having taken place in the doctors' offices or mobile medical vehicles. Medicare prohibits the respiratory treatments from being performed at board-and-care facilities.

The other doctors named in the indictment include Alexander Zinovy Rivkin, 38, Gershon Walter Hepner, 68, and Ramin Sarshad, 38, of Los Angeles; Truc Huy Dao, of Rowland Heights and Aginah M. DeBerry, 54, of Colorado Springs, Colo.

Other Orange County residents indicted in the scheme include recruiter Glen Madrid, 42, of Yorba Linda and boarding care facility administrators Barbara Thrash, 56, of Garden Grove and Shahnaz Chadorbaf-Arastoo, 51, of Irvine.

All 18 defendants are expected to be arraigned March 19 in U.S. District Court in Santa Ana. The defendants face a maximum 10-year federal prison sentence for each health care fraud count, 20 years for each money laundering count and five years for each conspiracy count.

The investigation was conducted by the FBI, the U.S. Postal Inspection Service and the IRS.

Contact the writer: 714-796-6880 or bbernhard@ocregister.com

CIVIL RIGHTS:

AG Gonzales Touts Better Protection From Religious Discrimination (AP)

By Rose French

AP, February 21, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told Southern Baptists on Tuesday the Department of Justice is launching a new program to protect Americans from religious discrimination.

Gonzales said the First Freedom Project would increase education about religious discrimination by holding a series of training seminars throughout the country over coming months.

He also plans to create a Religious Freedom Task Force, which will review policies and religious discrimination cases. He said he doesn't yet know how much the program will cost.

"One of our most cherished freedoms ... is our religious freedom," he told leaders of the Southern Baptist Convention, the nation's largest Protestant denomination, in Nashville. "It is a fundamental part of our nation's history."

The first training seminar will be held in Kansas City, Mo., in March, followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., in April and Seattle, Wash., in May. Other dates and locations will be announced later.

As part of the new program, the Justice Department is also launching a Web site http://www.firstfreedom.gov, with information on enforcement and how to file a religious discrimination complaint.

On Tuesday the Justice Department also released its report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom, which highlights the number of religious discrimination cases reviewed or investigated by the Department of Justice for fiscal years 2001-06 compared to 1995-2000.

Gonzales said the report shows the Department of Justice has looked into more religious discrimination cases under the Bush administration.

The report details religious discrimination cases involving education, employment, housing, credit, public accommodations and public facilities, zoning and discrimination and bias crime.

DOJ_NMG_0134844

For example, he noted cases of religious discrimination in education increased from one case reviewed and no investigations to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations.

Housing- and credit-related cases grew from four investigations and one lawsuit to 18 investigations and six lawsuits while religion-related appellate friend-of-the-court briefs rose from one to 16.

The Department of Justice also reviewed 118 cases and 26 investigations related to land use issues, since the enactment in 2000 of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, which aimed to protect property rights of religious institutions.

Earlier this month, the Southern Baptists, who have long been among the most vocal Christian groups supporting the Bush administration, gave the president an award for advocating religious freedom.

The president has also spoken by video link to the Southern Baptist national convention three times.

Gonzales Says Religious Freedoms A Priority (TENN)

By Anita Wadhwani, Staff Writer

Nashville Tennessean, February 21, 2007

Attorney general tells Baptists of new federal effort

Saying the government has not always paid enough attention to religious discrimination, the country's top law enforcement official picked a gathering of Southern Baptist leaders in Nashville on Tuesday to announce a renewed push to protect religious freedoms.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the establishment of a new Religious Freedom Task Force and stepped up enforcement efforts.

"One of our most cherished freedoms … is our religious liberties," Gonzales told the gathering of about 100 Southern Baptists at the denomination's national headquarters in downtown Nashville. "Nothing defines us more as Americans."

But, he said, religious discrimination is "an area of law that has not always been given sufficient attention by our government."

The Department of Justice's "First Freedom Project" will review religious discrimination complaints, hold seminars to educate religious leaders about how to file complaints and launch a Web site with information on religious liberty laws, Gonzales said.

Local civil libertarians greeted the announcement with skepticism. If the First Freedom Project was meant to protect the religious freedoms of all Americans, why was it announced only to a room full of Southern Baptists, asked Hedy Weinberg, executive director of the Tennessee branch of the American Civil Liberties Union.

"Why was just one particular religious community there?" she said. "Religious freedom is a right all of us hold dear ... You'd think you'd want the rainbow of religious beliefs represented."

Gonzales told reporters that he chose a meeting of the nation's largest Protestant denomination because, "this is a group that's very interested in religious freedom."

The gathering is a "receptive audience that would appreciate" his message, he said.

Report compares cases

Gonzales also unveiled a 43-page Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom that highlights enforcement of religious discrimination laws under the Bush administration.

The report compared cases from 1995-2000 during the Clinton administration to 2001-2006 during the Bush administration. Some examples:

· In the area of religious discrimination cases in education, there were 82 cases reviewed and 40 cases investigated under Bush, compared with one case reviewed and no investigations.

· In the area of religious discrimination in employment, there were 31 investigations referred by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission under Bush, compared to 26 under Clinton, the report said.

· In housing, there were 18 investigations opened under the Fair Housing Act in cases involving religious discrimination under Bush, compared to four under Clinton.

· In the area of religious discrimination in public accommodations and public facilities from 2001-2006, there were two investigations. There was none from 1995-2000.

· The number of prosecutions of religious-based attacks rose to six from four.

However, prosecutions of arson, threatened arson and vandalism against houses of worship declined from 75 between 1995-2000 under the Clinton administration to 26 in the next five years, which the report attributed to a rash of church arsons in the mid-1990s that have since ebbed.

DOJ_NMG_0134845

Judge Sets Hearing On Kidnapping Charges In 1964 Killings Of 2 Black Men In Miss. (BSH)

By Jack Elliott Jr.

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 21, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal judge will hear arguments Thursday in reputed Ku Klux Klansman James Ford Seale's motion to dismiss kidnapping charges against him in the 1964 slayings of two black men.

U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate scheduled the hearing for 8:30 a.m. at the federal courthouse in Jackson.

Seale, 71, was arrested Jan. 24 at his home in the southwest Mississippi town of Roxie and pleaded not guilty the next day to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. Seale is being held without bond in the Madison County jail outside Jackson.

Seale could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the case tied to the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee.

Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

In a motion to dismiss the charges last month, Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester said the government needed to charge Seale under the law that was in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, in a response filed earlier this month, said Seale's attorneys were misreading the law. Lampton said while the U.S. Supreme Court in 1968 may have eliminated the death penalty for kidnapping, the court did not remove the designation of kidnapping as a capital crime under federal law.

Federal Public Defender S. Dennis Joiner, in a reply to the government's position, said once the death penalty was removed as a penalty for kidnapping, kidnapping became a non-capital offense.

Seale and reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards were arrested in 1964. But the FBI - consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared from Neshoba County that summer - turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The Justice Department in 2000 reopened the investigation into the slayings of Moore and Dee.

Federal Grand Jury Indicts Two Chino Prison Officers (RPE)

By Paige Austin, The Press-Enterprise

Riverside (CA) Press-Enterprise, February 21, 2007

A federal grand jury indicted two officers at the men's prison in Chino on Tuesday on accusations they hurled two shackled inmates to the ground and filed a false report to cover up the incident almost five years ago.

Officer Robert McGowan, 37, of Apple Valley, and Sgt. Thomas Ramos, 50, of Montclair, were named in a three-count indictment stemming from a May 2002 incident that left two inmates with minor injuries.

Attorneys for the Department of Justice allege McGowan pulled two shackled inmates from a van and allowed them to fall to the ground after an altercation between the inmates and officers. Because of the shackles, the inmates were unable to protect themselves from the fall.

Two weeks later, according to the attorneys, Ramos filed a false report to his boss. He claimed one of the inmates merely slipped even though he had been told that McGowan assaulted the shackled prisoner, charged the U.S. attorneys.

Neither guard could be reached for comment Tuesday.

McGowan faces 20 years in prison on two counts of deprivation of rights under color of law, and Ramos faces 10 years on one count of obstruction of justice if convicted.

Though nearly five years passed before Tuesday's indictment, the incident created a legislative stir in 2003 amid concerns of prisoner abuse, coverups by guards and dysfunction in the department's internal affairs investigative system.

The California Inspector General ordered the corrections department to hand over its files on the case to the Justice Department, said Bill Sessa, a spokesman for the California Department of Corrections and Rehabilitation.

He declined to comment on the case, adding that the trial will "bear out the facts."

Both McGowan and Ramos were reassigned to posts where they won't work directly with inmates Tuesday after the indictment, said Lt. Mark Hargrove, the prison's spokesman. Ramos has been with the department for 19 years and McGowan has been at the prison for nine years, Hargrove said.

The corrections department referred its investigation to the San Bernardino County district attorney's office years ago, but the district attorney declined to pursue assault charges against the officers, Sessa said.

Officials with the district attorney's office said they could find no record of the case late Tuesday and declined to comment pending further investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0134846

McGowan and Ramos are scheduled for arraignment in March, said Thom Mrozek, spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office.

These kinds of cases are rare because it's necessary to prove the officer intended to violate the inmate's civil rights, Mrozek said.

"The constitutionally protected rights of every citizen is something we take very seriously," said Mrozek. "You have the right to be free from assault -- even in prison."

Fighting For Access (APP)

By Carol Gorga Williams, COASTAL MONMOUTH BUREAU

Asbury Park (NJ) Press, February 21, 2007

Man seeks better entry points to city's beaches for handicapped, seniors

LONG BRANCH — Long Branch is waiting to hear from the state Department of Environmental Protection on its boardwalk improvement project.

A senior citizen from Ocean Boulevard is appealing to the U.S. Department of Justice to enforce requirements of the Americans with Disabilities Act in connection with oceanfront beach access.

Austin Gelzer, 80, had come before the City Council Jan. 23 to ask for help with beach access, and although officials said they would study the issue, they made no promises.

So Gelzer returned Feb. 13, determined to go to the Justice Department after having completed a complaint form that will go before the Civil Rights Division.

Gelzer is filing the complaint, he said, "in the name of the disabled residents of Long Branch who have been denied access to the beach and public restrooms, and to some degree, sufficient parking facilities."

Gelzer said the city was required, beginning in January 1995, to provide such accommodations.

"The city is now 12 years late," he said.

On July 28, 2005, Gelzer met with City Business Administrator Howard Woolley Jr. and presented him with a petition signed by 150 people, protesting the lack of beach access.

Woolley said then the city could not afford to make improvements without the infusion of some $12 million promised by K. Hovnanian, the proposed developer of Beachfront South.

"A year and a half later, nothing has changed," said Gelzer, noting there is currently $145,000 unexpended in the Beachfront South trust account.

"But funding or lack of funding is an irrelevant issue," said Gelzer. "The ADA law requires action now, and the federal government will provide advice and support to the city so that the disabled and elderly will be able to enjoy the beach starting this 2007 Memorial Day Weekend."

Gelzer said he was concerned about a lack of beach access from Pier Village south to Brighton Avenue. The area consists of boardwalk with steep staircases down to the beach.

Mayor Adam Schneiderhas said the city will improve the steep access staircase, which is an annual necessity, but noted a sweeping boardwalk rebuilding program is set to begin within the next 12 months.

The new boardwalk, partially paid for by K. Hovnanian, would extend from the Pier Village redevelopment area to Brighton Avenue in West End. The boardwalk design is now before the state Department of Environmental Protection where it awaits final approval.

Plans are to replace the boardwalk underpinning and install a 16- to 20-foot-wide walk with new comfort stations, restrooms, wheelchair ramps at Bath and Brighton avenues and aluminum railing. Benches bearing memorial plaques would be relocated.

Schneider has said that, in the meantime, to go ahead with Gelzer's request to fund, design and engineer a ramp, then submit it for approval to the DEP, would duplicate efforts already under way.

"We've already got boardwalk plans submitted, with two new handicapped accesses," Schneider said. "We're already in the process of building new handicapped access and getting it paid for. This has been in the works for the last several years. I'm sorry it has taken so long, but that is how long these things take."

Schneider said even if the Justice Department ruled in Gelzer's favor, the city still would not be able to design and engineer a new ramp, get it approved by the DEP, and installed by Memorial Day.

Gelzer has said all he is seeking is an inexpensive, simple aluminum ramp, which could be done immediately.

Schneider said the city has been working with handicapped advocates for years on the design of the new boardwalk.

"We're going to build it as soon as we can," Schneider said. "It is no longer a money issue. It is not even a location issue. Let's get it through CAFRA (the state's Coastal Area Facility Review Act), which is happening as we speak, and we'll build it.

DOJ_NMG_0134847

"I don't think there is any way to get it done quicker," Schneider said. "I wish there were."

Dallas Jail Settles Mistreatment Lawsuit (AP)

By Matt Curry, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

County officials approved a nearly $1 million settlement Tuesday with the families of three mentally ill inmates who were denied medication while in the country's seventh-largest detention complex.

Just over half of the award went to James Mims, a Dallas County jail inmate whose psychiatric medications were withheld for two months in 2004, his attorney David Finn said. Mims also nearly died when water was shut off in his cell for two weeks.

"They could just not afford to have this case go before a jury," Finn said.

Commissioners approved the $950,000 agreement without discussion.

The federal civil rights lawsuit was filed in December 2004 on behalf of inmates Mims, Kennedy Nickerson and Clarence Lee Grant Jr., who died in custody.

Grant, who had paranoid schizophrenia, was found dead in his cell after not receiving medicine for five days in 2003, according to court records. An autopsy showed he died from complications of diabetes, pneumonia and other ailments.

Nickerson, who also has paranoid schizophrenia, was released from jail in 2003 without medication. A few days later he was found on the street dehydrated, suffering from fever and seizures, court records show.

The U.S. Department of Justice told the county in December that the jail violates inmates' rights by failing to provide adequate medical and mental health care, and warned that a lawsuit could be filed if the problems weren't fixed.

State Inmate Transfer Ruled Illegal (LAT)

By Jenifer Warren

The Los Angeles Times, February 20, 2007

SACRAMENTO -- A Superior Court judge ruled today that Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger acted illegally by declaring an emergency in California's overcrowded prisons and transferring inmates to other states.

The ruling by Judge Gail Ohanesian says the governor violated the Emergency Services Act and the state constitution, and that contracts sending prisoners to lockups in Tennessee and Arizona are illegal.

The judge's order is stayed for 10 days, giving the state time to file an appeal.

Ohanesian's ruling is a major setback for Schwarzenegger as he grapples with an escalating crisis in the state's jam-packed prisons.

Corrections officials say they will be have no room for new inmates by this summer, raising the prospect that counties -- many of which face severe crowding in their jails -- will have nowhere to send convicted felons.

A federal judge, meanwhile, has said that he will move toward placing a cap on the inmate population -- now at 172,000 -- if the state does not relieve the crowding by June.

The transfer program, launched in November, was Schwarzenegger's effort to buy time while his $10.9-billion proposal to build 78,000 new jail and prison beds moves through the Legislature.

So far, the state has transferred 460 inmates -- all volunteers -- to private lockups in Arizona and Tennessee. Officials expanded the program last week to include mandatory moves.

The first inmates targeted for compulsory transfers are illegal immigrants likely to face deportation upon release. Those prisoners are now being screened, a spokesman said.

Schwarzenegger called the judge's ruling "a threat to public safety."

"The transfer of prisoners is imperative to relieve the pressure on our overburdened prison system," he said in a statement. The governor added that moving inmates "is a prudent alternative to the risk of court-ordered early release of felons."

The transfers were authorized as part of Schwarzenegger's Oct. 4 declaration of an emergency in 29 of the state's 33 prisons. In his decree, the governor said teeming cellblocks had created a health risk and "conditions of extreme peril" for officers, inmates and the public.

Two labor unions representing correctional officers and other prison employees sued to block the transfers, saying Schwarzenegger had improperly invoked the Emergency Services Act.

"We're a nation of laws, and this is an end-run around the Legislature," said Gregg Adam, a lawyer for the California Correctional Peace Officers Assn., after a court hearing last week.

Adam also argued that the state Constitution forbid the government from contracting out jobs normally performed by state employees. Ignoring such civil service protections, he said, would amount to "the first steps toward privatization" of the prison system, which employees about 58,000 guards and other workers.

DOJ_NMG_0134848

In court, the lawyer for Schwarzenegger disputed those claims, saying the governor "absolutely" acted legally in applying the Emergency Services Act to the prison crisis.

Deputy Atty. Gen. Vickie Whitney also said the Legislature was given three opportunities to act on the crisis and failed to do so.

"The governor was left with a situation where staff, inmates and the public are in grave danger," so he had to declare an emergency and authorize the transfers, she said.

In her four-page ruling, Ohanesian rejected those arguments.

Chuck Alexander, vice president of the correctional officers' union, hailed the ruling.

"This was an illegal action, and we're glad the court agreed with us," he said. "We hope the administration will now be more inclined to sit down with parties and talk about the entire systemic problem, rather than taking this piecemeal approach."

In addition to the lawsuits challenging the voluntary transfers, two inmates have filed papers seeking to block the state from moving forward with mandatory moves. A hearing in that case, in the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals, is scheduled this week.

es | Boodle.com for Grocery Coupons

Racism: What Do We Tell The Kids? (USAT)

By Bruce Kluger

USA Today, February 21, 2007

Forty-five years ago this spring, my brothers and I (ages 5, 6, 7 and 9) went to a Saturday afternoon showing of Pinocchio at the Uptown Theater in suburban Baltimore. Our mom had errands to run, so she sent us with our babysitter, Elizabeth.

Outside the theater, we noticed that Elizabeth was engaged in a hushed conversation with the woman in the box office. Apparently, she was having trouble buying our tickets. "But I'm the babysitter," Elizabeth said coolly. "I have to stay with them."

After a bit more whispering, we were admitted to the theater and seated as a group in the glassed-in balcony. My brothers and I had never sat up high before, and we were delighted by it all. What we didn't know was that we had no choice. Elizabeth was black and not permitted in the lower seats.

When I tell my daughters (Audrey, 8, and Bridgette, 11) this story, they look at me wide-eyed, as if I'm concocting some wild fiction. To them, skin color has always been a non-issue, as inconsequential in their personal relationships as hair color, eye color or even the color of a blouse.

Audrey's first "boyfriend" in pre-school was a handsome little man named Mekahel, a black child with an infectious smile and boundless energy. The only time Audrey and Mekahel ever discussed color was over crayons.

Bridgette's godfather Guy, meanwhile, also is black, a trait she finds far less interesting than his computer wizardry or the fact that he was the first person she ever "danced" with — at a wedding, when she was just 4 weeks old.

To my daughters and their friends, the days of America's apartheid are sepia-tinted, blurry, a giant chapter of our national story that, once shouted from pulpits in Birmingham and Memphis, has now been compacted for easy listening. Sure, they're taught about Martin Luther King and Rosa Parks maybe once a year in school; and perhaps they'll casually glimpse some boring documentary their parents are watching in the den.

But kids of any generation tend to see the past as the past — and, besides, a new episode of American Idol is on tonight.

So as we celebrate Black History Month, I wonder: What kind of responsibility do we parents have in educating our children about the sad legacy of racism that has run through our nation's life like a persistent electrical current? Do we bequeath that shame to our kids out of a sense of obligation, charging them with the task of carrying the long, hard fight of our troubled heritage into a new era? Or do we quietly give thanks for their blissful naiveté — their lucky late-century birth — and hope that the deeper sense of fairness that is already evident in their new generation may take root in America's future? Do we leave well enough alone?

To be sure, our country is experiencing a transformation that would have been unimaginable half a century ago.

Our last two secretaries of State have been African-American (likewise, both 2007 Super Bowl head coaches); our most talked-about presidential candidate is black; people of color populate executive suites and statehouses across the country in increasing numbers. And the only conversation about race that seems to interest Major League Baseball anymore is the one about the pennant.

Yet just because America's more notorious racial injustices are thankfully behind us — the segregated lunch counters, the unconscionable lynchings, the ignominious Jim Crow laws — thick capillaries of discrimination continue to pulse beneath our national skin. These lingering vestiges of that old-time racism are, in many ways, just as insidious as those we thought we'd thrown off with the great civil rights acts of the '60s, if only because they are more cleverly cloaked from view.

Blacks continue to be shut out of polling places because of dubious technicalities. Families of color continue to carry a disproportionate share of our country's worst afflictions — from poverty and unemployment to teen pregnancy — at national rates that have consistently remained two to three times that of whites for the past 20 years. Minority youth continue to be isolated, not embraced, by our education system, despite the efforts of No Child Left Behind. And in November, another unarmed black man was killed in a hail of police bullets, just a subway ride from where my daughters go to school. It was a flashback to the bad old days.

DOJ_NMG_0134849

This, to me, is what Black History Month is really about — a time to step back and measure our growth as a nation against the work that remains to be done. Certainly, I appreciate honoring noteworthy figures who somehow never made it into my childhood classroom texts (black scientist Charles Henry Turner; 1867-1923; the first to prove that insects can hear). But our children also need to know that America's complicated relationship with race is an unfinished story, and it will one day be up to them to write its ending. That's why, as a parent, I'd rather spend this month — not to mention the 11 around it — making sure that my kids understand that black history is their history, too.

Just like their dad at that movie theater nearly 50 years ago, Bridgette and Audrey live in a country that still struggles to do the right thing. But unlike their father, they were born in a time of progress, a time of hope. We haven't yet reached Martin Luther King's mountaintop in America. But I have to believe that our children may one day take us there.

Bruce Kluger, a member of USA TODAY's board of contributors, is also a contributing editor for Parenting magazine and writes for National Public Radio.

ANTITRUST:

Justice Dept. Orders Sale Of Baltimore Steel Mill (WP)

By Anita Huslin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Decision to Divest Sparrows Point Was Condition of European Firms' $33 Billion Merger

The Justice Department yesterday ordered international steel conglomerate Arcelor Mittal to sell off the venerable Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore, to preserve competition in the eastern U.S. tin mill market.

The divestiture of the 116-year-old plant, which in its heyday was the world's largest steelmaker, is not expected to have an immediate impact on its workforce or operations, union officials said. The plant once employed 30,000 people at the mill and nearby shipyards, and produced millions of tons of steel for guns, airplanes and warships during World War II.

Justice Department officials ordered the divestiture of Sparrows Point as a condition of Mittal Steel Co.'s $33 billion acquisition of Arcelor SA. The department had originally called for the Dutch company to spin off a Canadian subsidiary that makes tin mill products. But after that deal proved impossible for legal reasons, the Justice Department said Mittal would have to sell one of its other mills -- Sparrows Point or its plant in Weirton, W.Va.

Yesterday, the department decided it should be Sparrows Point, which manufactures rolled steel sheets primarily used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products. Unlike Weirton, Sparrows Point produces the steel slabs used to manufacture tin mill products and would not have to develop new supply sources for the material if Mittal sold it, Justice Department officials said.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Mittal officials did not return calls for comment about the order.

Bill Barry, director of labor studies for the Community College of Baltimore County, said that the decision was not unexpected and that the community is hoping the new owner will invest in the plant for the future.

Bethlehem Steel owned Sparrows Point from the early 1900s until it declared bankruptcy and was bought in 2003 by International Steel Group, which merged it with LTV Steel to create the largest steel producer in the United States. In 2004, Indian billionaire Lakshmi N. Mittal bought ISG for about $4.5 billion, merging it with his Rotterdam-based Ispat International NV and LNM Holdings NV. The new company, based in the Netherlands, exceeded Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA as the world's largest steelmaker.

"The old Bethlehem Steel was reluctant to spend money for capital improvements, and this is one reason that there are 2,000 workers instead of 31,000 at The Point," Barry said in an e-mail. "The frantic development of the global steel industry requires equally consistent capital investments."

David R. McCall, chairman of United Steelworkers' Mittal Steel committee, said the Justice Department's order will erode Mittal's market dominance.

DOJ_NMG_0134850

"It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be, and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," McCall said in a statement. "We will ask for a review and will assure our members who are employed at Sparrows Point that we will make a dedicated and strong effort to reverse the decision."

The USW represents 2,106 production workers at Sparrows Point; about 275 salaried nonunion employees also work there. In the mid-1950s, Sparrows Point's furnaces poured hundreds of thousands of tons of hot metal a day and was Baltimore's primary employer.

The order highlights the continued volatility of an industry that in recent years has been marked by myriad mergers and acquisitions, as U.S. and European manufacturers consolidate to compete in a growing global steel market, particularly to meet demands in India and China.

Before Mittal bought Arcelor, Mittal and U.S. Steel sold nearly 75 percent of all tin mill products in the eastern United States. An Ontario subsidiary of Arcelor provided competition in that market. But that rivalry would have been eroded by the merger, according to the Justice Department.

Analysts said there is likely to be interest in Sparrows Point from several other steel conglomerates, such as Brazilian steelmaker CSN, which had previously explored buying Sparrows Point from Bethlehem Steel; or Russia's Severstal, which had bid for Arcelor and has been aggressively seeking steelmaking assets in North America.

Sparrows Point offers international companies a deep-water port for easy import of steel-making materials and access to land-based transportation, analysts said.

Feds Order Mittal To Sell Mill To Settle Antitrust Issues (AP)

By David Dishneau

AP, February 21, 2007

HAGERSTOWN, Md. - The U.S. Justice Department on Tuesday ordered global steel giant Mittal Steel Co. to sell its Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues raised by the Dutch company's recent merger with Arcelor SA.

The proposed consent decree would allow Chicago-based Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, used primarily for food and aerosol cans.

Sparrows Point, with about 2,400 workers and one of the largest blast furnaces in North America, faces the prospect of its fourth owner in as many years.

Chicago Heights, Ill.-based Esmark Inc. said it might consider a joint venture to buy Sparrows Point if the Weirton mill is unavailable, and industry experts said a number of German, Indian and Russian companies are shopping for North American steel mills.

"There are companies outside the U.S. that have said they want to make acquisitions in the U.S.," said analyst Charles Bradford of Soleil Securities Corp. in New York.

Mittal didn't immediately respond to telephone calls and e-mailed queries about the federal order. Mittal's shares fell 30 cents to close at $50.65 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 production workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal.

"The decision is unfortunate. It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee, said in a statement.

The Justice Department said in a statement that a sale of the profitable Sparrows Point plant, with its deep-water port access, diversified equipment and production capacity of 500,000 tons of tin-plated products annually, would "most reliably remedy the anticompetitive effects" of Mittal's merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Thomas O. Barnett, assistant attorney general in charge of the Justice Department's antitrust division.

Sparrows Point produces the raw steel slabs used in tin mill products, "and unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply" for that material, Barnett said.

Justice officials initially ordered Mittal to try to sell another mill, Dofasco Inc. of Canada. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany. That left either Sparrows Point or the former Weirton Steel Corp. in Weirton, W.Va., Mittal's two U.S. tin-plated steel mills.

Before the Arcelor Mittal merger, Mittal and another steelmaker accounted for more than 74 percent of all tin sales in the eastern United States. Without a divestiture, "the acquisition likely would have resulted in price increases of tin mill products to can manufacturers and other customers," the Justice Department said.

Mark Reutter, who chronicled Sparrows Point in the 1988 book "Making Steel" and continues to study the U.S. steel industry, said the decision means the government has heard manufacturers' complaints about too much steel consolidation.

DOJ_NMG_0134851

"The sort of unspoken aspect here is that someone in Washington is signaling displeasure over the last two years and wants more competition in the industry," Reutter said. "I think that pressure has been growing from fabricators - car manufacturers to Whirlpool to the thousands of middle men who do various processing. There's a lot of unhappiness that there's been too much consolidation."

Sparrows Point was operated for years by Bethlehem Steel Corp., which went bankrupt and sold its assets to International Steel Group, backed by investor Wilbur Ross, in 2003. Ross sold the mill to Mittal in 2005.

Baltimore County Executive James T. Smith Jr., who had a meeting with Mittal planned for Tuesday afternoon, said a sale of Sparrows Point would be good news.

"I think it's helpful that the Justice Department points out that we are the only steelmaking plant with deep-water coast access in the Eastern United States and one of the most modern cold-rolled mills in the world," he said.

At the West Virginia mill, where Independent Steelworkers Union President Mark Glyptis had volunteered to have Weirton divested because the union believes the mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, the initial reaction was disappointment. But the 1,250-member union said there was nothing to prevent Mittal from selling Weirton.

"There's obviously keen interest in Weirton," said ISU spokesman Dave Gossett. "We're just not sure who will own it going forward."

Esmark President Craig Bouchard in Chicago Heights, Ill., said his company would prefer to buy Weirton but he wouldn't rule out the possibility of acquiring Sparrows Point.

"If we were to do Sparrows Point, it would probably be in a partnership because it doesn't exactly fit our strategy," he said. "But certain pieces of it could."

U.S. Orders Sale Of Sparrows Point (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, February 21, 2007

Antitrust decision puts Md. steel plant on market

For the third time in as many years, Sparrows Point is up for sale. And this time it's a rush job.

The Justice Department wants the sprawling Baltimore County steel plant to be under new ownership within 90 days to make sure that its current boss, Mittal Steel Co. NV, does not have too much control over the market for tin plate used to make cans for foods, aerosol sprays, paints and other products.

Netherlands-based Mittal, which is merging with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA in a $33 billion deal to create the world's largest steelmaker, had wanted to sell its Weirton W.Va., plant instead.

Selling Sparrows Point, an integrated manufacturer that can make steel from scratch, rather than the Weirton plant "most reliably" addresses antitrust concerns, Thomas O. Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the department's antitrust division, said Tuesday in a statement announcing the order.

"Sparrows Point is a profitable and diversi fied facility" and "unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply for this critical input upon its separation from Mittal Steel," the Justice Department said.

Mittal cannot appeal the order but could be granted up to 60 more days to find a buyer, according to a Justice Department spokeswoman. The Justice Department would have to sign off on any deal.

Officials at Mittal declined to comment Tuesday. Mittal has a previously planned conference call scheduled with analysts Wednesday. An official at the United Steelworkers union pledged to fight the ruling.

What a sale would mean for the future of Sparrows Point -- the second-largest private employer in Baltimore County with about 2,400 workers -- is unclear, but some have raised the possibility that a new owner might invest more in the complex. Mittal, a relentless cost-cutter, pits its plants against one another, shifting production to the most efficient.

David S. Iannucci, Baltimore County's economic development director, called the Justice Department decision "a vote of confidence in the long-term viability of Sparrows Point steel-making."

"It'll be the fourth owner of this property in about a five-year period, and inherently that's going to lead to some uncertainty. But at the end of the day," Iannucci said, "I think this is a very positive development for steel-making in Baltimore County."

Owned by the now-defunct Bethlehem Steel Corp. for 87 years, Sparrows Point was taken over by International Steel Group in 2003. ISG sold out to Mittal in 2005.

A United Steelworkers official, however, said the Justice Department's ruling is bad news.

"The decision is unfortunate," David R. McCall, head of the union's international Mittal Steel committee in Columbus, Ohio, said in a statement. "It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future. We will ask for a review and will assure our members who are employed at Sparrows Point that we will make a dedicated and strong effort to reverse the decision."

DOJ_NMG_0134852

John Cirri, president of United Steelworkers Local 9477, which represents production and maintenance workers at Sparrows Point, said Tuesday that it would support the international committee's challenge.

Analysts expect a number of foreign steelmakers to show interest in the plant. Illinois-based Esmark Inc., which has a preliminary deal with Mittal to buy the Weirton facility if the Justice Department approves, said it is eager to buy the Baltimore County plant as well.

James P. Bouchard, Esmark's chairman and chief executive, said he told Mittal Tuesday that his company still wants the Weirton plant and would buy Sparrows Point if given the chance.

"We want to proceed," he said.

Tuesday's decision arose as the result of an antitrust suit the Justice Department filed in August to block the Mittal-Arcelor merger. A proposed consent degree required Mittal to sell a Canadian subsidiary owned by Arcelor, or, if that proved impossible, Weirton or Sparrows Point, with the Justice Department having final say. Mittal agreed to sell the subsidiary, Dofasco Inc., to German steelmaker ThyssenKrupp AG, but was unable to win approval from the Dutch trust that controlled it, paving the way for the Justice Department to choose between Sparrows Point and Weirton.

While an order to sell Sparrows Point was always a possibility, the decision appeared to have caught many off guard.

Esmark's Bouchard said he was in Weirton Tuesday meeting with union officials when they got word.

"I think it took the wind out of everybody," Bouchard said.

But he said he didn't dwell on it long. He told Mittal officials that Esmark, a steel distributor that recently won control of West Virginia's Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp., wants to continue negotiations over Weirton and make a bid for Sparrows Point.

The two plants are vastly different. Sparrows Point produces steel slabs and galvanized sheet for appliance manufacturers and the construction industry. It can produce nearly 4 million tons of raw steel a year and a half-million tons of tin mill products. Weirton is a niche manufacturer of tin plate for the food industry.

Despite its age, the 118-year-old Baltimore County steel complex has undergone many upgrades over the decades. Longtime owner Bethlehem Steel Corp. invested hundreds of millions of dollars before it filed for bankruptcy in 2001, building a new cold mill and relining the blast furnace, the largest and most efficient in North America.

Those investments, and a stable and growing market for tin plate, make Sparrows Point attractive, said steel analyst Charles Bradford of New York-based Bradford Research Inc. In addition, Sparrows Point is the only U.S. inte grated steelmaker with direct ocean access, making it attractive to foreign companies.

"That makes it very feasible to bring in ore from other places," he said.

Russia's OAO Severstal, which failed to outbid Mittal for Arcelor, and Luxembourg-based Evraz Group SA, which recently purchased Oregon Steel Mills in Portland, could make a play for Sparrows Point, Bradford said. Several Chinese companies are interested in expanding in the United States, and they have cash. And CSN Brazil, which has expressed interest in Sparrows Point in the past, might be in the running after losing out on Wheeling-Pitt to Esmark. CSN has a plentiful supply of iron ore that it could ship to Baltimore, he said.

Officials from ThyssenKrupp toured Sparrows Point last May, but spokesman Klaus Pepperhoff said Tuesday that the company, which has announced plans to build a steel complex in the South at a cost of $2.9 billion, is not interested in buying it. He declined to comment further.

As for Esmark, Sparrows Point would make strategic sense, Bouchard said. Sparrows Point's new cold mill is particularly attractive to Esmark, which is one of the largest buyers of cold rolled product in the United States, he said. And Wheeling-Pitt consumes 1.3 million tons of steel slab a year, which Sparrows Point could supply.

He said his company has the financial backing to buy both Weirton and Sparrows Point, and plans to pursue both.

"We don't give up easily," Bouchard said.

Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents 1,250 workers at Weirton, said he was disappointed by the government's decision. Glyptis had hoped that Mittal would sell Weirton to a buyer who would restart the blast furnace it shut down shortly after buying it in 2005 and bring back the more than 800 workers let go last year.

"We wanted to be divested; Sparrows Point did not," he said.

allison.connolly@baltsun.com

Sun reporters Jamie Smith Hopkins, Stacey Hirsh and Hanah Cho contributed to this article.

US DoJ Orders Arcelor Mittal To Divest Big Steel Mill (AFP)

AFP, February 21, 2007

The US Justice Department said that it would require European steel giant Arcelor Mittal to divest a large US steel mill located near Baltimore, Maryland, to resolve concerns about its recent merger.

Mittal Steel acquired European steelmaker Arcelor last summer in a 32.5-billion-dollar deal. The deal forged a vast new global group, Areclor Mittal, which is headed by Indian businessman Lakshmi Mittal.

"The Department of Justice today announced that it will require Mittal Steel Company N.V. to divest its Sparrows Point facility located near Baltimore, Maryland, to remedy the competitive harm arising from Mittal's recent 33 billion acquisition of Arcelor S.A," the Justice Department said in a statement.

It said "the acquisition, as originally proposed, would have substantially lessened competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States."

The US government last August had approved Mittal's acquisition of Arcelor on the basis that Arcelor divested a Canadian company it owned called Dofasco Inc.

However, Arcelor was unable to divest the Canadian group due to ownership hurdles, and the Justice Department has now opted to require Arcelor to divest the Baltimore steel mill instead to satisfy US merger concerns.

The Sparrows Point plant in Baltimore is a profitable and diversified facility, according to the Justice Department, which said it has the annual capacity to produce over 500,000 tons of tin mill products.

The plant makes steel slabs used in the manufacture of tin mill products.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Thomas Barnett, a senior Justice official who runs the department's antitrust division.

Mittal Mill Expected To Draw Interest (WSJ)

By Paul Glader

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Mittal Steel Co., ordered by the Justice Department to sell a plant in Maryland, is expected to draw bids from major companies in China, Russia and India as the number of plants for sale is dwindling.

The Sparrows Point plant, near Baltimore, is more accessible than inland operations for imports of raw materials and exports of steel. It can produce about 3.9 billion tons of steel a year, including 500,000 tons of tin plate used to make cans for food, aerosols, paints and other products, and it could fetch upwards of $1 billion.

Sparrows Point "has not been consistently profitable," says New York-based steel analyst Chuck Bradford of Bradford Research/Soleil. "But at least it is on the water, so it can bring in raw materials at a reasonable price."

The Justice Department yesterday ordered Mittal Steel to sell Sparrows Point to settle antitrust issues raised by its recent merger with Arcelor SA.

Bidders could include JSW Steel Ltd. or Ispat Industries Ltd., both based in India, or Russia's Evraz Group or OAO Severstal Group, both of which already own U.S. operations. China's Wuhan Steel Corp. and Anshan Iron & Steel Group Corp. also have a good deal of cash and are considering expanding.

Other potential bidders are Germany's ThyssenKrupp AG, which was unsuccessful in buying Canada's Dofasco Inc., and Brazil's Cia. Siderurgica Nacional, which failed in its attempt to buy Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp.

Lakshmi Mittal, chief executive of the Netherlands' Mittal Steel, acquired Sparrows Point when he bought International Steel Group in 2004. His purchase of Arcelor, of Luxembourg, which has holdings in Canada, raised antitrust concerns and led to the Justice Department decision on which of the U.S. plants needed to be sold, Sparrows Point or Weirton, W.Va. Mitch Hecht, who runs a New York-based private hedge fund called Hampshire Steel Investments, had been interested in Weirton. He said he would still be interested in buying it and possibly bidding on Sparrows Point if the United Steelworkers union wanted him to take a look. "I'm a big believer that U.S. steel assets should be owned by American-based operators, whose priorities are to make a strong, sustainable and efficient facility" in the U.S., he said.

Mittal had agreed to sell Weirton to Esmark Inc., a closely held distributor in Chicago Heights, Ill., if the Justice Department decided that mill should be sold.

Write to Paul Glader at paul.glader@wsj.com1

Weirton Mill's Fate Unclear (WHEELINT)

By Shelley Hanson

Wheeling Intelligencer, February 21, 2007

WEIRTON — Mark Glyptis is keeping a positive attitude despite a big letdown Tuesday for his Independent Steelworkers.

The Department of Justice ruled Mittal must sell its Sparrows Point facility in Maryland instead of its Weirton tin mill. To settle antitrust issues, Mittal was being forced, by the Justice Department, to sell one of the two assets because of its merger with Arcelor SA.

DOJ_NMG_0134854

Glyptis, president of the union which represents workers at Mittal's Weirton facility, said his union members are disappointed the Justice Department did not choose Weirton to be sold, as the tin mill has not benefited from being owned by Mittal Steel.

"We're disappointed by the decision ... but we're not totally surprised," Glyptis said.

However, Mittal may still decide to sell Weirton, he noted.

"We need to meet with senior officials with Mittal Steel to determine what that means to us and to Weirton," Glyptis said of Mittal selling Sparrows Point.

Chicago-based Esmark Steel already has a nonbinding agreement with Mittal to purchase Weirton. However, before any deal is finalized, Esmark must have the ISU's blessing to purchase the Weirton mill. A former International Steel Group executive, Mitchell Hecht, also wants to purchase Weirton.

Glyptis declined to comment about whom the ISU favors to purchase Weirton.

Meanwhile, according to the Associated Press, Esmark said it may consider a joint venture to buy Sparrow's Point if the Weirton Mill is unavailable.

Esmark President Craig Bouchard said his company would prefer to buy Weirton, but he wouldn't rule out the possibility of acquiring Sparrows Point.

"If we were to do Sparrows Point, it would probably be in a partnership because it doesn't exactly fit our strategy," he said. "But certain pieces of it could."

He has said the purchase of Mittal's Weirton plant would fit the company's strategy of "building the Ohio Valley."

Bouchard also is president of the Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. If Esmark could successfully purchase both Weirton and Wheeling-Pitt, it could possibly control 25 percent of the domestic tin-plate market.

"We were disappointed to hear the news. After making excellent progress with each of Mittal, the United Steel Workers and the ISU, we were hoping to close the Weirton acquisition over the next 60 days. We felt this was the best solution for all parties involved, including the DOJ," said Bouchard. "We still hope to close the Weirton transaction. Mittal must now decide whether they want to sell both companies. We have a great respect for Mittal, and they are an important supplier and partner of Esmark. Whichever strategic path they follow, we will support their decision."

After years of deep financial losses, Weirton Steel filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in May 2003 and was sold twice in 18 months, first to International Steel Group, then to Mittal. Almost immediately, Mittal shut down the blast furnace, stopping the production of raw steel and cutting more than 800 jobs.

Last month, Mittal announced it had a memorandum of understanding to sell Weirton to Esmark, pending approval of federal regulators and the union.

Bouchard said it's too soon to know whether that deal is still valid.

"It's in Mittal's court," he noted. "We've told them we'd still like to close on the Weirton transaction ... but whatever their strategy is in North America, this will change it a bit."

Esmark executives met with the ISU again Tuesday, discussing the particulars of a deal with Glyptis and other elected leaders.

"We've found them to be smart guys, very conscious of doing something good for the company and the town," Bouchard said.

Under Esmark, Weirton wouldn't return to producing raw steel, so there would be little hope of restoring the jobs that were cut when the blast furnace was shut down. Instead, Esmark would run and expand the finishing operations, adding capacity to coat and galvanize steel.

Esmark has already seized control of nearby Wheeling-Pitt, and Esmark Chief Executive Officer James Bouchard sees the two companies as a logical fit. While Wheeling-Pitt's best assets are its electric arc furnace, reheat furnaces and strip mill, he calls Weirton's cold mill, tin mill and other finishing operations "outstanding."

Fate Of Weirton Mittal Steel Plant In Limbo (PTR)

By C.M. Mortimer, TRIBUNE-REVIEW

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 21, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice on Tuesday said Mittal Steel must sell its Sparrows Point tin mill plant near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues over its pending merger with Arcelor SA.

The decision clouds the fate of the former Weirton Steel Corp., owned by Mittal, the world's biggest steel company. Steelworkers at the Weirton, W.Va., plant in November said they would rather be sold to another company than remain part of Arcelor-Mittal.

DOJ_NMG_0134855

"We are obviously disappointed. But we will remain part of the Arcelor Mittal Steel Corp. and will remain focused on the business of steel," said Mark Glyptis, president of the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents 1,250 members at Weirton.

Glyptis said he will meet with senior Mittal Steel exectives soon, and said he would try to ascertain their plans for Weirton. "I don't know what their plans are," he said. "They can still divest Weirton."

Mittal Steel officials could not be reached for comment.

Glyptis said he volunteered to have Weirton sold because the mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's stewardship. "We wanted to be sold because we feel our assets could be utilized at a higher rate," he said.

The Justice Department said the divestiture of Sparrows Point would remedy the anticompetitive effects of combining Luxembourg-based Arcelor and Mittal, headquartered in the Netherlands.

The Justice Department said Sparrows Point has the capacity to produce more than 500,000 tons of tin product annually.

Sparrows Point produces the steel slabs used in the manufacture of tin mill products, and, unlike the Weirton mill, would not have to develop new sources of supply upon its separation from Mittal Steel, the Justice Department said.

The United Steelworkers union, which represents the 2,106 workers at Sparrows Point, said it will ask for a review of the decision in hopes of a reversal.

"The decision is unfortunate. It makes Mittal not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future," David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee, said in a statement.

Last month, Esmark Inc., a Chicago-based steel services company, signed a letter-of-intent with Arcelor Mittal to buy parts of Weirton Steel, particularly its finishing facilities. Esmark already is moving forward with separate plans to merge with Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel.

James P. Bouchard, CEO of Esmark, said he was "disappointed" in the Justice Department's decision, but said he's going forward with plans to buy part of Weirton as well as the Sparrows Point mill.

"Our first pick is Weirton, but we would buy them both. We feel Weirton is a superior tin facility, and our offer stays on the table for Weirton," Bouchard said.

Glyptis said he has met with Esmark leadership, and continues to talk to Mitchell Hecht, a former International Steel Group executive, who wants to restart at least one blast furnace at Weirton Steel and rehire several hundred workers to produce pig iron and other products.

Hecht also said he was "disappointed" in the government's ruling.

"We continue to have interest in restarting Weirton's blast furnace, which can be done cost-efficiently," said Hecht, who operates Hampshire Steel Investments, a private, New York-based hedge fund that focuses on trading in steel properties.

Mittal wanted to sell Canada's Dofasco Inc. as part of its merger with Arcelor, but an independent Dutch trust controlling Dofasco has refused to allow its sale.

Mittal was forced to sell either Dofasco or one of its two tin mills in Weirton or Sparrows Point after the Justice Department said in May that the Arcelor-Mittal merger would hurt competition in tin-mill products in the eastern United States.

C.M. Mortimer can be reached at cmortimer@tribweb.com or (724) 836-5252.

Justice Department Ruling Sparing Weirton Disappoints Union (PPG)

By Len Boselovic, Pittsburgh Post-Gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 21, 2007

In a decision that disappointed the union representing 1,250 Weirton Steel workers, the government yesterday ordered Arcelor Mittal to sell a mill near Baltimore -- and not the West Virginia steel plant.

Union officials at Weirton had been hoping that the U.S. Department of Justice would force the sale of their plant, which has attracted interest from two bidders, including Esmark, the steel processor and distributor pursuing a merger with nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Corp.

Despite the decision, which seeks to alleviate antitrust concerns raised by the merger of Arcelor and Mittal, the world's two largest steel producers, Esmark Chairman and Chief Executive Officer James P. Bouchard said he remains interested in purchasing some of Weirton's operations as well as the Sparrows Point, Md., plant that Arcelor Mittal was ordered to sell.

Mr. Bouchard was meeting at Weirton with representatives of that plant's Independent Steelworkers Union and the United Steelworkers union, which represents Wheeling-Pitt workers, when they learned of the decision.

The talks were aimed at getting the ISU to merge with the USW as part of Esmark's proposed acquisition of Weirton, Mr. Bouchard said. The Justice Department order " kind of sucked the wind out of everybody at the table," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134856

Mittal's acquisition of No. 2 Arcelor has raised concerns about a tightly controlled market for tin-coated sheet steel used in food cans and other contains. Even before the merger, Mittal and another steelmaker accounted for more than 74 percent of tin mill product sales in the eastern United States, Justice Department officials said. The other producer is U.S. Steel.

Sparrows Point, formerly operated by Bethlehem Steel, can produce more than 500,000 tons of tin product annually.

"With the divestiture of Sparrows Point, competition in the market for tin mill products in the eastern United States will be preserved," said Assistant Attorney General Thomas O. Barnett, head of the department's Antitrust Division.

ISU President Mark Glyptis declined to comment on discussions with the USW and Esmark. While he is disappointed with the Justice Department ruling, he said it could generate more work for Weirton.

Mitch Hecht of Hampshire Steel Investments, the other investor interested in Weirton, declined comment until he met with ISU officials, who had preferred his bid to Esmark's.

Possible buyers for Sparrows Point include foreign steelmakers seeking to establish a foothold in the North American market. Overseas buyers in recent years include Mittal, which in 2005 acquired International Steel Group, the owner of Bethlehem, Weirton and other formerly bankrupt mills.

Russian producer OAO Severstal acquired Rouge Steel of Dearborn, Mich., in 2004 and is Wheeling-Pitt's partner in a Follansbee, W.Va., coke plant. Last month, Russia's Evraz Group acquired Oregon Steel Mills for $2.3 billion.

(Len Boselovic can be reached at lboselovic@post-gazette.com or 412-263-1941.)

Feds Add Twist To Chicago Steel Firm's Plans (CHIT)

By James P. Miller, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

A ruling Justice Department antitrust authorities disclosed today promises to complicate Chicago-based Esmark Inc.'s expansion effort.

The fast-growing steel-distribution company has been expanding into steel production and it is currently in the process of acquiring a West Virginia steel maker known as Wheeling-Pitttsburgh Corp., through a "reverse merger" that will turn closely held Esmark into a publicly traded company.

In addition to Wheeling-Pitt, Esmark has been making overtures to acquire Weirton Steel, based in Weirton, West Virginia.

Weirton has been thought to be potentially available because of Justice Department concerns linked to the pending mega-merger between the world's two biggest steel makers, Arcelor S.A. of Belgium and Netherlands-based Mittal Steel.

In August, the Justice Department -- which routinely reviews corporate mergers to see if they would damage marketplace competition -- agreed that it sign off on the Arcelor-Mittal combination if Mittal agreed to divest a steel mill that supplied certain products to the eastern U.S.

Under that so-called "consent decree," the Justice Department had the right to select for divestiture either Mittal's Weirton mill or Mittal's Sparrow's Point plant near Baltimore.

Most observers had figured that Weirton would be the plant to be jettisoned; that's why Esmark had been publicly expressing interest and holding talks with the plant's union management.

Today, however, the department's antitrust division unexpectedly said Mittal must shed the Sparrow's Point, Md. operation.

Esmark spokesman Bill Keegan said the company founded by brothers Craig and James Bouchard, "remains interested in acquiring Weirton, if Mittal is so inclined."

Jpmiller@tribune.com

Sirius-XM's Fate Hinges On Definitions (WSJ)

By Amy Schatz And John R. Wilke

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

If Satellite Radio Is Part Of a Broader Market, Deal May Pass Muster

WASHINGTON -- Federal approval of the proposed $11.4 billion merger of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. will hinge on how regulators define the companies' market.

If Justice Department antitrust enforcers find a distinct market for satellite radio, the deal could be dead, because it would create a monopoly. But if the market instead includes the traditional radio industry, iPods and Internet radio, as the companies argue, the deal could win approval, though not without conditions.

In a preview of the battle that will play out in Washington in months to come, consumer advocates and some lawmakers said yesterday that the deal will stifle competition and should be stopped. Sirius and XM countered that they need the deal to compete with other forms of audio entertainment. They say they face stiff competition from AM and FM radio, with 280 million listeners, as well as the hot new digital-music market, with more than 100 million iPods already sold. They even cite rising competition from music-enabled mobile phones and Internet radio.

DOJ_NMG_0134857

History doesn't offer much encouragement for this argument. A similar merger between two satellite-television companies -- Hughes Electronics Corp. and EchoStar Communications Corp. -- was shot down in 2002. At the time, the TV companies argued that the $18 billion deal was needed to combine efforts to fight off strong competition from cable companies. But the Federal Communications Commission rejected the deal even before the Justice Department could act, saying it raised the risk of "immediate and substantial" harm to consumers through higher prices and less competition, particularly in rural areas that aren't served by cable companies.

In contrast, XM and Sirius are arguing, satellite radio competes with all forms of audio entertainment. In meetings with the regulators and on Capitol Hill, the companies will press this sweeping market definition. The broader the market, the more likely a deal will be approved: When Coca-Cola Co. sought to buy Dr Pepper in the mid-1980s, its experts argued in court that their market should include not just soft drinks but all potable liquids sold in North America, including water. The approach was dubbed the "Lake Erie defense." (The deal was opposed by regulators and eventually scotched.)

Sirius and XM are getting support for their view of the market from an unlikely source. The radio industry has loudly opposed the deal since it was announced, and broadcasters cite satellite-radio operators as major competitors in securities filings. That's confirmation that these market segments compete, the companies say. Sirius and XM also insist they couldn't increase rates substantially and still keep growing -- citing as one example the low retention rate of drivers who end up paying for a subscription to the service when their cars come equipped with satellite radio.

"The issue here is taking two competitive companies and making them into one. Historically, the government has looked skeptically at endorsing a monopoly," said Dennis Wharton, a spokesman for the National Association of Broadcasters.

Sirius and XM are also counting on the more relaxed merger-review standards that have emerged in the Bush administration. Regulators have challenged few deals and blessed such once-unthinkable deals as a reuniting of AT&T with its former Bell offspring, and the merger of Whirlpool Corp. and Maytag. In the wake of those deals, an anything-goes view is emerging among some practitioners in the antitrust bar.

Even without an easing of merger-review standards, enforcers have long been reluctant to meddle in emerging markets, where technology and competition are still developing -- and where the real economic rivalry could be another technology in another market.

The companies hope to close the deal by year's end, but even that could be optimistic. Justice Department investigators, led by antitrust chief Thomas Barnett, will work under a formal timetable to review the deal, but that framework is often cast aside in big or controversial deals. The government is likely to ask for more information -- cartons of data and scores of interviews -- then strike a deal with the companies to push off any closing while it conducts its review.

Across town, the FCC -- a fractious, five-member commission -- could easily take more than six months to complete its review. Its chairman, Kevin Martin, has already said the deal faces a "high bar" to overcome in order to be found in the public interest, the standard under FCC rules. The agency also could seek the eventual return of some of the FCC-awarded radio spectrum held by the companies, which would require extensive negotiations and may be a possible deal killer.

XM and Sirius will also need to address what might be called the Howard Stern problem: The foul-mouthed radio host is among several edgy radio personalities that decamped to satellite radio, where regulators have no jurisdiction to enforce federal indecency rules. The FCC can only enforce indecency rules on free over-the-air broadcasts.

Requiring XM-Sirius to voluntarily abide by federal indecency standards could be one condition that is placed on the deal. The companies appear to be trying to address that issue by allowing consumers great flexibility in programming. That might include allowing consumers to purchase a tier of service that didn't include Mr. Stern and other radio personalities whose shows might be considered inappropriate for children.

"Anytime you go from two competitors in a market to one, a big red flag goes up," says Gene Kimmelman, vice president for federal affairs at Consumers Union, which plans to lobby for consumer protections to be included in the deal, including channel set-asides for noncommercial stations and pricing flexibility for consumers.

Write to Amy Schatz at Amy.Schatz@wsj.com13

XM-Sirius Merger Hinges On FCC Ownership Rule (WP)

By Charles Babington And Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Climate Still Competitive, Satellite Radio Firms Say

DOJ_NMG_0134858

Winning approval for a proposed merger of the nation's two satellite-radio companies turns on whether regulators buy their argument that iPods, Internet radio and other new technologies have expanded so dramatically that a monopoly would not harm consumers' choices or purses.

It may be a difficult argument to win, but XM Satellite Holdings and Sirius Satellite Radio's officers say it's worth the gamble and have assembled an expensive and experienced team of lobbyists to aid them in the fight. Alone, the companies have suffered heavy losses and spent heavily on recruiting personalities such as Howard Stern and Oprah Winfrey and on marketing to compete against each other.

Now, New York-based Sirius and XM of the District are lining up some of the best-known and highest-paid lawyers and lobbyists, while competitors and consumer groups vow to fight back. The biggest potential roadblock for the merger is a 1997 Federal Communications Commission declaration that a single owner may not control the subscriber-only satellite radio business.

But the advance of technologies such as iPods and other MP3 players, music-playing cellphones and land-based radio stations with digital broadcasts offer so much music, news and talk that the competitive climate is radically different and the FCC should waive the 1997 rule, Sirius chief executive Mel Karmazin said in a conference call yesterday. "Consumers today have a significantly broader range of audio entertainment options from which to choose," he said.

All those new devices, however, are not directly analogous to satellite radio, and Karmazin's plea is a tough sell, said Chad Bartley, an analyst for Pacific Crest Securities. XM and Sirius provide "the only paid-radio service out there," he said, and regulators may be loath to turn them into a monopoly. He rated the chances for merger approval at "less than 50-50."

"The regulatory process will be quite onerous," said William Kidd, an analyst for Wedbush Morgan, an investment firm in Los Angeles. Regulators will be reluctant to create a single satellite-radio company, particularly because they have recruited a total of 14 million paying customers in five years as separate companies, he said.

The challenges do not end there. XM and Sirius said they hope the deal will close by the end of the year, but some analysts say the costly lobbying battle might stretch into next year. Meanwhile, the two companies must continue to deliver multiple channels of music, talk and sports to their customers, and right the business models that have never generated a sustained profit nor impressed investors in recent years.

The companies assured customers by e-mail yesterday that services will not change during the merger proceedings.

Karmazin said a merger would lead to savings by eliminating duplications in programming and operations. But it would impose new costs as well. Karmazin said the companies plan to design equipment to let customers receive signals from both companies, which use different satellite technologies. They also hope to sell more advertising, he said, even though the promise of largely commercial-free broadcasts has traditionally been a key appeal of satellite radio.

The National Association of Broadcasters and groups such as the Consumer Federation of America and Common Cause plan to oppose the merger. They want to make sure that consumers are not stuck with outdated equipment and contracts that are not honored. The groups also will probably seek to have the merged entity provide nonprofit, public channels.

"We will take the position that this merger is suspect," said Mark N. Cooper, research director of the Consumer Federation of America. "We will insist that if the government determines to let the merger go forward, it needs to condition it." Several analysts agreed that accepting conditions -- such as limits on increasing the cost of subscriptions, now $12.95 a month for both companies -- might be XM's and Sirius's best hope for approval from the FCC and the Justice Department.

Both companies have a potent roster of contract-lobbying companies at their disposal. XM has worked with the Palmetto Group, Patton Boggs, Wexler & Walker Public Policy Associates and Monument Policy Group. Sirius has Wiley Rein, the Paul Laxalt Group and Ricchetti Inc., according to lobbying disclosure records.

XM shares rose $1.43, to $15.41 yesterday. Sirius shares rose 22 cents, to $3.92.

Sirius And XM Woo Regulators (FT)

By Joshua Chaffin In New York

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio yesterday portrayed themselves as two small players in an expanding and highly competitive consumer audio market as they sought to win over regulators for their planned merger.

In a conference call with investors, executives from the companies argued that technology had created an array of new competitors for their services beyond traditional free radio, including portable music devices, mobile phones capable of playing music, internet radio services, personal computers and others.

"Competition in this market is robust, and we're seeing new entrants on a regular basis as disruptive technologies continue to emerge," said Gary Parsons, chairman of XM, adding that satellite radio was still "a small player by comparison".

DOJ_NMG_0134859

Antitrust concerns have shaped up as the biggest hurdle to an $11.4bn deal, not including debt, that would unite the two companies. When they were awarded broadcast licences a decade ago, the Federal Communications Commission mandated that neither company could own both satellite licences.

Following the deal's announcement on Monday, Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, reminded the companies that the hurdle for approval would be "high" given that provision. Sirius shares rose 5 per cent and XM's 10 per cent.

Mel Karmazin, the Sirius chief executive, pledged to investors that the companies had studied the regulatory issue, and predicted that the deal would close before the end of the year. Mr Karmazin said: "We believe there is a solid basis for approval, and are committed to working with the regulatory agencies to ensure approval."

David Bank, who covers the companies at RBC Capital Markets, said he still believed that the chances were better than even that the deal would be approved, but saw shortcomings in the companies' presentation.

Lawyers reviewing the case said it was difficult to find a precedent because of the strict mandate contained in the companies licences as well as the rapid technological change in the media industry since those documents were drawn up.

"Frankly, it's hard to handicap because there are so many different ways to look at it," said Leo Asaro, a partner in the antitrust practice at Bryan Cave.

Tough Antitrust Hurdles Seen For XM, Sirius Deal (MRKTWTCH)

By Robert Schroeder & David B. Wilkerson, Marketwatch

Market Watch, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- A month ago, the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission said a tie-up between satellite radio companies XM and Sirius wouldn't get past his agency. On Monday, the chiefs of those companies decided to challenge that vow.

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. said Monday they were taking their proposed marriage to stockholders and regulators to get an OK for a combination worth $13 billion and the ears of 14 million paid subscribers. See full story.

It's a bold challenge: On Jan. 17, FCC chief Kevin Martin had said agency rules would prohibit "one entity owning both of those [satellite] licenses." See archived story.

After the merger was announced, Martin issued a strongly worded statement reiterating his concerns.

"The hurdle here ... would be high as the commission originally prohibited one company from holding the only two satellite radio licenses," he said. "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices."

The Sirius-XM combination would follow directly on the heels of the hotly debated merger between AT&T Inc. and BellSouth. The five-member commission of the FCC wrangled for nine months over whether to approve that deal, suggesting a similar combination of two big firms would have to endure the same withering scrutiny.

In AT&T's case, though, the company had the support of Martin, a Republican close to the White House. Sirius and XM not only face skepticism from the FCC chairman but probably from the panel's two Democrats, each of whom has been critical of media consolidation. The Democratic takeover of Congress probably doesn't help the cause of the satellite merger partners.

Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin - who would also be CEO of the combined company - and XM Chairman Gary Parsons aim to persuade Washington that a merger is the best way to position satellite radio for battle with such technologies as podcasting.

Parsons and XM's CEO, Hugh Panero, said the new company "will be better positioned to compete effectively with the continually expanding array of entertainment alternatives that consumers have embraced since the Federal Communications Commission first granted our satellite radio licenses a decade ago."

If the companies pass FCC and Justice Department muster, they're expecting the deal to be completed by the end of this year.

Opposition emerged quickly from the companies' broadcasting rivals.

The National Association of Broadcasters slammed the proposal in a statement late Monday, saying it would be "shocked" if it went through.

"When the FCC authorized satellite radio, it specifically found that the public would be served best by two competitive nationwide systems," said NAB Executive Vice President Dennis Wharton, according to a statement from the trade group. "We're hopeful that this anti-consumer proposal will be rejected," Wharton said.

Meanwhile, at least one analyst appears to see hope for a deal.

Last week, Bear Stearns' Robert Peck told clients that both companies thought a merger could receive approval from regulators.

DOJ_NMG_0134860

"We believe any public progress of making a deal has been slowed by the economics of the exact split in a [merged company]," Peck wrote in a research note. To overcome this apparent hurdle, Peck said investors were likely to push the companies to "avoid quibbling over a few share points, to capture the much larger value of overall potential synergies."

FAQ: Serious Challenges For Sirius-XM Merger (CNET)

By Elinor Mills, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, February 21, 2007

Regulatory hurdles are huge for deal some worry could lead to a satellite radio monopoly. But the biggest impact would be on customers.

Executives at Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio seem to think they have a better chance at turning a profit as one giant company than as bare-knuckled competitors.

The companies, struggling to reach profitability, announced Monday that they agreed to an all-stock "merger of equals," with shareholders of each company owning 50 percent of the combined company. XM shareholders would receive 4.6 shares of Sirius for each of their XM shares, setting the value of XM at about $5 billion. Sirius Chief Executive Mel Karmazin and XM Chairman Gary Parsons would both retain their titles, but for the combined company.

But getting federal regulators to sign off on the merger won't be easy, and perhaps in an effort to make walking away from the deal easier, the companies have not said what the name of the combined entity would be or where it would be located. The companies expect the transaction to be completed by the end of this year. There are plenty of questions about how this will play out in the coming months:

Why do Sirius and XM want to merge?

Both companies have been losing money, with combined losses in 2005 of $1.5 billion. While they have yet to turn a profit, the companies have been engaged in a talent acquisition war to attract listeners. Sirius signed a five-year contract worth $500 million, plus bonuses, to broadcast a morning show with popular shock-jock radio personality Howard Stern in 2004. Not long after, XM signed an 11-year, $650 million contract to broadcast Major League Baseball. The company also has a three-year, $55 million deal with television talk show host Oprah Winfrey. By combining efforts, the companies hope to stem their losses and help the market grow.

How would a merger affect consumers?

It's too early to predict how the merger would affect prices for the service. Each company now charges just under $13 per month for its satellite radio service. Sirius and XM said that with the merger they could offer more programming and greater choice to consumers, including the ability to pick and choose channels and content on an "a la carte" basis. Some channels would likely be cut to reduce overlap. The companies also said they would "improve on products, such as real-time traffic and rear-seat video, and introduce new ones, such as advanced data services including enhanced traffic, weather and infotainment offerings."

Will their hardware work together?

Radio devices from Sirius and XM currently on the market do not receive signals from each other's services, so a combined company would have to develop a new radio, and consumers would have to upgrade. At first glance, it doesn't seem that existing hardware can be modified to receive a new signal.

XM radio spokesman Nathaniel Brown said it's too early in the process to provide engineering details, but "XM will fully support its current subscribers, who will not need to purchase new radios and will continue to receive the XM signal. We will work toward a radio that receives both signals."

Sirius CEO Karmazin said in a conference call on Tuesday that the combined company would "be able to speed the introduction of radios offering content from both our services today, something that has been commercially challenging as separate companies. Our radios will be smaller, lighter, simpler, and cooler than what each company has today."

In a joint statement announcing the deal on Monday, the companies said that the merger would allow them to develop and introduce "a wider range of lower-cost, easy-to-use and multifunctional devices through efficiencies in chipset and radio design and procurement." The companies also plan to work together on improving the scope and quality of the combined service. "Over time, we will work to combine our satellite and terrestrial transmission infrastructure to deliver the broadest range of content and the highest level of service quality," Karmazin said.

What regulatory hurdles does the deal face?

The U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission must grant approval, posing a significant challenge. Because Sirius and XM are the only two satellite radio providers operating in the country, their merger would effectively create a monopoly. Federal legislation bars both satellite radio licenses from being owned by the same company to guard against high prices and other negative effects on consumers. FCC Chairman Kevin Martin said in a statement that the hurdle for approval would be high. "The companies would need to demonstrate that consumers would clearly be better off with both more choice and affordable prices," Martin said. Given historic opposition to media consolidation by Democrats, who control Congress, the companies will have some hard lobbying to do.

DOJ_NMG_0134861

The National Association of Broadcasters is asking regulators to bar the merger, noting that regulators rejected a similar merger proposal from the country's only two satellite television companies, DirecTV and DISH Network. Two years ago, the NAB opposed XM's proposed $198 million acquisition of WCS Wireless before the deal fell through.

How will the companies defend their merger?

The defense will likely hinge on the definition of "competition in the digital audio marketplace." In announcing their merger plans, Sirius and XM said they faced competition from free "over-the-air" AM and FM radio, as well as from iPods and mobile-phone streaming, HD radio, Internet radio and next-generation wireless technologies. Complicating the defense could be the lawsuit record labels have filed against XM alleging that devices that allow people to capture music from XM's broadcasts and turn them into MP3 files for storing and replaying, like the Pioneer Inno, infringe on copyright.

How big would the combined company be?

The combined value of the company would be about $13 billion, which includes net debt of about $1.6 billion. Combined 2006 revenue was about $1.5 billion based on analyst consensus estimates. There would be about 14 million subscribers of a combined company.

What are each company's strengths?

New York City-based Sirius saw its subscriber base rise by more than 80 percent over the last year to about 6 million. The company has more than 130 channels, with 69 commercial-free music channels and 65 channels of sports, news, talk, entertainment, traffic, weather and other data. The company is the official satellite radio partner of the NFL, Nascar, NBA and NHL. Sirius also offers an Internet radio service that broadcasts more than 75 channels online. Sirius radios are sold in more than 25,000 retail locations, for use in cars, homes, RVs and boats. The company has a market capitalization of about $5.5 billion.

Washington, D.C.-based XM has about 7.6 million subscribers and more than 170 channels and broadcasts live from studios in Toronto, Montreal, Washington, D.C., New York, Chicago and the Country Music Hall of Fame in Nashville. XM also has signed deals with automakers to have its radios preinstalled in 140 different vehicle models this year. The company's market capitalization is about $4.2 billion.

Will Howard Stern get richer?

It's too early to say whether the companies' contracts with celebrities will be renewed. But with only one satellite radio provider operating, future deals would likely be less lucrative for such personalities.

FCC Hurdles Loom For XM, Sirius Merger (AP)

By John Dunbar, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

When the Federal Communications Commission auctioned off two exclusive licenses to create the satellite radio industry 10 years ago, it did not mince words on whether the competing providers could merge.

The agency said that one licensee will "not be permitted to acquire control" of the other. The clause was inserted to ensure "sufficient continuing competition" in the new business, it said.

But when dealing with the FCC, one should never say never.

"The FCC can undo anything it does," said Andrew Schwartzman, president and CEO of the Media Access Project, a public interest law firm in Washington. "However, when you change course, you need a good reason to do it."

On Monday, Washington D.C.-based XM Satellite Radio Holdings Inc. and New York City-based Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. announced a deal valued at $4.84 billion at the close of trading on Wall Street Tuesday.

The companies will have to gain approval from the Justice Department as well as the FCC. Justice typically goes first in satellite mergers. If it blocks the deal, it's game over. But Schwartzman said that is unlikely to happen.

"My guess is this Justice Department will be willing to accept any plausible argument that is presented to it," he said. "The FCC is a much tougher case."

The Justice Department looks at how mergers affect competition. The companies will argue that since the industry was created in 1997, times have changed, and so has the market. It's no longer radio, it's "audio entertainment," which includes terrestrial radio, digital "high-definition" radio that offers better sound and more stations, Internet stations and even Apple iPods.

The FCC's review is different. The airwaves are owned by the public. Therefore the law requires that any transfers of control of licenses be done only if it serves the "public interest, convenience and necessity."

DOJ_NMG_0134862

The exact meaning of those words has been debated since they first appeared in the Radio Act of 1927 and later in the Communications Act of 1934.

The companies' argument to the FCC, previewed Monday, will be that a combined satellite provider will offer a wider range of programming choices for listeners.

As for the ban on combining two licensees, if the companies can convince the Justice Department that there is competition from the nonsatellite radio market, it will help their case with the FCC.

"If they do that, I don't see how it's a problem for the FCC to say, 'We no longer need this rule,'" said Blair Levin, a telecommunications analyst with Stifel Nicolaus and the agency's former chief of staff under former FCC Chairman Reed Hundt.

The FCC also considers financial viability when deciding on license transfers. For two companies to be prevented from combining and then go out of business, for example, would not be deemed in the public interest.

Sirius and XM are not using that reasoning for the merger, but to date, they have built up considerable debt, have yet to turn a profit and watched their stocks decline more than 40 percent last year.

Levin doubts the companies would use that argument because they are not in danger of failing.

Public-interest groups so far are skeptical, says Schwartzman, but they have not come out against the merger. They will argue in favor of some safeguards on diversity and competition.

How these would work is yet to be determined, but it may include a requirement that the combined company provide space on its system for noncommercial, public interest programming.

The satellite radio industry was not saddled with public-interest obligations when it was created because it was a brand-new business. But that may change.

"If you can revisit the question about whether there should be one satellite radio service rather than two you can certainly revisit the question of whether there should be public service obligations," Schwartzman said.

New Climate May Benefit Radio Deal (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Radio">Sirius Satellite Radio, made a lot of phone calls seeking advice before he entered into a merger deal with Radio">XM Satellite Radio on Monday.

Maybe he should have called Charles W. Ergen, the founder and chairman of EchoStar Communications.

Mr. Ergen could have given Mr. Karmazin an earful about his failed effort to merge EchoStar with DirecTV four years ago, a deal that seems eerily similar to the one Sirius and XM have proposed.

Will the government see things differently this time?

Michael K. Powell, the former chairman of the Federal Communications Commission who blocked the EchoStar-DirecTV deal, is not so sure.

“I do think it could get through, but I don’t think it’s going to be an easy one,” he said. “It’s going to be incumbent on the companies to demonstrate that the analysis in EchoStar-DirecTV is different.”

In opposing that deal, regulators — both from the F.C.C. and the Justice Department — argued the merger would create a monopoly. EchoStar and DirecTV, on the other hand, argued that the market should be defined more broadly than simply satellite television and should encompass cable television operators and telephone companies providing video over phone lines.

When Sirius and XM announced their merger on Monday, they made a similar argument — that their market is much bigger than just satellite radio.

“In addition to existing competition from free ‘over-the-air’ AM and FM radio as well as iPods and mobile phone streaming, satellite radio will face new challenges from the rapid growth of HD Radio, Internet radio and next generation wireless technologies,” the companies said.

There is no question that times have clearly changed: a decade ago, the argument for a Sirius-XM merger would have never had a chance.

Joel I. Klein, then the acting assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, gave a speech to the radio industry 10 years ago this week, suggesting that merging terrestrial radio stations in the same market was “no different from a situation where all soft drink manufacturers would seek to merge and control 100 percent of that market. We wouldn’t walk away from such a merger — and if you like soft drinks I should think you wouldn’t want us to walk away — merely because there are lots of other beverages out there, such as milk, juice, beer, wine, et cetera.”

But the regulatory tone in Washington has changed. Inside Sirius and XM, executives are bullish on government approval.

DOJ_NMG_0134863

In a conference call with analysts yesterday, Mr. Karmazin said that "I would not have gone to our board," if he "didn't think there was greater than a 50-50 chance of approval." In fact, the deal's timing was driven in part by a feeling that the current administration was more likely to let the deal through and that it needed to be done before that window closed.

The Justice Department's surprising approval of Whirlpool's acquisition of Maytag — a deal that created the nation's largest manufacturer of appliances with more than 50 percent market share — has encouraged others to proceed with deals that might have seemed to pose regulatory problems.

But Sirius and XM should not necessarily take solace in the shifting attitude in Washington and the Whirlpool decision, some antitrust experts suggest, because the deal's fate may be decided by the F.C.C., which issued two sets of satellite spectrum to Sirius and XM in order to create competition.

At the time, the F.C.C. defined free-to-air radio as a separate market from satellite because free-to-air radio, which included local programming like weather and traffic, was tightly regulated while satellite's content would be unfettered.

"Howard Stern couldn't do his current broadcast on radio," said Mr. Powell, who had fined Mr. Stern several times for some of his lewd talk on terrestrial radio before his program moved to Sirius.

Mr. Powell said that in the end, the deal's fate would lie in the evidence that both companies produce during the government's review. He said that while EchoStar and DirecTV publicly talked up an assortment of competitors like cable and telephone, when the government got its hands on the companies' documents about the way they internally defined their rivals, "it seemed that the only competitors who mattered were each other."

Of course, perhaps the largest factor in their decision will be the precedent regulators want to set. "If the Federal Communications Commission grants a green light for this transaction, the brakes will be off for similar telecommunications industry hookups," Carmi Levy, senior research analyst with Info-Tech Research Group, wrote to clients. If so, perhaps Mr. Ergen will get a second chance.

What Would A Satellite Radio Merger Mean? (USAT)

USA Today, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK — Wall Street sure likes the signals that Sirius and XM Satellite Radio are beaming about their merger plans.

XM shares soared 10.2% to $15.41 and Sirius was up about 6% to $3.92 on Tuesday, the first day of trading after the companies announced their deal to create a single — and still unnamed — satellite radio power to be run by Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin.

Despite the boost, the prices reflect some wariness among investors about whether the merger will actually take place. The deal must be approved by each company's shareholders, as well as by antitrust officials. And the Federal Communications Commission will have to agree to change a merger ban that is part of the original agreement when the companies were formed.

But a more important question is harder to quantify: How will consumers respond to all the changes? Will they be reluctant to sign up for either service?

While the companies can't answer many questions at this early stage in the process, media reporters David Lieberman and Laura Petrecca sort through some of the potential consumer concerns:

Q: I want to subscribe to satellite radio. Should I wait to see what happens with the merger?

A: It depends on how long you want to wait. The companies expect the deal to close at the end of 2007, and that might be optimistic if opponents including the National Association of Broadcasters take the fight to Congress. Until the transaction is complete, the companies are supposed to operate independently. But in the next few months, if merger talk makes potential subscribers wary, the companies might have a reason to sweeten their promotions.

Q: Isn't there a chance that my radio won't work or that either XM or Sirius will be weakened after the deal closes as they move to offer a single service?

A: XM Chairman Gary Parsons says the companies "may have 15 or more years" left to keep offering programming packages similar to the current ones. They can't risk alienating the more than 13 million people who buy Sirius or XM — and who now have radios that can only receive one service, not both.

Q: Does that mean, once the deal closes, there'll still be no change in the existing services for the foreseeable future?

A: Not necessarily. Executives say that after a merger they might share popular programming — although it's unclear whether that might include Sirius' shock jock Howard Stern or XM's Major League Baseball. A lot depends on the terms of their contracts, and when they're up for renewal.

The two also might share new services in the works, including programming for seat-back TVs in automobiles and real-time traffic, weather and other data.

Q: What other changes may be coming?

DOJ_NMG_0134864

A: Executives say they may give consumers more latitude to mix and match the channels they receive, similar to an a la carte deal. And years from now, when they can eliminate duplicative services — such as similar oldies channels — they say they'll offer more programming narrowly targeted to different ethnic groups.

Q: Wouldn't a monopoly have more power to raise prices? Should I sign a long-term deal now to lock in current rates?

A: Antitrust officials and the FCC will be looking closely at pricing. They could kill the deal if they conclude the merged companies might gouge consumers.

Sirius and XM say that they have a strong incentive to keep prices low: The 90% of radio listeners who don't subscribe to satellite tune in to traditional broadcasters that offer ad-supported shows for free. Sirius and XM also face growing competition from Internet radio and podcasts, wireless phone-based services and iPods.

But Morgan Joseph analyst David Kestenbaum notes that XM raised prices 30% two years ago and still picked up lots of new subscribers.

Q: Will the merged company boost revenue by selling more ads in its programs?

A: Hard to say. Ad-free programming is a big selling point for satellite radio. But Wall Street is tired of satellite radio's red ink. Karmazin told analysts on Tuesday that one advantage to having a merged company is that it would be more attractive to national advertisers.

Q: The companies are talking about selling radios capable of receiving both services. When can I buy one?

A: It may be awhile. The companies say they'll begin to push hard toward developing a unified receiver once the merger is complete. Karmazin says he expects the next-generation receivers to be "smaller, lighter, simpler and cooler."

Q: Aren't the two already working on a unified radio?

A: Under pressure from the FCC, they agreed in 2000 to design chipsets and other technology that could receive signals from Sirius and XM. A firm that they've supported has developed a unified radio unit, but it hasn't been approved by the FCC.

Meanwhile, it hasn't made commercial sense to develop a dual radio with two chipsets: It would cost more than the existing ones that receive just one service, and most subscribers pick either Sirius or XM, not both.

Bank of America analyst Jonathan Jacoby estimates that even after a unified or dual radio is available, both systems would have to run independently for at least another three years until customers can be switched over to a combined platform, perhaps with a subsidized radio exchange program.

Automakers also would need to switch over to installing the new, integrated units into their vehicles, a process that normally requires two to three years, Jacoby says.

Q: Why are the companies going through all of the trouble to merge?

A: Although Sirius and XM are still young companies, they are unprofitable, and investors are concerned about the slowdown in the growth rate of new subscriptions.

For example, they point out that 60 million cars have outlets on their stereos to plug in iPods. And conventional free radio stations are investing in HD Radio, which can provide many additional channels of clear, digital signals.

By merging, Sirius and XM say they can cut costs by as much as $7 billion a year. In addition to dropping duplicative channels, they could cut marketing expenses. And programming costs might level off once they stop bidding against each other for talent.

Contributing: The Associated Press

In The Same Orbit, But On Different Planets (WP)

By Frank Ahrens

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

In the radio industry, Sirius Satellite Radio chief executive Mel Karmazin is like Bono or Prince or Charo: One name is sufficient. Say "Mel," and everyone knows who you're talking about.

The same cannot be said of XM Satellite Radio Holdings Chairman Gary M. Parsons. That's why some say, if the proposed merger between the two satellite companies is approved by regulators, the two executives may work well together.

Under the proposed merger, Karmazin would be the chief executive of the combined company, with Parsons chairing the board. There is no role in the new company for current XM chief executive Hugh Panero, whose duties have diminished since the XM board appointed director Nate Davis as president and chief operating officer in July.

Karmazin and Parsons are opposite in temperament and style, said Tom Taylor, editor of Inside Radio, an industry trade paper. Karmazin can be electric; Parsons is more laid-back.

Case in point: The rambunctious Karmazin has been tossing merger speculation to the New York media and Wall Street analysts for the past several months. The more reserved Parsons has been just as interested in a merger, he said yesterday, but kept it to himself.

"He was looking at it," Parsons said of a merger, "and we were looking at it -- just less publicly."

Complementary traits between the pair could be key because the last time Karmazin was part of a power duo, things didn't go so well. He left his job as chief operating officer of Viacom for Sirius in 2004 after clashing with Sumner Redstone, the equally strong-willed leader of Viacom.

Before coming to Sirius, Karmazin spent more than three decades in the terrestrial radio business, most of it running Infinity Broadcasting's radio stations and then CBS Radio, when it bought Infinity and eventually became Viacom.

Mel stories are plentiful, and they consistently paint Karmazin as a sleeves-up radio man devoted to making money for shareholders.

Taylor recalls a story of Karmazin helping set up chairs in a meeting room before the start of an investors' conference. Karmazin has near-total recall, Taylor said, which has come back to haunt station managers who worked under Karmazin and failed to produce a promised ratings number.

If there's one thing to know about Karmazin, it's that he's always about the sale. There's a reason "Mel" rhymes with "sell."

"He's one of radio's best-ever sales guys," Taylor said. "He knows how to sell radio advertising."

In 1985, Karmazin sold CBS on hiring Howard Stern (after he'd been fired by New York's WNBC) and built him into a national radio superstar, often defending his antics to corporate brass. In an interview years later, Karmazin was asked what he saw in Stern that made him take a chance on him.

"Revenue," was his reply.

Karmazin is also the man who helped sell Stern on jumping to Sirius in 2004, though the $500 million contract plus performance bonuses probably helped.

Parsons, by contrast, is a veteran of the telecommunications and satellite industries who spent time as a radio deejay in his youth. He has been on XM's board since 1997. He ran XM until he brought in Panero in 1998. Prior to XM, Parsons spent six years at MCI Communications in a number of executive jobs and started several tech companies.

"The general book on me is that I'm extremely collaborative," Parsons said, noting that he has worked well with Panero, something of an outsized personality himself.

Parsons said the proposed merger became inevitable over the past few months, as both companies saw their stock price and market capitalization slide. Wall Street analysts speculated that the synergies created by a merger would be as much as $5 billion -- almost as much as the value of either company on its own.

The odd man out in the proposed merger is Panero, XM's chief executive.

Panero and head XM music programmer Lee Abrams have been with XM since nearly day one, when the company was housed in a basement apartment near Dupont Circle and the only sign of a radio company in the making was a whiteboard with dozens of format ideas scribbled on it.

Panero is a "Star Trek" fan. XM's broadcast operations center at the company's headquarters in Northeast D.C. is a dazzling spectacle of display monitors and lighted control boards sometimes referred to by employees as the bridge of the starship Enterprise.

In the middle of the room is a swiveling chair Panero had modeled after Capt. James T. Kirk's command seat on the Enterprise. Panero sat in the chair and pushed the button that launched XM's service in September 2001.

Panero is a music junkie who religiously listens to XM's channels and is credited with the vision that cultivated the business through its early years, negotiating the deals that got XM installed in new cars and acquiring talent.

However, XM's board soured on Panero's performance last year after the company missed its earnings guidance for several consecutive quarters. The company got bogged down in legal battles with the music industry and terrestrial broadcasters over technology issues and has allowed the cases to drag on, rather than settle with the groups, as Sirius has. And when Sirius started paying hundreds of millions of dollars for content -- such as the NFL and Howard Stern -- the XM board thought Panero failed to respond effectively and could no longer clearly define XM's vision, said a source familiar with the situation who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the issue.

Panero said if he could have changed anything about his time as chief executive, he would have put off having to pay so much to acquire programming early in XM's life, before it began to stabilize its losses.

Yesterday, Panero said he was proud of the business he helped build and will remain XM's chief executive until the merger is approved and perhaps beyond, if it is not.

He said he would be a little sad to give up the helm of a merged company, "but there can only be one CEO and one chairman."

US Radio Consolidation (FT)

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134866

Howard Stern, the shock jock, may be the self-styled King of all Media, but his employer, Sirius, was certainly not talking world domination in its proposed merger with XM. For the satellite radio deal, which will create a company with a $13bn enterprise value, hinges more than most on regulatory approval. Expect a lot of emphasis on underserved communities and consumer choice and the vast array of alternatives for listeners. There cannot be many media deals that generate a presentation that includes a slide highlighting how many US vehicle registrations there are.

The companies have a point. Competition from AM/FM radio as well as new services, from iPods to streaming music for mobile phones, are real challenges for satellite radio. But Sirius and XM do not just have to make the pure antitrust case, they also have to convince the Federal Communications Commission that the public interest is best served by changing the rules governing their operating licences. It is a gamble, but US business has pulled off far greater ones.

Having said that, this will be a lobbying bunfight. The broadcasters have already weighed in and the market is taking a cautious view: XM's shares traded up strongly, but not as high as would be implied by the sweet 22 per cent premium tacked on to the terms of what was presented as a merger of equals.

If the market could gain extra comfort on the regulatory side, there should be more celebrating to come. For the synergies on offer should be considerable for such a business whose fixed costs are so heavy, from programming to technology.

The companies gave little detail yesterday, bar a range of values for the synergies that, at its higher level, would represent more than the market capitalisations of either company. That looks punchy given the time it may take to realise the benefits. But the economic rationale for merging is still compelling. If only Mr Stern's gift of the gab could be brought to bear in persuading the FCC into thinking the same.

Making Radio Waves (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

As the Federal Communications Commission ponders the merits of allowing satellite radio companies Sirius and XM to combine, let's hope the ghost of another proposed merger haunts the proceedings.

In 2002 the FCC blocked satellite television rivals EchoStar and DirecTV from joining forces on the grounds that allowing the merger would decrease competition and lead to higher prices. Michael Powell, the FCC chairman at the time, said the deal would create a satellite monopoly.

In the event, regulatory intervention, based on an overly narrow definition of the market, has only led to unfulfilled promise in satellite broadband. Five years later, the cable and phone companies are by and large eating satellite's lunch in attracting subscribers. Rupert Murdoch is in the process of selling his stake in DirecTV. And consumers who want one provider for television, Internet and phone service have fewer options than they might otherwise if the regulators had stayed out of the way.

Which brings us to the proposed merger of XM and Sirius. On news of the deal, FCC Chairman Kevin Martin remarked that the regulatory hurdles "would be high." If so, the agency might want to write more up-to-date regulations. The current "digital audio radio service" rules date to the late 1980s, before high definition radio, iPods, Pandora.com, music file-sharing and other options existed. The media landscape has changed a bit since The Police split up.

Beltway critics of the deal see a media monopolist around every corner, scheming to limit the public's access to content. And it's true that the merger would create a lone satellite radio company. But a pure monopoly is one that exists in a market where there are no close substitutes. By contrast, a combined Sirius-XM would have to compete not only with free broadcast radio but also with MP3 players, online radio and even music channels offered by cable providers.

Heaven only knows what the cellular companies will bring to the party. They're already gearing up to provide more video options, but there's nothing stopping Verizon or Cingular from coming up with a device that includes a couple of dozen radio stations to compete with satellite.

Which is why the real danger here isn't the creation of a "monopoly," unless you define the market in a way that has no resemblance to the real world. The bigger concern is that regulators will repeat the satellite television mistake and in the process reduce consumer choice. "The reason for this merger is not to exclude others from the market," says Adam Thierer, who follows telecom issues at the Progress & Freedom Foundation. "It's to make sure they can compete in the broader market against the various players they face -- serious competitors that have satellite radio providers scrambling for their lives."

The most vocal opponents will be traditional radio broadcasters, who will want the deal scotched outright, or at least conditioned on satellite operators being prohibited from offering local services -- news, weather, traffic -- that would compete with their own offerings. Legislation to this effect has been floating around for the last couple of Congresses, courtesy of Republican Representative Charles Pickering of Mississippi.

We hope Mr. Martin will resist any push for industrial protectionism. If this deal, or subscription-based satellite radio in general, turns out to be a bust, the marketplace will let us know in due time.

DOJ_NMG_0134867

Supreme Court Overturns $79 Million Award Against Weyerhaeuser (AP)

By Curt Woodward, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, February 21, 2007

SEATTLE -- The U.S. Supreme Court threw out a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser Co. on Tuesday, but the forest products giant could face a new trial on antitrust claims from a defunct sawmill.

Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. of Vancouver, Wash. - which went out of business in 2001 - convinced an Oregon jury that Weyerhaeuser paid too much for alder logs it didn't need, with the goal of driving competitors out of business.

Under federal antitrust law, the jury's award was tripled to $79 million.

Supreme Court justices overturned that 2003 judgment in a 9-0 ruling Tuesday, saying Ross-Simmons must meet a stricter legal standard than the trial court originally allowed.

Writing for the court, Justice Clarence Thomas said Ross-Simmons should have been required to prove that its competitor had a dangerous probability of recouping the losses it incurred in bidding up prices.

The failure to satisfy that standard "cannot support the jury's verdict," Thomas wrote.

Federal Way-based Weyerhaeuser applauded Tuesday's decision.

"The Court's unanimous ruling sets a clear standard that permits companies to bid competitively for raw materials without risk of violating antitrust laws," Weyerhaeuser Vice President Sandy D. McDade said in a statement.

But Mike Haglund, a Portland, Ore.-based lawyer for Ross-Simmons, said he expects to prevail again if the case eventually returns to U.S. District Court for a new trial.

"We're going to have to go back and retry it under that new standard," Haglund said. "I don't think the result will change - we'll still win. But it is a tougher standard."

Shares of Weyerhaeuser closed down 20 cents, or 0.24 percent, at $82.83 in Tuesday trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Weyerhaeuser appealed the jury award to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco, which affirmed that Ross-Simmons needed only to convince a jury that Weyerhaeuser had bought more logs than it needed at a higher price than necessary to gain a monopoly.

The Bush administration asked the Supreme Court to take the case, arguing that the San Francisco-based appellate court erred by setting a low and confusing standard that threatened to "chill pro-competitive conduct by companies that bid aggressively."

From 1998 to 2001, 27 alder sawmills closed in the Pacific Northwest. Alder, the Northwest's leading hardwood lumber, is used in furniture and specialty products such as picture frames and musical instruments.

High Court Limits Antitrust Suits In Weyerhaeuser Win (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Greg Stohr

Bloomberg, February 21, 2007

Feb. 20 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. Supreme Court overturned a $79 million antitrust award against lumber producer Weyerhaeuser Co. in a ruling that will help shield companies from claims that they illegally tried to drive a competitor out of business.

The justices today unanimously said a jury used the wrong standard in concluding that Weyerhaeuser monopolized the Pacific Northwest market for finished alder, a hardwood used in furniture. A now-defunct rival accused Weyerhaeuser, the world's biggest forest products company, of overbidding for scarce logs.

The ruling is a victory for large U.S. companies, giving them more room to bid aggressively for raw materials and other supplies without the risk of violating federal antitrust laws. Dow Chemical Co., Verizon Communications Inc., Coca-Cola Co. and Microsoft Corp. were among the companies that supported Weyerhaeuser at the Supreme Court.

``There are myriad legitimate reasons -- ranging from benign to affirmatively procompetitive -- why a buyer might bid up input prices," Justice Clarence Thomas wrote for the 9-0 court.

The case centered on a judge's instruction to jurors that they could award damages if Weyerhaeuser bought ``more logs than it needed" and prevented Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. from acquiring logs at a ``fair price."

The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco upheld the instruction, rejecting Weyerhaeuser's contention that it was too vague to provide meaningful guidance.

Predatory-Pricing Standard

The Supreme Court said the 9th Circuit should have applied a legal standard similar to the one the Supreme Court used in a 1993 predatory-pricing case. That case required proof that an antitrust defendant sold its product below cost and was likely to recoup those losses after competition had been driven out.

Ross-Simmons said the 1993 ruling wasn't applicable because the Weyerhaeuser case involved overpayments for raw materials, not predatory price cuts. The company said courts set an especially high bar for predatory pricing cases because lower prices directly benefit consumers.

Ross-Simmons acknowledged at an argument session in November that it hadn't met the standard from the 1993 case.

Ross-Simmons, which went out of business in 2001, was based in Longview, Washington. The company accused Weyerhaeuser of paying higher-than-market prices for alder wood, buying more than it needed, entering into exclusive agreements with suppliers and illegally buying logs from state forests.

Weyerhaeuser Cases

A Portland, Oregon, jury in 2003 said Ross-Simmons was entitled to compensation of more than $26 million, an amount that was tripled under federal antitrust rules.

The award would have been the largest so far in a set of suits against Weyerhaeuser over its finished alder business. The company, which is based outside Seattle, has paid $62 million to resolve some of those claims and put $95 million in reserve, according to regulatory filings.

In addition, Weyerhaeuser is fighting a $16 million award to rival Washington Alder LLC and a class-action lawsuit filed on behalf of purchasers of finished alder. Both cases are on hold during the Supreme Court appeal.

Weyerhaeuser shares fell 20 cents to $82.83 at 4:04 p.m. trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

The case is Weyerhaeuser v. Ross-Simmons, 05-381.

Weyerhaeuser Wins Supreme Court Appeal On 'Predatory Buying' (MRKTWTCH)

By Mark H. Anderson

Market Watch, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (MarketWatch) -- Weyerhaeuser Co. (WY) Tuesday won a U.S. Supreme Court appeal in a predatory buying lawsuit brought against it by a smaller lumber company. The unanimous ruling reconciled antitrust standards for predatory buying and selling.

The outcome, which was expected by legal analysts, overturns a jury award against Weyerhaeuser of $26.26 million in damages, which was tripled to $78.77 million under the relevant laws. That award was thrown out and the case was remanded to lower courts.

In an opinion by Justice Clarence Thomas, the high court said lawsuits alleging predatory buying must meet the same strict standards as predatory selling allegations to survive in federal court.

The decision rejected a ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, San Francisco, that had allowed the lawsuit against Weyerhaeuser to proceed under a broader standard.

"Predatory pricing and predatory bidding claims are analytically similar," Justice Thomas wrote, saying the legal theory advanced in lower courts "cannot support the jury's verdict."

The case before the court involves allegations by Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co., a defunct Longview, Wash., sawmill, that Weyerhaeuser, one of the nation's largest wood-products companies, engaged in predatory buying in the Pacific Northwest alder sawlog market.

Ross-Simmons sued Weyerhaeuser after it went out of business in 2001, accusing the lumber giant of illegally dominating the purchase of alder logs.

Weyerhaeuser, in its Supreme Court appeal, argued the courts applied an overly broad antitrust standard to the dispute. Instead, the company said, federal courts should apply to predatory buying the existing Supreme Court precedent on predatory selling. That legal reasoning was adopted by the Supreme Court.

The high court, in a 1993 case, ruled that antitrust-selling allegations must prove that selling took place at a loss and that the seller had a "dangerous probability" of recouping its losses with the impact of the anticompetitive selling.

The case is Weyerhaeuser Co. v. Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber, 05-381.

Warner Is Closer To EMI Deal (WSJ)

By Aaron O. Patrick In London And Ethan Smith In Los Angeles

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Pact With Independents Removes Large Hurdle; Formal Bid Is Awaited

Warner Music Group Corp. Chief Executive Edgar Bronfman Jr. has taken a step closer to realizing his long-held ambition to buy EMI Group PLC, persuading a small but well-organized group of independent record labels to end their opposition to such a purchase.

Warner, the fourth-largest music company by revenue, yesterday said it approached EMI about buying the company a month ago, in what would be the fourth attempt in seven years to combine the music companies. EMI, the third-largest music company, confirmed the approach and said it was waiting for a formal offer.

The two companies have felt pressed to combine to cut costs in the face of flagging sales and to achieve sufficient scale to compete with their two much-larger rivals, Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG, a joint venture of Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG. (See related Breakingviews column, page C14.)

Value Is Unclear

It isn't clear how a Warner bid would be valued. EMI, whose stock has fallen recently after back-to-back profit warnings, has a market capitalization of £1.92 billion ($3.75 billion). Warner's market capitalization is $2.86 billion.

Crucially, Warner has reached an agreement with Impala, a trade group for independent European record labels, to end its opposition to a merger. Legal action by Impala derailed merger negotiations between Warner and EMI last year and threatened to disrupt a potential deal again. While it would be up to the European Commission to rule whether an EMI-Warner merger is anticompetitive, Impala's support makes approval more likely. U.S. antitrust authorities aren't expected to object because EMI doesn't have a strong position in the U.S.

Other hurdles to a deal also appear to be clearing. An antitrust decision on a related case -- the reconsideration of the 2004 merger of Sony's and Bertelsmann's music operations -- is due by summer. If approved, that will also remove one of the last impediments to an EMI takeover.

The departures last month of the head of EMI's recorded-music division, Alain Levy, and his deputy, David Munns, also might help by reducing potential rivalry among executives for the top jobs at a combined company.

Mr. Bronfman now is expected to begin takeover negotiations with EMI's new chairman, John Gildersleeve. Warner, based in New York, said in a news release there was "compelling strategic, commercial and financial logic in a combination of the two companies."

EMI, based in London, in a statement, said it would take into account the price offered and the "regulatory and operational risk profile" of any bid. EMI shares rose 8.4% to 240 pence ($4.68) in London; Warner shares rose 4.9% to $19.15 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

One shareholder, Hugh Hendry, who owns four million EMI shares through his fund, Eclectica Asset Management, said he was receptive to Warner's approach. "I have lost confidence in the role of EMI management," he said. An EMI spokeswoman didn't return a call.

Talks Gather Speed

Mr. Bronfman has been negotiating with Brussels-based trade group Impala for almost a year, trying to come up with an agreement that would allow Warner to buy EMI, a person familiar with the situation said. The talks gathered pace in the past two months, the person said. To get Impala on board, Mr. Bronfman agreed to make several concessions, including selling parts of a combined EMI-Warner -- at least some of them to Impala's members -- and providing funding to a new licensing agency for independent labels. It isn't clear which businesses he might sell. If Warner doesn't buy EMI, Impala members don't get anything.

Warner's approach to EMI was earlier reported in Britain's Mail newspaper on Sunday. A merger of the companies would create a group as large as the industry's dominant players, Universal Music and Sony BMG.

"At the moment, there are two very powerful majors and two weak majors," said Martin Mills, chairman of Impala. "We think this [agreement with Warner] will create an industry with three powerful majors and a powerful independent sector."

Write to Aaron O. Patrick at aaron.patrick@wsj.com6 and Ethan Smith at ethan.smith@wsj.com7

Warner Truce Clears Way For EMI Bid (FT)

By Andrew Edgecliffe-johnson,media Editor

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Warner Music has struck a truce with independent record labels that could clear the way for the US-listed group to make a $6bn (£3bn) bid for EMI and reset the balance of power in the music industry's negotiations with Apple and other digital distributors.

Warner has secured the support of the music companies' fiercest critic to revive merger talks with EMI, the British company behind Norah Jones and The Beatles.

DOJ_NMG_0134870

No formal bid has been made and the terms of any offer are unclear but Warner said Impala, which represents independent music publishers and labels, had agreed to provide full and complete support for a Warner-EMI merger in front of regulators.

Patrick Zelnick, vice-chairman of Impala, said his group had decided it was better to have "three strong majors [Universal, Sony BMG and Warner-EMI] and a strong independent sector" than to let the industry lose more power to the likes of Apple. "I find it sad that the content industry is so weak in front of the big technology companies," he said.

Warner has agreed to fund a digital rights licensing platform for independent music labels; to divest certain recorded music assets "to reinforce the market power of the independent sector"; and to make other, unspecified commitments.

A two-year campaign by Impala led to last year's decision by the European Union's Court of First Instance to refer the 2004 clearance of the merger of Sony and Bertelsmann's recorded music businesses back to the European Commission. With the Commission expected to an-nounce a second stage to its Sony BMG review within two weeks, Impala said it would not drop its opposition to the Sony BMG deal, or to Universal Music's purchase of BMG Music Publishing.

Brussels' willingness to re-authorise the Sony BMG merger, which cut the number of big recorded-music groups from five to four, is still unclear, as is any likelihood that it would permit the industry to shrink from four to three majors.

The deal between Impala and Warner surprised antitrust officials and lawyers in Brussels. Several lawyers said it was rare - if not unique - for a company to agree to concessions with rivals before winning either the support of the prospective merger partner or notifying a deal to Brussels.

A spokesman for Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner, said: "The Commission examines all notified mergers and takeovers diligently with a view to assessing whether there would be a negative impact on effective competition - irrespective of whether there are any active complainants."

Warner's approach to EMI was made on January 24, before the UK group's second profits warning of the year. But it was disclosed only after press speculation. EMI rejected Warner's last approach, which valued the group at 320p a share.

A Fair Price Would Put Nicoli On The Spot (FT)

By Andrew Hill

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

It is not too late for love between EMI and Warner Music and, however preliminary and imprecise their latest approach, the Americans have sweetened it with a silky skill worthy of Norah Jones herself.

Warner has sought to soothe worries about regulatory approval - still the biggest uncertainty overhanging any deal between the two music groups - by ensuring the support of independent record companies and music publishers that were the deal's biggest opponents. Combined with worsening conditions in the recorded music industry, that should make the European Commission more sympathetic towards a deal this time round.

The timing looks good, too: Warner contacted the British company on January 24, before the second of EMI's two profit warnings, but, by uncanny coincidence, the approach has only now come to light with the shares battered down to levels last seen in the final quarter of 2005.

The recent history of disappointments at EMI makes it difficult to see Warner returning with a bid near 320p - the price on last year's abortive offer, abandoned following a European court decision that threw the Sony BMG deal back into Brussels' merger review process. EMI has also cut costs further since last summer presenting Warner with fewer possible savings. But if the US group is sensible, a bid that splits the difference with yesterday's closing share price and last year's offer would put Eric Nicoli, EMI's embattled chief executive, in an awkward position.

If he were to grab such an offer and the European antitrust authorities later decided to block a merger, then he would have used up his final shred of credibility with investors. On the other hand, if he spurned Warner's advances on the grounds that the regulatory risk remained too high, he might scotch shareholders' best hope of realising decent value from their investment.

Biomet Buyout Gets Antitrust Approval (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

Biomet's $10.9B Buyout by Private Investment Groups Receives Antitrust Approval

WARSAW, Ind. (AP) -- Orthopedics maker Biomet Inc. on Tuesday said it received antitrust approval from federal regulators for its proposed $10.9 billion acquisition by a group of private investment firms.

Biomet said the Federal Trade Commission granted early termination of the waiting period under the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act.

Blackstone Group, Goldman, Sachs & Co., Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific Group agreed to buy Biomet in December for $44 per share.

DOJ_NMG_0134871

The deal, which is expected to close by the end of October, still needs the approval of Biomet's shareholders.

Shares of Biomet added 13 cents to $42.49 in afternoon trading on the Nasdaq Stock Market. The company's stock will be delisted when the acquisition closes.

Lift Manufacturers Face Brussels Rap (FT)

By Tobias Buck

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

ThyssenKrupp, Schindler, Kone and Otis - the world's biggest lift manufacturers - will today be punished and fined by the European Commission for operating a price-fixing cartel.

The European Union antitrust watchdog issued formal charges against the four groups in October2005, and according to several people familiar with the case will hand down its final ruling at a meeting in Brussels tomorrow.

Together, the groups control about two-thirds of the world market for elevators and escalators, with Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, the market leader.

They are accused of operating a cartel in Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg between 1998 and 2004. Tobias Buck, Brussels

EU Clears Freeport-McMoRan To Buy Phelps (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

EU Antitrust Regulators Clear Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold to Acquire Phelps Dodge

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- EU antitrust regulators on Tuesday cleared Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold Inc. to buy Phelps Dodge Corp., a deal that would create the world's largest publicly traded copper company -- and the largest metals and mining company based in North America.

The European Commission said that combining the two U.S.-based companies would not significantly impede competition in Europe, identifying only limited overlaps between the two that would not cause antitrust problems for rivals, suppliers or customers.

The companies announced in November that Freeport-McMoRan would acquire Phelps Dodge for US$25.9 billion (euro20.17 billion) in cash and stock.

The cash portion of the transaction totals US$18 billion (euro14.02 billion), and Freeport-McMoRan said it would issue 137 million shares to Phelps Dodge shareholders. That would give them about 38 percent of the combined company on a fully diluted basis. Freeport-McMoRan's board will also be expanded to include three independent Phelps Dodge directors.

The merged companies will operate under the Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold banner, though businesses operating as Phelps Dodge will continue to do so.

The world's largest copper company in terms of production is Codelco, or Nacional del Cobre de Chile, owned by the country of Chile.

Freeport-McMoRan Copper & Gold: http://www.fcx.com/

Phelps Dodge Corporation: http://www.phelpsdodge.com/

Korea Fines 9 Petrochemical Firms For Price Fixing (WSJ)

By In-soo Nam

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea's Fair Trade Commission fined nine domestic petrochemical companies a combined 105.1 billion won ($112.2 million) for colluding to fix the prices of petrochemical products for more than 10 years.

A total of 10 companies, including the country's largest refiner, colluded to coordinate the prices of polypropylene and high-density polyethylene between April 1994 and April 2005, the antitrust agency said in a statement.

"The collusion has resulted in 1.56 trillion won in damages to consumers," the commission said.

The commission said Honam Petrochemical Corp., one of the companies involved in the price collusion, wasn't penalized because of its contribution to the commission investigation.

The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against SK Corp., LG Chem Ltd., Korea Petrochemical Industrial Co., Daelim Industrial Co. and Hyosung Corp.

"We hoped the commission [would] take into account the widespread industry practices at the time," said an LG Chem spokesman. "The penalty is a bit burdensome for petrochemical companies."

The commission said it might adjust the total penalty amount of 105.1 billion won for individual companies.

"We're still waiting for the Fair Trade Commission's final decision," an SK Corp. spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0134872

SK Corp., the largest refiner in the country by capacity, was fined 23.8 billion won, while Korea Petrochemical was fined 21.2 billion won and LG Chem 13.1 billion won.

The 10 petrochemical companies account for more than 85% of the country's synthetic resins market, the commission said.

ENVIRONMENT:

Nuclear Plant Safety Is Called Into Question (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian

Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

AMARILLO, Texas -- Electrical failures have shut down the plant. The roof has leaked. Decrepit machinery dates back more than 40 years. Safety lapses led inspectors to levy fines twice within two years. And employees, under deadline pressure, complain they often are worked past the point of exhaustion.

If this factory were producing medical devices or refining gasoline, the conditions would be serious enough. But this is where they work on nuclear bombs.

Pantex is the Energy Department's main nuclear weapons factory, a linchpin of the nation's defense for a half century. The nation no longer makes nuclear weapons, so the plant's chief roles are servicing them or dismantling them to meet the terms of disarmament pacts.

On a 25-square-mile swath of the Texas Panhandle, a series of massive white concrete domes mark the places where live nuclear weapons are opened up.

The rituals and procedures inside those cells are supposed to be as strict as any operating room, part of a safety culture that reduces any chance of an accidental nuclear explosion to one in 100 million.

But lately, outside experts are questioning whether those safety margins are eroding. Federal investigators are trying to assess the overall safety of the plant, which employs 3,300, amid troubling safety snafus and what employees call an atmosphere of intimidation.

Energy Department officials acknowledge that the plant has fallen behind schedule on reliability testing of weapons. Long delays have occurred in decommissioning thousands of surplus warheads to satisfy disarmament pacts. They also concede the plant has maintenance problems and has violated safety procedures. But they insist there is no danger of a conventional or nuclear explosion.

"Pantex is safe, no doubt," said Marty Schoenbauer, the acting chief of the Energy Department's nuclear weapons program.

Safety has improved in recent years, he said, thanks to better procedures. But outside experts, union officials and watchdog groups say the opposite is true -- that safety has regressed since 2000 as the most knowledgeable senior safety experts of the Cold War era retire and the plant's condition deteriorates. Energy Department Inspector General Gregory Friedman is investigating safety conditions at Pantex.

"You can't run a plant on glittering platitudes and generalities and call that a safety program," said Bob Alvarez, a former deputy assistant secretary of Energy and now a senior scholar at the Institute for Policy Studies, a Washington think tank. "A nuclear detonation accident is a low probability, but it is not incredible."

The backdrop to problems at Pantex is a growing concern that the Energy Department has mismanaged the nuclear weapons program. Last year, the Defense Department bluntly said that it had lost confidence in the Energy Department, Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman has acknowledged.

"We have constraints," Bodman said in an interview, conceding the department hasn't met all of its commitments to the Pentagon. Last month, he fired the head of the nuclear weapons administration.

Conditions at Pantex began deteriorating at the end of the Cold War in 1989, when federal managers started starving the plant of funds. Billions of dollars instead were funneled into nuclear weapons laboratories, giving scientists new supercomputer centers, powerful lasers and physics instruments.

By about 2000, the leaks in Pantex's roof were so bad that workers had to cover bombs with plastic when it rained. In summer 2004, a power overload tripped transformers, causing a plant wide blackout. In July, another electrical failure occurred when rats gnawed through wiring, according to weekly safety reports. And in August, a storm swept over the plant that left standing puddles in nuclear production areas.

While such conditions don't necessarily lead to accidents, the Energy Department has levied fines totaling nearly $234,000 against the contractor that operates Pantex, BWX Technologies Inc., for safety violations.

DOJ_NMG_0134873

In one case, involving the disassembly of a missile warhead, technicians improperly used red vinyl tape to secure a crack in the high explosives surrounding the plutonium sphere of the hydrogen bomb. The use of the tape itself was not faulted, but technicians misread engineering instructions and caused an even bigger crack.

Federal safety inspectors found that the flawed operation "increased the opportunities for dropping all or part of the explosive during handling and hence increased the potential for a violent reaction," a finding that ran against assurances such a detonation was impossible.

In the second case, technicians were extracting an assembly of high explosives and plutonium from the casing of a different missile warhead for servicing. Using a jackscrew to apply several thousand pounds of force to the explosives, technicians exceeded the allowable loads and over a three-day period violated strict safety protocols.

Dan Swaim, BWXT president at Pantex, acknowledged that both incidents broke safety rules and were unacceptable, but he said there was no risk of a disaster.

"No nuclear yield was possible," Swaim said, asserting the company maintains huge safety margins that preclude any potential for a conventional or nuclear explosion. "As a guy who works here every day, I want it to be darn safe."

The problems at Pantex came to light in the fall after Danielle Brian, executive director of the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington watchdog group, wrote two letters to Bodman complaining about safety. The group has cited a lengthy report in 2000 by former Energy Department safety expert Frank Rowesome, who said that a detonation caused by lightning strikes, solvent fires or other incidents at Pantex was more probable than the Energy Department was admitting.

In an interview, Rowesome, who retired in 2004, said he did not want to alarm the public, but he believes Energy Department officials are so "overly confident" and "complacent" about safety that they are not alert to deteriorating safety conditions.

Where some people see problems, others see progress. Last month, Pantex finally began overhauling the B83, a nuclear bomb designed to drop from a plane, following an 18-month delay triggered when scientists discovered potentially dangerous static electricity in work cells. Schoenbauer said the delay shows how far the Energy Department will go to protect safety. Critics say it shows that hidden safety problems can still exist.

Meanwhile, Pantex has fallen behind schedule in performing critical surveillance tests required by laboratory scientists to certify the reliability of the bombs, Schoenbauer acknowledged. "That backlog has not affected the lab's ability to certify weapons," he said.

But Ralph Levine, who once ran the Energy Department's nuclear weapons surveillance testing, wrote a letter in 2005 asserting the backlog would allow defects in nuclear weapons to go undetected for years. As a result, he said, energy officials removed him as manager of the program and he retired last year.

John Duncan, who until four years ago headed surveillance testing at Pantex for Sandia National Laboratory, agreed that testing problems at Pantex are undermining confidence in the stockpile. Even today, the certifications of nuclear weapons are being made with less certainty than scientists should have, Duncan and Levine said.

"I knew we were in trouble when I started attending meetings in Washington and was told to work better, faster, cheaper," said Duncan. "They started sending people to the plant with little weapons experience."

The Energy Department confirmed last Friday it planned to reduce the number of annual surveillance tests, saying the plan was better suited to an aging bomb stockpile. But Duncan said this would further erode the reliability of the weapons.

A current senior federal manager at Energy Department headquarters, speaking not for attribution because the interview was not authorized, endorses those concerns.

"The delays in testing and lack of resources are so significant," he acknowledged. "The real question is when the laboratories can no longer certify the reliability of the stockpile."

The work load at Pantex probably will grow even more onerous in coming years.

Under the Moscow Treaty, the U.S. needs to get rid of roughly 4,000 surplus nuclear warheads. At current rates, that will take Pantex until 2050, said Harvard University nuclear weapons expert Matthew Bunn. Although there is no firm deadline, that pace is unacceptable to arms control experts, Bunn said.

The Bush administration has ordered the plant to increase dismantlements by 50 percent this year.

Another task looming for Pantex is modernizing the W76 missile warhead used on the Trident submarine. Hundreds of W76 warheads will have to be disassembled and rebuilt with new parts. Swaim said the W76 program will begin on schedule later this year.

Pantex -- named for the panhandle of Texas -- has a largely blue collar culture. The people who actually touch the weapons are known as "production technicians." They earn about $24 per hour. Engineers average $84,000 per year.

DOJ_NMG_0134874

Although the jobs are sought after in Amarillo, an anonymous letter surfaced in November alleging that the plant was in serious disrepair, BWXT management was letting safety slip, and employees were forced to work more than 80 hours a week in some cases.

The stress of working with nuclear weapons has been exacerbated by an abusive management, according to Henry Bagwell, the former chief of the Metals Trade Council, the principal union at the plant. "They treat people badly," said Bagwell, who left last year after 24 years at the plant.

Bagwell said that when he attempted to raise a health and safety problem involving toxic beryllium dust in 2003, he was demoted from X-ray technician to janitor.

"It sent a message," Bagwell said. "It was a public humiliation. Safety seriously took a back seat."

Swaim takes sharp exception to allegations that the roof leaks, labor relations are strained or that severe amounts of overtime are being forced on workers. After the letter surfaced, Swaim said an audit showed overtime averaged just 15 percent over the normal 40-hour work week, although some individuals racked up more.

"I told my guys no more than 72 hours a week," he said.

Md. House Approves Cut In Car Pollution (WP)

By Lisa Rein

Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Higher Gas Mileage Would Be Required

The House of Delegates overwhelmingly approved legislation yesterday that could make Maryland the 12th state to force carmakers to slash emissions thought to cause global warming.

Senate leaders predicted approval of a similar bill this week, and Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) has pledged to sign the legislation.

The stricter standards for cars and trucks hitting dealerships in 2010 would put Maryland in the forefront of states seeking to slow climate change, environmentalists said. But automakers said the requirements would raise prices and reduce choices for consumers -- to make way for more fuel-efficient cars, fewer sport-utility and other large vehicles would be on the market.

Since the best way to reduce gases is to use less fuel, the legislation would require vehicles to be more fuel efficient. The law is designed to raise the state's average fuel efficiency for new vehicles sold in Maryland to 43 miles per gallon. The current average for light trucks and SUVs is 22.2 mpg and for cars, 27.5 mpg.

Five years ago, California became the first state to regulate emissions of carbon dioxide from car tailpipes. The higher standards are to take effect in 2009, but the auto industry has sued that state to block them.

Maryland lawmakers -- mindful of cancer rates, asthma and rising water levels hastened by climate change in the Chesapeake Bay -- are pushing a slew of clean-energy initiatives during this session.

"It's a big day," House Speaker Michael E. Busch (D-Anne Arundel) said, estimating that the Clean Cars Act would take the equivalent of 190,000 vehicles a year off the road. "People for years wrote off climate change. Now they're seeing things like Hurricane Katrina, tsunamis, and they know the causes of melting ice caps have credibility."

The 122 to 16 House vote included Republican support and reflected the power of the state's environmental movement after passage of legislation last year to curb pollution from coal-fired power plants. O'Malley highlighted clean cars in his State of the State speech last month and embraced the measure in his first-session legislative package.

"He thinks we have a responsibility to lead the fight against global warming," spokesman Rick Abbruzzese said.

New cars in Maryland with 7,500 or fewer miles would have to be built to emit about a third less carbon dioxide from the mix of cars sold in Maryland than today's models. Emissions of other pollutants, including carcinogens and nitrogen compounds that foul the bay, would also be cut.

A percentage of the cars on dealers' lots would have to be manufactured like hybrids, with advanced technology, including some with zero emissions. Motorists would not need to retrofit their cars, but they could not bypass the rules by buying cars in another state: They would be blocked from registering those in Maryland based on their vehicle identification numbers.

The carbon dioxide rule, aimed at reducing emissions of gases produced by burning coal, oil and gas, met the stiffest resistance from automakers.

Carmakers estimate $3,000 would be added to consumers' costs. And they argue that by adopting California's emissions standards, Maryland, New York, New Jersey and other states are ceding their power if California should decide to tweak its regulations.

"This legislation will result in higher costs, reduce choices and give California the authority to make decisions about the vehicles Marylanders drive," said Charles Territo, spokesman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, which lobbied heavily against the bill.

DOJ_NMG_0134875

"Some of us are a little uncomfortable with that," said House Minority Leader Anthony J. O'Donnell (R-Calvert), who voted against the measure.

Territo disputed any health or environmental benefits from reducing carbon dioxide emissions.

The carbon dioxide rules have not taken effect in other states, so there is no test case yet for Maryland consumers.

But environmental groups said the carbon dioxide rules can be met through current technology. Advocates said that average car prices would rise about $1,064 but that in the long term, cleaner cars would save money.

The auto industry blocked the clean cars bill for three years. "General Motors came in and said, 'We have a plant here in Maryland. You'll have to close that plant,' " recalled Del. Maggie McIntosh (D-Baltimore), chairwoman of the House Environmental Matters Committee. Said Del. Elizabeth Bobo (D-Howard), sponsor of the House bill: "We didn't pass the bill, and they still left," closing the GM plant in Baltimore. GM's waning influence in the state and a "lot of education about air and air quality" pushed the measure forward this year, McIntosh said.

The General Assembly is considering other anti-pollution and energy efficiency measures, including bills to reward greater reliance on solar and wind-powered energy. Another bill would revive a tax break for hybrid cars.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John McCaslin

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Any allies left?

A White House pool report described yesterday's arrival of Vice President Dick Cheney in Tokyo, where he was "greeted by some extremely loud sound trucks" and "one unmistakable chant blaring from one of the trucks in a Japanese-accented male voice, chanting in English: 'Yankee go home, Yankee go home.' "

Stretched thin

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee that FBI referrals for counterterrorism cases increased a whopping 671 percent between 2001 and 2003 -- and to this day require "difficult choices in determining how to most effectively use the available agents" -- did not go unheeded.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware has introduced legislation to add 1,000 FBI agents to the bureau's roster, all to focus exclusively on traditional criminal cases. Estimated cost: $160 million per year.

Gone private

Ambassador Cofer Black, the former ambassador-at-large and coordinator for counterterrorism at the State Department, and Rob Richer, who was the CIA's No. 2 for counterintelligence, will create a new "CIA-type" organization to address intelligence needs in the private sector.

"Terror attacks," "political instability," "avian-flu outbreaks," and even severe weather events will be on the radar of the company, which the pair names Total Intelligence Solutions.

Don't slurp

One-hundred guests at Teatro Goldoni's "Carnevale" last night were certainly watching their manners.

Judith Martin, aka "Miss Manners," was honorary queen at the lavish Save Venice Benefit, seated alongside honorary king Eric Denker, curator and senior lecturer at the National Gallery of Art.

The popular etiquette columnist and author of 12 books, who spent part of her youth in Europe, has a new release due out next month, "No Vulgar Hotel: The Desire And Pursuit of Venice." Considered the definitive manual for the hopeless Venetophile, she emphasizes:

"Love of Venice can strike anyone, not just romantic [weaklings]. Among the toughies with serious cases were Lord Byron, Richard Wagner, Ezra Pound and Ernest Hemingway. There is no cure for this affliction."

After an evening of Venetian cuisine and wine presented by Teatro's chef-owner Fabrizio Aielli and Marco Bolla, owner of Ristorante Lineadombra in Venice, guests were indeed "stricken" with Venetian charm.

Stone by stone

It's some two years behind schedule and about double the anticipated cost, but the much-anticipated underground U.S. Capitol Visitor Center just about has its final stone in place.

At nearly 580,000 square feet, or three-quarters the size of the U.S. Capitol itself, this $600 million polished cellar features a Great Hall, Exhibition Hall, congressional auditorium and Senate and House theaters, accented with marble, granite, solid wood, bronze and glass -- both floor panels and skylights.

Stone masons have placed the Tennessee Valley marble in basket-weave patterns, while on the Rotunda level the last stones are now being set at a pace of 70 per day.

Major construction should wrap up in the next few weeks, with a likely grand opening in early 2008.

Beats checkers

Jim Martin, president of the 60 Plus Association, the nonpartisan seniors advocacy group in Washington, is sitting at home convalescing from neck surgery 10 days ago.

"Who says basketball is not a contact sport?" Mr. Martin said when reached yesterday. "I'm wearing a neck brace for four more weeks, but this is the price I pay to be able to play in the Senior Olympics in mid-June in Louisville, Kentucky."

Mr. Martin's squad of seniors are the Virginia state basketball champions, and play three-on-three.

Professor Norton

That was Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, D.C. Democrat, bragging about the 100th anniversary of Hoyas basketball at Georgetown University, which is in the midst of another exciting season under head coach John Thompson III.

Mrs. Norton, many don't know, is a tenured faculty member of Georgetown University Law Center.

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

Border Agents Help Make Pot Seizure (CGVD)

Casa Grande Valley Dispatch, February 21, 2007

Border Patrol agents from the Casa Grande station helped in confiscating $3.7 million worth of marijuana over the weekend.

Agents were asked to help a Bureau of Land Management ranger who was pursing two trucks camouflaged with tarps near Stanfield about 6:45 a.m. Sunday.

While agents responded, the ranger reported his vehicle was intentionally struck by one of the trucks.

Agents found both trucks abandoned on Stanfield Road. They found 4,660 pounds of marijuana in the two trucks, as well as a loaded .45 caliber pistol.

One of the trucks was reported stolen in San Diego, Calif., and was turned over to the Arizona Department of Public Safety.

The other truck is being processed for forfeiture by the Border Patrol. The marijuana was turned over to the DEA and the gun was given to ATF. No arrests have been made and no injuries were reported.

Colombian Rebel Convicted On Drug Charge (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- A Colombian woman was found guilty Tuesday of participating in an operation to smuggle tons of cocaine to the United States.

Authorities say her case showed the main rebel group in Colombia is deeply involved in illegal drugs.

Nayibe Rojas, known in the Colombian rebel movement as "Sonia," was convicted by a jury of conspiracy to import and-or distribute 11 pounds or more of cocaine. The charge carries a mandatory sentence of at least 10 years.

Two male co-defendants were convicted of the same charge, but they have not been implicated by authorities, as Rojas was, in connection with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC.

Prosecutors accused Rojas of helping export more than 220 tons of cocaine to the United States and Europe since 1994, earning millions of dollars for the FARC.

"Today's convictions represent a significant victory against the FARC, one of the most dangerous narcoterrorist organizations operating in Colombia," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said in a statement.

District Judge James Robertson set a May 7 date for sentencing Rojas in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. Under current sentencing guidelines, she and the men, Jose Antonio Selis and Juan Diego Giraldo, could be sentenced to 30 years in prison, said Elita Amato, the men's attorney.

Rojas was extradited in March 2005, under a treaty between the United States and Colombia.

The guilty verdict for Rojas is a victory for the United States and Colombia, which have recently stepped up a campaign to portray the FARC, which is on the U.S. list of "foreign terrorist organizations" as a drug-trafficking cartel. In March 2005, the United States announced drug indictments against 50 FARC leaders and offered rewards totaling $77.5 million for their capture.

FARC leaders insist that rather than produce and sell cocaine, they levy taxes on farmers of coca, the raw material used in the production of cocaine, and the drug-traffickers.

DOJ_NMG_0134877

Associated Press writer Toby Muse contributed to this report from Bogota, Colombia.

Colombian Rebel Commander Found Guilty Of Drug-trafficking (MCT)

By Pablo Bachelet

McClatchy Newspapers, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - A federal jury on Tuesday convicted a Colombian peasant who rose to become the financial chief of a powerful squadron of leftist guerrillas on charges of conspiring to send more than 5 tons of cocaine to the United States.

Nayibe Rojas is the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia - FARC, in its Spanish initials - whom a U.S. federal court has convicted of drug running, although the U.S. and Colombian governments long have alleged that FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry.

The jury heard hours of taped phone and other conversations and testimony of U.S. and Colombian law enforcement agents as well as alleged former drug traffickers during the five-week trial. It issued the verdict after deliberating for four days.

The defense painted Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a member of an insurgency that was battling injustices in Colombia, and government witnesses as shady and unreliable characters from Colombia's drug underworld.

Prosecutors cast Rojas as a gun-totting senior FARC logistics chief who gathered coca base from farmers in the coca-rich Caquet region in southern Colombia and sold it to refiners and traffickers, who then sent the cocaine to the United States.

The jury also convicted two co-defendants, Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo weren't members of FARC, but the prosecutors argued that all three had conspired to send more than 5 tons of cocaine to the United States.

The three face prison terms of up to 30 years. Sentencing was scheduled for May 7.

The U.S. government suffered an embarrassing setback late last year when another Washington jury failed to reach a verdict on Ricardo Palmera - a senior FARC leader better known as Simon Trinidad - who was accused in the kidnapping of three U.S. defense contractors whom the FARC still holds. His retrial is scheduled for next month.

Rojas' case grew more important after the Palmera hung jury, because Colombian prosecutors often use the threat of extraditions to the United States to entice FARC members to cooperate.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty called the outcome of the trial "a significant victory against the FARC."

"This case sends a message to major overseas drug-trafficking organizations: We will investigate, prosecute and punish all those who manufacture and distribute illegal drugs for export to the United States," he said in a statement. "There is no international safe haven for illegal narcotics traffickers."

Jury Convicts FARC Leader (MH)

By Pablo Bachelet

The Miami Herald, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - A Colombian peasant who rose to become the financial chief of a powerful squadron of the leftist FARC guerrillas was convicted Tuesday by a federal jury on charges of conspiring to send more than five tons of cocaine to the United States.

Nayibe Rojas was the first high-ranking member of the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, convicted of drug running by a U.S. federal court, although the U.S. and Colombian governments have long alleged that the FARC was deeply involved in every facet of Colombia's cocaine industry.

Late last year, the U.S. government suffered an embarrassing setback when another Washington jury failed to reach a verdict on Ricardo Palmera -- a senior FARC leader better known as Simón Trinidad -- accused in the kidnapping of three U.S. defense contractors still held by the FARC. His retrial is scheduled for next month.

Rojas' case grew in importance after the Palmera hung jury because Colombian prosecutors often use the threat of extraditions to the United States to entice FARC members to collaborate with them.

The 12-member jury in Rojas' trial heard hours of taped phone and other conversations and testimonies by U.S. and Colombian law enforcement agents as well as by alleged former drug traffickers during the five-week trial. It issued the guilty verdict after deliberating for four days.

The defense painted Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a member of an insurgency battling injustices in Colombia, and government witnesses as shady and unreliable characters of Colombia's drug underworld.

Prosecutors cast Rojas as a gun-totting senior FARC logistics chief who gathered coca base from local farmers in the coca-rich Caquetá region in southern Colombia and then sold it to refiners and traffickers who then sent the cocaine to the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0134878

The jury also issued guilty verdicts for her two codefendants, José Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo. Celis and Giraldo were not members of the FARC, but prosecutors argued that all three conspired to send more than five tons of cocaine to the United States.

The three could go to jail for as long as 30 years. Sentencing was scheduled for May 7.

Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty called the outcome of the trial ``a significant victory against the FARC."

"This case sends a message to major overseas drug trafficking organizations: We will investigate, prosecute and punish all those who manufacture and distribute illegal drugs for export to the United States," he said in a statement. ``There is no international safe haven for illegal narcotics traffickers."

The Bush administration estimates that 80 percent to 90 percent of cocaine on U.S. streets comes from Colombia, and that the FARC controls 70 percent of that country's drug trade to finance its insurgency.

Ruleville Chief Sentenced On Extortion Charge (AP)

AP, February 20, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - A federal judge sentenced Ruleville police Chief Ronald Robinson to 2 1/2 years in prison Tuesday for trying to extort protection money from drug dealers.

Robinson agreed to plead guilty to extortion in an October plea deal that wiped out another extortion charge and four counts of attempting to aid in the possession of crack cocaine with the intent to distribute. He faced up to 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Robinson was sentenced by Chief U.S. District Court Judge Glen H. Davidson in Oxford, Assistant U.S. Attorney James Maxwell told http://www.clarionledger.com.

Assistant Police Chief Larry Mitchell, who was arrested on the same charges with Robinson, is scheduled for trial April 16 in Davidson's court.

The pair was arrested in August. Authorities said that from December 2003 to June 2006, Robinson and Mitchell, acting in their official capacities, conspired to extort cash payoffs in exchange for providing protection for alleged crack dealers and other people they believed to be distributing crack.

Robinson's Sentencing Scheduled (DDT)

Delta Democrat Times, February 20, 2007

RULEVILLE - Former Ruleville Police Chief Ronald Robinson could be given up to 20 years in prison today when he is sentenced in federal court.

Robinson is being sentenced today in connection to him and former Assistant Chief Larry Mitchell being arrested in August in connection to claims that the two officers extorted alleged criminals to avoid criminal charges.

Robinson, 46, and Mitchell, 33, were arrested on Aug. 4 in different locations near Ruleville by the Federal Bureau of Invesigation on federal drug and extortion charges.

The arrests were made in a joint effort by the FBI, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Mississippi Bureau of Narcotics, the Mississippi attorney general's office and deputies from the sheriff's departments in Bolivar and Sunflower counties.

Their arrests came after a federal grand jury indicted the two in July.

The eight-count federal indictment charges that from December 2003 to June 2006, Robinson and Mitchell, acting in their official capacities, conspired to extort cash payoffs in exchange for providing protection for alleged crack cocaine dealers and other people Robinson and Mitchell believed to be distributing crack cocaine.

On Oct. 26, 2006, Robinson pleaded guilty to the federal charge of extortion in connection with his August arrest.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Jimmy Maxwell, who is handling the prosecution of the case, said Robinson is scheduled to be sentenced at 2 p.m. today in Oxford before United States Disrict Court Chief Glen H. Davidson.

Robinson pled guilty to count three of the federal indictment charging him with extortion.

Robinson admitted that while employed as Chief of Police of the Ruleville Police Department, he obtained a cash payoff of $3,000 to which he was not entitled, in exchange for not pursuing drug and gambling related charges against an individual and for providing protection for an indiviual that he believed to be distributing crack cocaine.

Maxwell said as part of Robinson's plea agreement, the remaning counts of the indictment revelant to Robinson “will be dismissed at the sentencing.”

Robinson and Mitchell now also face state charges in connection with their alleged actions as Ruleville's top lawmen.

State indictments against Robinson and Mitchell claim that the two officers extorted alleged criminals to avoid criminal charges.

Maxwell said that although Robinson “only pled to one count of the indictment, it will not affect his sentence.”

DOJ_NMG_0134879

Maxwell said based on Robinson's guilty plea, he now faces up to 20 years imprisonment, a $250,000 fine and up to three years supervised release.

As a result of Robinson's arrest and guilty plea, he has been released as the town's chief of police.

Mitchell remains on suspensioon from his position with the Police Department without pay pending the result of the investigation.

Mitchell has also maintained his innocence on the federal charges.

Maxwell said as a convicted felon, Robinson will no longer be able to possess a firearm.

Ruleville Police Chief Gets Prison Time (JCL)

Jackson Clarion Ledger, February 20, 2007

Ruleville Police chief Ronald Robinson has been sentenced to two-and-a-half years in federal prison after pleading guilty to extorting protection money from drug dealers.

Robinson was sentenced today by Chief U.S. District Court Judge Glen H. Davidson in Oxford, said Assistant United States Attorney James Maxwell.

Robinson's co-defendant, Assistant Police Chief Larry Mitchell, is scheduled for trial April 16 on the same charges in Davidson's court.

Oxycodone Ringleader Gets 20 Years (HL)

Herald-Leader, February 21, 2007

A Berea man who was the kingpin of a drug ring was sentenced yesterday to 20 years in federal prison in one of the largest prescription drug investigations in Eastern Kentucky.

Danny Clark, 51, was indicted in U.S. District Court in April along with other members of the ring including his brother Richard Clark, Marlene and Rufus Holmes, Samuel Duane Lawson and James Ellis Renner. Clark and others were arrested after a long-term investigation by Rockcastle and Laurel County Sheriff's deputies, London and Richmond police officers, Drug Enforcement Administration agents and the Kentucky State Police.

Clark pleaded guilty in October. He will pay a $1 million judgment as part of the plea.

Clark, according to the indictment and other court documents, was the leader of a drug ring that sold oxycodone and methadone from January 1998 through April 2006 mostly in Madison and Rockcastle counties.

As part of his guilty plea, Clark admitted to distributing more than 53,000 OxyContin pills, including 51,793 80-milligram OxyContin pills, which sell for $100 per pill. The street value for those drugs was more than $5 million. The DEA, Rockcastle County Sheriff, Richmond Police Department and state police used cooperating witnesses to purchase drugs from Clark and his associates, who admitted that they got the drugs from Clark, court documents show.

Richard Clark, Danny Clark's brother, died last year, and charges against him were dismissed. Lawson and Renner pleaded guilty to drug-related charges. Lawson was sentenced to 15 months, Renner was sentenced to eight years and three months. In January, Marlene Holmes was sentenced to five years in prison. Her husband, Rufus Holmes, was sentenced to seven years and three months.

During sentencing, according to the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District, U.S. District Judge Danny Reeves said the Clark case was the largest prescription drug case he has seen in the federal court in London. Eastern Kentucky counties led the nation in per capita sales of prescription painkillers, a 2003 Herald-Leader investigation found.

IMMIGRATION:

Tougher Tactics Deter Migrants At U.S. Border (NYT)

By James C. McKinley Jr.

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

SAN LUIS RÍO COLORADO, Mexico — For 10 years, Eduardo Valenzuela has been crossing the border illegally near Yuma, Ariz., trekking over desert scrub and hopping a freight train to get back to his job with a construction company in Phoenix. The clandestine trip has become an annual ritual for him, as he goes home each winter to see his children.

But on a recent afternoon he and four travel companions from his hometown, Los Mochis, plopped down on a bench in a park in the border town of San Luis Río Colorado, exhausted and dispirited. They were beat. Border Patrol agents had caught them twice over three days, hounding them with helicopters and four-wheel-drive trucks.

DOJ_NMG_0134880

"It's become much more difficult," Mr. Valenzuela said, echoing the comments of dozens of other migrants. "Before, you just arrived here and then you walked a little and got the train. You used to see a border patrol agent every 10 kilometers. Now you see four of them where there was one. Think of it."

All along the border, there are signs that the measures the Border Patrol and other federal agencies have taken over the last year, from erecting new barriers to posting 6,000 National Guardsmen as armed sentinels, are beginning to slow the flow of illegal immigrants.

The only available barometer of the decline is how many migrants are caught. In the last four months, the number has dropped 27 percent compared with the same period last year, the biggest drop since a crackdown immediately after 9/11. In two sections around Yuma and near Del Rio, Tex., the numbers have fallen by nearly two-thirds, Homeland Security officials say.

"We are comfortable that this actually reflects a change in momentum," Michael Chertoff, the secretary of Homeland Security, said in an interview last week during his first official visit to Mexico City. "I'm always quick to say it doesn't mean we can declare victory. To some degree, I expect the criminal organizations or smugglers are pulling back a little, watching to see if we lose interest."

Some immigration experts said it was too early to tell if the enforcement efforts had caused a permanent downturn. In the past, tougher enforcement has only caused smugglers to seek new routes.

"It's the squeeze the balloon phenomenon," said Roberto Suro, the director of the Pew Hispanic Center in Washington. "Sometimes you can't tell where the bubble will come when you squeeze until later."

Nor can they rule out other factors, like a relatively cold winter on the border and Mexico's solid economic growth last year.

Border Patrol commanders say they see no explanation for the drop-off across the entire 2,000-mile border other than stiffer enforcement deterring migrants. The slackening flow, they argue, belies the conventional wisdom that it is impossible to stem illegal migration. Many veteran officers in the force are now beginning to believe it can be controlled with enough resources.

The new measures range from simply putting more officers out on patrol to erecting stadium lights, secondary fences and barriers of thick steel poles to stop smugglers from racing across the desert in all-wheel-drive trucks. The Border Patrol has deployed hundreds of new guards to watch rivers, monitor surveillance cameras and guard fences.

In the Yuma headquarters of the Border Patrol, for instance, Chief Ronald Colburn said that with the help of the National Guard the patrol had doubled the agents in his sector to about 900, extended the primary steel wall eight miles past the end of the Mexican town of San Luis Río Colorado, and constructed a vehicle barrier six miles beyond that. "It's the right mix, the right recipe," he said.

The federal government has also begun punishing migrants with prison time from the first time they enter illegally in some areas. For instance, along the 210 miles of border covered by the Del Rio office of the Border Patrol, everyone caught crossing illegally is charged in federal court and, if convicted, sentenced to at least two weeks in prison.

That is an enormous break with past practice, when most Mexican migrants were simply taken back to the border and let go. People from Central American countries were given a court date and released on their own recognizance. Few ever showed up.

In San Luis Río Colorado, the effects of the stepped-up patrols are apparent. A year ago, migrants thronged the town park and cheap motels, where guides, known as "coyotes" or "polleros" offered their services. Now the park is nearly empty. The smugglers are telling their charges to take a bus to a spot called El Sahuaro about 50 miles east of town. From there the migrants make a dangerous two-day walk through rocky canyons and barren desert to reach Interstate 8.

On the other side, Border Patrol agents say they are picking up about 100 people a day, rather than the 500 a day they handled a year ago. A year ago, the processing center in Yuma, where migrants are fingerprinted then shipped to the border, was mobbed. Now it is nearly empty most of the time.

Several migrants waiting their chance in San Luis cursed under their breath in Spanish when asked about the soldiers and beefed-up patrols. Some are indignant that the United States would treat them like enemies or criminals.

"It's harder and harder, and that's the reason why people are dying in the desert," said Miguel Pérez, a 24-year-old migrant from Guerrero State. "It makes no sense."

A year ago, a flood of immigrants from Central America was also overwhelming the border patrol in Del Rio and Eagle Pass, two small Texas towns on the Rio Grande. The migrants were taking advantage of a lack of detention space, which had led to the policy of giving them a hearing date and letting them remain in the country.

The result was bizarre: Central Americans would cross the river in droves in broad daylight, run up to Border Patrol agents and line up to be arrested, knowing they would be released and could then continue on their journey. More than 200 a day were arrested in Eagle Pass alone.

Agents at the processing center, never intended as a jail, were so busy feeding and fingerprinting migrants they had little time for patrolling, said Randy Clark, the agent in charge of Eagle Pass Border Patrol office.

DOJ_NMG_0134881

"It was a madhouse, literally a madhouse," he said, as he walked through the processing center, its empty cells covered in graffiti. "It's like night and day. Night and day."

Agent Clark and his colleagues attribute the reversal to two changes. First, the Justice Department gave Border Patrol agents the ability to deport most of the Central Americans more quickly, without a hearing before a judge.

Then, in December 2005, the federal government started prosecuting everyone the Border Patrol picked up for illegal entry, a misdemeanor that carries a penalty of up to six months in county, state and federal jails for a first offense.

On a recent morning, 78 immigrants shuffled into the federal courtroom of Judge Victor Roberto Garcia. The migrants were shackled around the feet and hands as if they were dangerous criminals.

Once in court, the judge conducted an unusual mass hearing in which all the migrants — represented by a single lawyer — agreed to waive their right to a trial and pleaded guilty to illegal entry. The judge gave the first-timers 15 days in jail, but he handed out sentences of 120 or 180 days to those who had been deported in the past.

One Honduran woman, Gloria Machado-Lara, had been deported just a month before, but tried to slip in again with her husband, Freddy Rosales Díaz, in early February. The judge looked dumbfounded.

"Just last month they sent you back?" he said. "You understand that's why you have to go to jail."

Head lowered, she said, "Forgive me." He gave her and her husband 120 days.

Though it seems cruel to many migrants, the zero-tolerance policy appears to be working, Border Patrol commanders say. Along the river the Del Rio sector patrols, arrests are a third of what they were a year ago, only about 35 a day. In the meantime, drug seizures have doubled, as more agents have been freed up to patrol.

"Word is getting around out there that if you cross in this area and get apprehended you are probably going to go to jail, and that is a deterrent," Sector Chief Randy Hill said.

Yet across the river in Ciudad Acuña, where migrants arrive bewildered and penniless every afternoon after serving their prison sentences, several said they had no idea they ran the risk of jail. The smugglers they hired never told them.

One of the migrants was a 51-year-old plumber from Acámbaro, Guanajuato, who asked that his name not be used because he was ashamed of the criminal conviction. He said he was trying to get to San Antonio, where a friend had promised to get him a job at a water park.

He needed more money, he said, to pay his son's college tuition. He had never set foot in a jail before.

But he acknowledged that the stint in jail had persuaded him not to try again, even if his son must drop out. "No way," he said, shaking his head.

Memo May Be Basis For New Trial Of Agents (SBS)

San Bernardino Sun, February 21, 2007

Defense attorneys for two former El Paso, Texas, area Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting a Mexican drug smuggler will ask for a new trial based on evidence they say wasn't provided to them in court.

Mary Stillinger, co-counsel for former Border Patrol agent Ignacio Ramos, said an April 12, 2005, Department of Homeland Security memo was never provided to them.

The memo - written by Christopher Sanchez of the department's Inspector General's Office acknowledged that all nine agents at the scene, including two supervisors, knew about the shooting, heard about the shooting and covered up the shooting.

Shana Jones, special assistant to U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton for the Western District of Texas, whose office prosecuted the case, said that prosecutors will continue to challenge any questions on appeal.

"Both supervisors testified at trial as well as other witnesses that they were not present when agents Compean and Ramos were shooting at the fleeing alien," Jones said.

"Additionally, radio traffic confirms their testimony that they were not there at the time of the shooting. With regard to legal questions, we have litigated those at trial and will continue to litigate those legal questions on appeal."

Only Ramos and fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean were charged in the case.

"I confirmed with all other trial counsel, and we concurred that the document was never disclosed to us," Stillinger said. "If we had that document we would've used it."

Ramos and Compean were convicted in March for shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila on Feb. 17, 2005, in the left buttock as he fled to Mexico.

Aldrete-Davila, who allegedly smuggled about 700 pounds of marijuana from Mexico into the U.S. that day, received immunity from prosecution to testify against the agents.

Ramos and Compean, who are in federal prisons, have appealed their case to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans.

Stillinger also has filed a sealed motion with the appellate court for bond pending appeal.

However, Andy Ramirez, chairman of the Chino-based Friends of the Border Patrol, said that the Compean family had the document since the trial began. Compean's wife Patty said the attorneys had the document since 2005 and may have overlooked it.

"I hope that the memorandum was just overlooked," Patty Compean said.

Stillinger, however, said the four defense attorneys working the case did not see the memorandum.

Both agents said that the other agents and supervisors who were involved in the incident knew about the shooting. That assertion was backed up by the memo written by Sanchez.

Regarding the memo, Stillinger said, "either the Office of Inspector General withheld it from the prosecution or the prosecution withheld the document from us."

The memo is not an admissible part of Ramos and Compean's appeal because it was not part of the original trial, Stillinger said.

A new trial, however, may be possible if the district court believes the memorandum would have made a significant difference in the outcome of the case, she added.

"We would have to file for a new trial with the original court," Stillinger said. "The court would look to see is this something that we did not get in the past? Is it something that should be given to us? And is this material evidence?"

Policy Supports Agents (DB)

Daily Bulletin, February 20, 2007

Two convicted former El Paso Border Patrol agents accused by the U.S. Attorney of not filing a report when they shot a Mexican drug smuggler were prohibited by their own agency's firearms policy from doing so, according to documents obtained by the Daily Bulletin.

Meanwhile, the government made public Monday its response to Border Patrol Agent Ignacio Ramos' October motion to reduce his sentence.

The response contends that Ramos and fellow agent Jose Alonso Compean knowingly shot an unarmed suspect, filed a false report, and that supervisors were not notified.

Attached to the motion were domestic violence arrest reports regarding three disputes Ramos had with his wife, Monica. Those documents were not admissible during the agents' trial. Ramos was not charged with a crime stemming from the incidents.

Ramos and Compean were convicted last spring for shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, a Mexican drug smuggler, in the buttocks on Feb. 17, 2005. The agents are now serving 11 and 12 years, respectively, in federal prison.

The agents were convicted partly due to the government's successful argument at trial that the two men failed to file a report about the shooting.

But U.S. Border

Advertisement

Patrol firearms policy specifically states that agents are prohibited from filing a report if a shooting incident takes place and that only an oral report to supervisors is required.

"Ensure that supervisory personnel or INS investigating officers are aware that employees involved in a shooting incident shall not be required or allowed to submit a written statement of the circumstances surrounding the incident," according to the firearms policy.

"All written statements regarding the incident shall be prepared by the local INS investigating officers and shall be based upon an interview of the INS employee."

INS refers to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, which oversaw the Border Patrol prior to the creation of the Department of Homeland Security. The shooting policy has remained unchanged.

Department of Homeland Security Office of Inspector General documents obtained by the paper show that all nine agents on the scene at the time of the shooting - including two supervisors - knew shots had been fired.

Oscar Garcia, El Paso Border Patrol Union representative with Local 1929 and a firearms instructor, said that the Report of Apprehension or Seizure filed by Compean and Ramos on the day of the incident was accurate. Garcia stated that the agent's omission of the shooting in the drug seizure report followed firearms policy.

"Our own policy prohibits them from filing any report on the shooting incident," Garcia said. "The U.S. Attorney's assertion that they covered up the incident by not filing a report is ridiculous."

Johnny Sutton, the U.S. attorney for western Texas whose office prosecuted the case against the agents, contends the agents didn't report the shooting to supervisors who arrived on scene and knowingly lied about the incident.

"Ramos did not mention the shooting, and said nothing about the suspect having a weapon," Sutton said in an Aug. 11 press release.

Sutton was not immediately available for comment on Monday.

Both agents, however, told the Daily Bulletin the other agents and supervisors on the scene that day knew about the shooting, an assertion echoed in a Department of Homeland Security Office of Inspector General memorandum written March 12, 2005, by Christopher Sanchez, an investigator with the Office of Inspector General.

"Investigation disclosed that the following Border Patrol agents were at the location of the shooting incident, assisted in destroying evidence of the shooting, and or knew/heard about the shooting: Oscar Juarez, Arturo Vasquez, Jose Mendoza, David Jaquez, Lance Medrano, Lorenzo Yrigoyen, Rene Mendez, Robert Arnold, and Jonathan Richards," Sanchez wrote.

Arnold and Richards were the two supervisors on the scene that day.

Richards was given a promotion shortly after the incident and testified against the agents. Agents Vasquez, Juarez and Jaquez were given immunity from prosecution to testify against Ramos and Compean.

The prosecution's objection to Ramos' motion to reduce his sentence, which was released Monday, goes against what was reported by the Office of Inspector General and contends the two former agents covered up the shooting on their own.

According to Assistant U.S. Attorney Debra Kanof, who prosecuted the agents and wrote the motion, some of the least credible evidence was when Ramos and Compean walked away from the scene.

"Instead of fulfilling (Ramos') duties as an agent and as a member of the response team, he walked side by side with Compean, who according to Compean's own testimony, bent down at least nine times to pick up his own spent casings."

Kanof also states in her response that Ramos never mentioned until the trial that he thought his life or Compean's was in danger, or that they thought the smuggler had a gun.

Ramos chose not to speak to investigators until his attorney was present, he told the Daily Bulletin. Compean, however, did wave his right to counsel and discussed the incident with investigators from the Office of Inspector General.

Contrary to Kanof's statement, several memorandums written by Sanchez, the investigating officer, attest that Compean believed his life was in danger.

"Compean said that he began to shoot at Aldrete-Davila because of the shiny object he thought he saw in Aldrete-Davila's left hand ... Compean explained that he thought that the shiny object might be a gun and that Aldrete-Davila was going to shoot him because he kept looking back at him as he ran away."

TAX:

Rapper Can't Evade Tax Charge (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet

Boston Herald, February 21, 2007

A federal judge refused to dismiss tax-evasion charges against a controversial Hub hip-hop artist on the opening day of his trial yesterday simply because the rapper's accountant was singing to the FBI and IRS about his alleged shenanignans.

Lawyers for Ray "Benzino" Scott, 41, former co-owner of the hip-hop magazine The Source, argued in court papers, "There is something fundamentally wrong with the government employing (Scott's) controller to gather evidence of other crimes at the very same time the controller is ostensibly putting together the information necessary to prepare (Scott's) tax returns."

But U.S. District Court Judge Rya W. Zobel sided with federal prosecutors, who called Scott's eleventh-hour bid "far from candid."

The informant, George Moore, handled finances for The Source. On at least one occasion when he was secretly recording a conversation with Scott, telling him he had to file taxes, Scott hung up, according to prosecutors.

Moore assisted with the government's investigation of Scott from 2001 to 2002, but was never paid, prosecutors insist.

Scott's struggling musical acts have included Made Men and the Almighty RSO. Best known for the anti-police rap "One in the Chamba," he stands accused of failing to file tax returns for 1999 and 2000, despite pulling down six-figure incomes both years.

The former Easton resident had a well-publicized feud with Eminem after he accused the white rapper of making it hard for black artists to break into the mainstream.

The Source's board of directors dropped Scott and co-founder Dave Mays last year amid allegations of financial mismanagement. The longtime friends have since launched a competing publication, Hip Hop Weekly. Scott plans to call Mays as a witness.

DOJ_NMG_0134884

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Presses Case For Health Plan (MRKTWTCH)

By William L. Watts

Market Watch, February 21, 2007

Faced with a growing chorus for some type of universal healthcare coverage, President Bush met with insurers Tuesday to argue his case for changing the tax code in a bid the White House says will make health insurance more affordable for many Americans.

"I discussed my health care plan that would ... equalize the tax code so that the individual would be more likely to be able to purchase a plan, because I believe a good health care system is one that rewards the consumer, encourages the consumer, and makes sure the consumer has got the capacity to make viable choices," Bush said following the White House meeting with CEOs, including the top executives at Aetna Inc., Cigna, EHealth Inc. and Wellpoint Inc.

Bush, in his State of the Union address last month, outlined a plan that would significantly alter the tax treatment of employer-provided health benefits. Under current law, such benefits are provided to the employee tax-free. Under Bush's plan, all workers would receive a standard deduction of up to $15,000 for married couples and $7,500 for individuals for health insurance.

"If you buy health insurance on your own, you pay much more after taxes than if you get it through your job," Bush said in his weekly radio address on Saturday.

Backers say the measure would create a more level playing field between workers with employer-provided health care and workers who buy their own health insurance. Opponents say the plan would prompt employers to ditch health-care plans while doing little to reduce the number of uninsured.

Democratic leaders have said the Bush plan has little chance of advancing legislatively.

While not endorsing Bush's proposals, a bipartisan group of 10 senators last week sent the White House a letter calling on the president to work with them on a major health-care overhaul.

"We disagree with those who say the Senate is too divided and too polarized to pass comprehensive health care legislation. We disagree with those who believe that this issue should not come up until after the next presidential election," said Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., in a response to Bush's Saturday radio address.address.

Bush's Pallid Health-Care Proposal (BSWK)

By Robert Greenstein And Edwin Park

BusinessWeek, February 21, 2007

President George W. Bush recently proposed major changes in the way the tax code treats health insurance. It's a welcome development that the President has placed this issue on the table. Unfortunately, his plan is unlikely to significantly reduce the ranks of the uninsured, in part because it isn't targeted at the people who can least afford coverage. Moreover, the plan could cause many people in poor health to lose coverage by weakening the employer-based health system—the source of most Americans' health insurance—without putting a viable alternative in its place.

Today, employer-sponsored health insurance is exempt from taxes. This exemption is worth the most to high-income people because they often have more extensive coverage and they pay taxes at higher rates. But low- and moderate-income people, who have more difficulty affording health insurance, get only a modest tax break (if any) because they either pay taxes at low rates or owe no income tax. And people who don't have employer-based insurance generally get no help at all.

Under the President's plan, anyone who has employer-based coverage would have their taxable income increased by the amount that their employer pays for their health plan. However, they would be allowed to claim a standard deduction of $7,500 for single coverage or $15,000 for family coverage, starting in 2009. People who buy insurance through the individual market could claim the same standard deduction.

Further, if an employer's contribution is less than the standard deduction, the employee's taxable income—and thus their tax bill—would go down. If their employer's contribution exceeds the standard deduction, they'd owe taxes on the difference.

There are three basic problems with the President's plan:

1. Most of the uninsured would receive only modest help. About half of uninsured Americans wouldn't receive an income tax break from the plan because they don't owe federal income taxes. Their payroll taxes would decline under the plan, but that would generally be offset by reduced Social Security benefits when they retire (because those benefits are based on the amount of wages subject to the payroll tax).

DOJ_NMG_0134885

Nearly all of the remaining uninsured are in the 10% or 15% tax brackets, so their tax benefits would be modest—usually not enough to enable them to afford health coverage, especially if they have medical problems. The President's own estimates indicate that the new standard deduction would shrink the number of uninsured, currently nearly 47 million, by only about 3 million. Some analysts expect even smaller gains.

2. The plan would weaken employer-based coverage. While highly imperfect, the employer-based health system is the principal means for "pooling" healthy and sick workers together, so that insurance is affordable for those in poor health. Pooling allows insurers to offset the high cost of covering sick people with the low cost of covering healthy people, keeping premiums at more manageable levels for everyone.

Currently, the tax system supports this pooling mechanism by giving a tax exemption for employer-sponsored coverage. The President's plan would eliminate this tax advantage by allowing people to claim the standard deduction whether they get their coverage through their employer or on their own. As a result, some employers—particularly smaller organizations—would have an incentive to stop offering health insurance to their employees, assuming that workers could use the deduction to purchase coverage in the individual market.

For many workers, especially those in poor health, that would be a dubious assumption. In most states, insurers in the individual health insurance market vary premiums according to a person's health. For people with medical problems the insurers often charge very high amounts, refuse coverage for the conditions they have, or refuse to cover them altogether. Workers in poor health whose employers drop coverage as a result of the President's plan could find themselves unable to secure adequate or affordable coverage on their own. Many could end up uninsured.

3. The plan provides no viable pooling alternative to employer-based coverage. The President's staff has acknowledged that many unhealthy people would probably be unable to use the standard deduction to find coverage in the individual market. To address this concern, the President would allow states to redirect some existing federal funds from public and charity hospitals that care for the uninsured, to state initiatives like "high-risk pools," which provide coverage to people unable to purchase insurance in the individual market because of their health status.

High-risk pools have proven ineffective, however, because they don't pool sick people with healthy people, but with sickly people who cost even more to insure. To keep the cost of these pools from spiraling out of control states have had to limit enrollment, set premiums at very high levels, and scale back the coverage they provide. That makes high-risk pools a very poor alternative to employer-based coverage.

In sum, the President's plan would weaken employer-based coverage without providing an alternative to pool risk, such as allowing people to "buy into" Medicare or the health plan used by Congress and federal workers. That's not a step toward the health care reform this country needs.

Greenstein is executive director of the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities. Park is a senior health policy analyst at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Many Americans Don't Trust Leaders To Reform Health Care, Poll Finds (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Nearly half of Americans don't trust President Bush to reform the nation's health-care system, a new Wall Street Journal Online/Harris health-care poll found.

When asked much they trust the president to come up with good policies for improving and reforming the U.S. health-care system, 49% said "not at all," while 16% said "not much," according to the online survey of 2,482 U.S. adults. By comparison, 18% said they trust Mr. Bush "to some extent" and only 9% trust him "a great deal" on the issue. The survey was conducted Feb. 7-9.

The survey found more confidence in Democrats than Republicans. Fifty percent said they trust Democrats on the issue "a great deal" or "to some extent," up from 45% in a survey conducted last year1. In contrast, 28% of people in the latest poll said they trust Republicans "a great deal" or "to some extent," compared with 31% last year.

Among potential presidential contenders, 48% said they trust Democratic Sen. Hillary Clinton on the issue a great deal or to some extent, while 45% said the same about Democratic Sen. Barack Obama, 34% about Republican Sen. John McCain and 19% about Republican Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts.

Group To Protest Bush Visit To Chattanooga (CHA)

Chattanoogan, February 20, 2007

A group opposed to the war in Iraq will protest during President Bush's visit to Chattanooga.

But the Hamilton County Republican Party was urging a turnout of support for the President.

DOJ_NMG_0134886

Connie Weathers, county GOP chairman, said, "Bring your friends and family to come show your support for our President beginning at 10 a.m. outside the Trade Center. Bring your flags and red, white and blue!"

The protest site is at the sidewalk of Carter Street across from the Convention Center.

The president is set to fly into the Chattanooga Metropolitan Airport on Air Force One Wednesday morning.

He is due to make about a 20-minute tour of Erlanger Medical Center prior to going to the Convention Center. There he will hold a "conversation on healthcare initiatives."

The events are not open to the public.

It was announced Tuesday night that Gov. Phil Bredesen will join President Bush in Chattanooga on Wednesday "for several events that will focus on expanding healthcare options for the uninsured."

His office said Gov. Bredesen will greet President Bush at Chattanooga Metropolitan Airport, and will proceed with the President to Erlanger Medical Center for a tour of the facility. The governor will then travel with the President to the Convention Center to participate in a conversation on healthcare initiatives.

Also set to be in the entourage are Sen. Lamar Alexander, Sen. Bob Corker and Rep. Zach Wamp.

UTC student Matthew Pullen said he expects 30-50 protestors at a minimum for the protest.

He said in an email, "Try to think of it as just one of the few days out of the year you can speak out, especially in the President's presence.

"Of course, none of us expect that this will reverse the War in Iraq or reform healthcare, but what we CAN hope for is that it will show lawmakers, candidates, and Bush himself that there are concerned citizens here. We will speak up, we will show that we respectful dissent.

"Hopefully, this protest will take some wind out of the sails of President Bush's speech on healthcare he is giving in Erlanger."

He urged group members, "Please keep it peaceful and quiet. The last thing we need is any trouble to diminish our point. Keep signs clean, keep chanting/yelling/ singing to a minimum, etc. We want to show that we are a peaceful public group."

Airport officials said there will be no public access to view either the President or Air Force One from the airport on Wednesday.

There will be minimal delays on commercial air traffic, if any, it was stated.

Officials said all services provided by the Chattanooga-Hamilton County Health Department will operate under normal business hours on Wednesday. However, some streets around the Health Department will be closed.

During the President's visit to Erlanger, Health Department clients, business partners, and visitors can access the Health Department entrance by the following route:

From the east, take a right onto Central Avenue, which turns into Blackford Street. Blackford Street runs behind Erlanger Hospital and ends at the Health Department. Health Department clients, business partners, and visitors can park in the parking garage behind the Health Department.

From Amnicola Highway or downtown, take McCallie Avenue and turn left onto Central Avenue. Follow Central Avenue to Blackford Street. Blackford Street runs behind Erlanger Hospital and ends at the Health Department. Health Department clients, business partners, and visitors can park in the parking garage behind the Health Department.

The circular driveway behind the Health Department is also available for client or service drop-off.

The Health Department is available to answer questions about the continuation of services on Wednesday or to help direct clients to our entrance. Please call (423) 209-8000 for more information.

Medicare Benefit Appears To Slow Spending Growth On Drugs (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Federal number crunchers said yesterday that the new Medicare drug benefit appears to be slowing the growth in national spending on prescription medicines because the drug plans are negotiating lower prices with drug companies.

But the analysts also forecasted that overall health-care spending would continue to rise and would account for nearly 20 percent of the economy -- or more than $4 trillion a year -- by 2016. In contrast, health-care spending was about $2.1 trillion in 2006, accounting for about 16 percent of the economy. In 1985, it was just over 10 percent.

The findings provide new fuel for the debate about whether Medicare could get better drug prices if the government negotiated with pharmaceutical companies. Many Democrats in Congress say it would, and the House has already passed legislation requiring the government to use its negotiating muscle. President Bush maintains that the current system achieves the best prices, and he has threatened a veto.

DOJ_NMG_0134887

The figures are being published today by actuaries and economists at the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) in the journal Health Affairs. The figures cited in the study for 2006 are forecasts as well because data are not available yet, federal officials said.

Karen Davis, president of the Commonwealth Fund, a nonprofit research institution, said the projections show that the United States still has a serious problem with rising costs despite a slowdown in health-care spending growth in recent years.

"The cost problem isn't solved," Davis said. "In the 1990s we thought managed care was the solution. In the 2000s we thought consumer-driven health care and higher deductibles for patients was the solution. Now, when you look at these numbers, you realize we've got to get serious about transforming the health-care system."

Analysts said they expect to see that spending on prescription drugs rose more slowly in 2006 because of the Medicare Part D drug benefit that began last year. In the program, private insurers negotiate prices with drug companies as they compete to attract Medicare beneficiaries.

That has helped hold down prices even as more seniors are able to get drugs, John A. Poisal of the CMS said in a briefing. National spending on prescription drugs was expected to rise to $214 billion in 2006, from $201 billion in 2005. But that increase is 0.4 percentage points less than it would have been without the new drug benefit, he said.

Several national polls have shown that a majority of the public believes government negotiations would hold down drug costs even more. A survey of 1,000 adults released yesterday by AARP, for instance, found that 87 percent of respondents -- including majorities of Democrats, Republicans and independents -- supported allowing the government to use its bargaining power.

Health Costs To Nearly Double In A Decade (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Healthcare spending in the United States will nearly double over the next decade to $4.1 trillion in 2016, government economists said today, prompting concern that Americans cannot keep paying for cost increases that outstrip the growth of the economy.

The healthcare bill will average $12,782 for every man, woman and child in 2016, an increase from $7,498 this year, said the report, published online by the policy journal Health Affairs. Healthcare costs will account for nearly 20 cents out of every dollar Americans spend in 2016, up from about 16 cents today.

And by 2016 — even before most baby boomers retire and become Medicare recipients — federal, state and local government will be picking up nearly half the national healthcare tab, putting pressure on Congress to curb benefits, raise taxes or both.

"This is really the key issue for the fiscal future of the nation," said Robert L. Bixby, executive director of the Concord Coalition, a private group that promotes reducing the federal deficit. "If healthcare costs continue to drift up — unless you dramatically raise taxes — you will have healthcare pushing out everything else government does. Nobody can say exactly when you reach a point that it's unsustainable, but you can look at something and say it's unlikely."

The report by the government's Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services follows a recent private study concluding that the United States spends far more on healthcare than other advanced countries, with no measurably better result.

Even after adjusting for greater disposable income here, the report by the McKinsey Global Institute, a private economic think tank, found that costs in the U.S. were $1,645 per person higher than in countries such as the United Kingdom and Germany. It attributed the excess costs to higher administrative expenses, drug prices, doctors' incomes and other factors.

"Most components of the U.S. healthcare system are economically distorted," the report said, adding that "no single factor is … the silver bullet for reform."

The new federal cost report, prepared by government statisticians, deliberately steered clear of policy recommendations. But its authors warned of a growing possibility "that we will have to make important sacrifices to pay for healthcare" and a need for "constant assessment of the value we associate with our healthcare investment."

Core healthcare costs such as hospital care and doctors' services are expected to rise at relatively modest rates of 6% to 7% a year over the coming decade, the report found. The problem, according to the authors, is that those rates are 1 to 2 percentage points higher than the growth forecast for the overall economy.

"That is a very significant point," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA, an advocacy group that supports coverage for the nearly 47 million people in America who are uninsured. "As healthcare spending increases faster than earnings, it means more and more people will find healthcare unaffordable and join the ranks of the uninsured and underinsured."

DOJ_NMG_0134888

The report also marks the first time that such long-range cost estimates take into account the Medicare prescription benefit launched last year. The benefit is administered through private insurers — a feature that many Democrats consider wasteful, arguing that Medicare could get lower prices by negotiating directly with drug companies.

The report's verdict on the drug benefit was mixed.

Overall, it found that the private plans had done a good job of obtaining discounts from manufacturers, helping hold down spending growth even as more seniors were buying medications. But it also found that Medicare's discounts are not as deep as those available under the Medicaid program, which does not rely on private intermediaries.

More significantly, the report found that the Medicare drug benefit has led to a dramatic shift in who pays the bill for drugs. Government is now picking up about 40% of the national tab, compared with 28% in 2005, before the benefit went into effect. That could become a problem because the prescription program lacks its own stable source of long-term financing.

"As the nation moves from more traditional sources of insurance … to more federal and state-provided healthcare, we will continue to face tough questions about how we finance our healthcare bill," said John A. Poisal, the report's lead author.

Roberts Launches Opposition To Bush's Health-care Proposals (WE)

By John Hanna

The Wichita Eagle, February 21, 2007

TOPEKA - Republican Sen. Pat Roberts is working with a Democratic colleague to block some of President Bush's budget proposals for social services, suggesting those recommendations could amount to "rationing health care."

The Kansas senator said Monday that he doubts Bush's proposals enjoy much support, so he would like Congress to avoid a lengthy back-and-forth before providing additional funds for the Medicare and Medicaid programs. He's most concerned about payments to hospitals that provide services to the programs' participants.

Bush's proposals are designed to save $76 billion over five years in Medicare, the program that provides medical services for the elderly. They also would trim $25 billion from Medicaid, the medical program for low-income people. They've already received strong criticism from Democrats.

Roberts was in Topeka to discuss health care issues with the chief executives of 15 northeast Kansas hospitals. His visit was among a week's worth of events scheduled statewide.

He and Sen. Blanche Lincoln, D-Ark., are drafting a letter to the White House and the chairman and ranking Republican on the Senate Budget Committee, asking them to protect hospital payments.

"Health care programs are under a lot of pressure," Roberts said after meeting with the hospital chief executives. "What we end up doing is basically rationing health care, and that's not right."

Roberts said he anticipates 20 to 30 senators will sign his letter to the White House and the Budget Committee leaders. He said he doesn't want the debate this year to follow the pattern of previous budget debates.

"We usually discuss this for a full year in a session of Congress, and then we come up with an emergency supplemental," he said. "My goal will try to be to not go through that and to restore the funding."

He said squeezing Medicare and Medicaid can lead to more costs. For example, he said, if Congress reduces the number of people who receive rehab services after a serious accident, some end up back in the hospital.

Employer Groups Take Aim At Part Of Medical-leave Law (HILL)

By Jessica Holzer

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Employer groups are trying to persuade the Bush administration to restrict the illnesses that qualify under the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA) and make it less tempting for workers to take sporadic time off under the law.

Passed in 1993, the FMLA requires businesses with at least 50 employees to give 12 weeks' unpaid leave to workers for the birth or adoption of a child or in the case of their own or a close family member's sickness.

Employers say they have no qualms with the portion of the law that allows employees leave to care for a new child.

Rather, they claim that weaknesses in the law and the regulations handed down since it was passed have spawned rampant abuse by shirkers and headaches for managers in charge of approving and tracking leave.

"This isn't about taking away FMLA rights to mothers and newborns. But there are a lot of areas where there are challenges and we think it needs to be looked at," the director of government affairs for the Society of Human Resource Management, Mike Aitken, said. The group is one of about 50 employer organizations, including the National Association of Manufacturers (NAM) and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, that have formed the National Coalition to Protect Family Leave to petition the Department of Labor to change the FMLA.

DOJ_NMG_0134889

More than 50 million Americans have taken advantage of FMLA protections in the 14 years since it was passed. But the business community has long opposed aspects of the law. Parts of the act have been litigated scores of times and stricken down by courts, including the Supreme Court.

This latest push by employers to modify the FMLA comes on the heels of a Department of Labor (DoL) request in December for public comment on the law and just after Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.), one of its original architects, introduced a bill Feb. 1 to expand the act. His legislation would ensure six weeks' paid leave under the FMLA, to be funded by the federal government, the employer and the employee.

Last month's DoL request for comments on the FMLA sparked worries among proponents that the administration would water down the act.

"We have significant concerns that this is a first step in a process that will lead to a substantial weakening in the FMLA protections," Jocelyn Samuels, vice president in charge of education and employment at the National Women's Law Center, said.

The comment period ended on Friday, Feb. 16. The DoL said it would review the more than 100 comments filed in the coming weeks but said it wasn't wedded to proposing any changes.

"The next step for us is to review the record. Whether that results in a rule or a proposed rule I do not know and it would be very premature to suggest that that will happen at this point," the assistant secretary of the department's Employment Standards Administration, Victoria Lipnic, insisted.

One major beef employers have with the law is a 1996 DoL regulation that qualifies a host of minor illness for FMLA protection that they believe should be addressed by companies' regular sick leave policies.

Under the rule, earaches, upset stomachs or common colds meet the criteria for a "serious health condition" under the FMLA as long as the worker is incapacitated for at least three consecutive days and is following a treatment regimen, such as taking prescription drugs.

Another big gripe is unplanned, intermittent leave, which employers complain wreaks havoc on production schedules. Workers may use FMLA leave sporadically throughout the year and without advance warning as long as they have a doctor's note on file certifying a chronic condition. The widespread use of such leave has fed the suspicion among employers that workers are abusing the system.

"It's 'Oh, I want to go fishing' or 'Oh, the Yankees are in town today,'" the director of human resources policy at the NAM, Jason Straczewski, said. He added that NAM's members had no problem with workers taking intermittent leave for a serious medical condition or for scheduled treatment such as chemotherapy.

To crack down on any abuse of intermittent leave, employer groups want to increase the increments of time with which workers can take leave under FMLA. A DoL regulation currently forces businesses to account for leave "to the shortest period of time that the employer's payroll system uses," which can be as small as six minutes for some businesses.

Employers argue this invites absenteeism and tardiness. Increasing the increment "might require the individual to really think, 'Is this really a situation that should prevent me from going to work?'" Aitken argued.

Employer groups also want the DoL to require workers to update their medical certification for intermittent leave periodically, permit managers to contact an employee's doctor about a chronic condition and streamline the paperwork required to comply with the law.

They said they are trying to improve, rather than dismantle, the law.

"We are not trying to repeal this law. We are not trying to gut the regulations. What we are seeking is clarity and simplicity," the director of labor law policy at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Marc Freedman, said.

Bush Friends, Loyal And Texan, Remain A Force (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Israel Hernandez was a fresh-faced college graduate from the Texas border town of Eagle Pass in the summer of 1993 when he landed a job in Dallas as the personal aide to the part-owner of the Texas Rangers George W. Bush.

Together, they spent months driving the dusty back roads of the Lone Star State to promote the team, Mr. Hernandez behind the wheel of Mr. Bush's Lincoln Town Car.

"He would speak to a rotary or chamber and say, 'You need to come to the ballpark and we'll make it Athens, Texas, Day. We'll put you in your own special section; we can say 'Welcome Athens, Texas,' on the big screen; you can come to batting practice, '' Mr. Hernandez recalled.

DOJ_NMG_0134890

Today, after nearly 14 years in Mr. Bush's employ, with a short break to get a master's degree, Mr. Hernandez, 37, travels the world promoting free trade as an assistant secretary of commerce. From his sun-drenched corner office, with its sweeping view of the Washington Monument, he can sit at his desk and watch the presidential helicopter, Marine One, ferry around the man to whom he owes his career.

"In many ways," Mr. Hernandez said of Mr. Bush, "I feel like I have grown up with him."

He is not the only one. Six years into Mr. Bush's presidency, the corps of loyal Texans who accompanied him to Washington from Austin remains a powerful force inside the administration, a steady source of comfort for an increasingly isolated president. No matter how grim the polls or dire the news in Iraq, they have stood by Mr. Bush — and been rewarded with plum jobs — as their lives have grown increasingly intertwined with one another's and with his.

"We've gotten married, gotten remarried, had babies," said Margaret Spellings, who was a single mother with two children when she followed Mr. Bush to Washington and has since been promoted from a domestic policy adviser to secretary of education. "I remember the Bush twins when they were just little squirts."

To hear these people talk about the president is to meet a man many Americans have either forgotten or no longer recognize. Their George W. Bush is the compassionate conservative who helped soften the harsh image of the Republican Party, a man who chokes up at going-away parties, as he did last year for Andrew H. Card Jr., his departing chief of staff; a man unafraid of giving promotions to openly gay people, as he did with Mr. Hernandez, and who always remembers to ask how the family is.

"There's a lot of devotion to George Bush the person," said Clay Johnson, a prep school buddy of Mr. Bush who is now a deputy director of the Office of Management and Budget.

Like another Bush devotee, the first President Bush, these Texans are increasingly angry at criticism leveled at him. Karen Hughes, the communications adviser who famously went back to Texas when her teenage son grew homesick but has since returned as an under secretary of state, says she is tired of seeing Mr. Bush treated as a "caricature."

Mr. Johnson says the most painful accusation is hearing Mr. Bush called a liar.

"I said, 'How in the world can you be considered a liar by some?' " Mr. Johnson said, recounting a conversation with Mr. Bush. "I mean, there are bumper stickers about lying. It's just incredible.' And he said, 'Well, you've just got to get used to it. Because that's what we have here.' "

Every president has his kitchen cabinet, the intimate and informal circle of friends and advisers who typically wind up with high-placed jobs. John F. Kennedy installed his brother Robert at the Justice Department. Ronald Reagan brought Edwin Meese III and Michael K. Deaver from California. Jimmy Carter had the so-called Georgia Mafia: Jody Powell, Hamilton Jordan and Bert Lance.

But in a White House that prizes loyalty, the Texans stand out, in number, influence and discretion. Those who have left remain supportive even if they have been nudged out the door, as in the case of Harriet E. Miers, the former White House counsel.

"Loyalty and friendship" is one explanation, said Dan Bartlett, counselor to the president, who has spent 13 years — nearly his entire adult life — with Mr. Bush. Another explanation, Mr. Bartlett said, is the war in Iraq, which "lengthened a lot of people's stay."

Scholars say Mr. Bush has been more strategic than most presidents in sprinkling loyalists throughout the administration. Paul C. Light, an expert in public service at New York University, says it has created an "echo chamber" in which the president gets advice he wants to hear.

"It's like these are George Bush's political children that he's raised from infancy," Mr. Light said. "They're incredibly loyal, and they're also likely to tell him what he thinks, and that's what we've seen as the big weakness in this administration."

The Texans, not surprisingly, disagree; they say their closeness to Mr. Bush frees them to be candid.

Mr. Bartlett, 35, knows the president better than most. His job during Mr. Bush's first campaign for Texas governor was to research the candidate's background, and he is today a kind of walking presidential biographer, with details crammed into his brain of Mr. Bush's triumphs but also his travails, including his National Guard Service and his arrest for drunken driving in 1976.

"I dealt with him directly at a very young age," Mr. Bartlett said. "I don't even think twice about telling him what I think."

The Texas circle includes three cabinet officials — Ms. Spellings, the education secretary; Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzalez; and Alphonso R. Jackson, the secretary of housing and urban development — as well as some of the best-known names in Washington: Karl Rove, the chief political strategist, Mr. Bartlett and Ms. Hughes.

There are also lesser-knowns. Mr. Johnson, the deputy budget director, met Mr. Bush in 1961 at Phillips Academy in Andover, Mass., when they were two 15-year-olds far from home. Mr. Johnson later ran the governor's personnel office in Austin; in Washington, he keeps a George Bush doll on his desk and is one of the few people in town to have had the Bushes at his home for dinner, motorcade, Secret Service and all.

DOJ_NMG_0134891

Gordon D. Johndroe, once a $5-an-hour college intern in Austin, is today the chief spokesman for the National Security Council. Mr. Johndroe learned the art of dealing with reporters by literally sitting at the president's knee on the floor of the eight-seat Bush campaign plane in 2000, monitoring the governor's interviews.

"My job," he said, "was, 'Let us know if he makes any news. Let Karen know or call back to Dan Bartlett, who was in Austin.' And I was able to do that because I had listened to him speak so much. I knew when he said something new."

Among the benefits to being an old Texas friend of the president is access: the invitations to Camp David, to dinner and movies at the White House, to Mr. Bush's annual July 4 birthday bash. Ms. Hughes remains a regular dinner companion, most recently at a small White House gathering for Vaclav Havel, the former president of the Czech Republic.

Among the downsides is being ridiculed as a crony. Ms. Miers, who met Mr. Bush when she ran the Texas Bar Association, was excoriated by lawmakers who deemed her unqualified when Mr. Bush nominated her to the Supreme Court. Still, she calls her association with the president "one of the great blessings of my life."

Mr. Hernandez, who is so close to the Bushes that he moved in with them in Dallas after his apartment was burglarized, has been the subject of news articles suggesting that the president dubbed him Altoids Boy, a reference to his duties dispensing Altoids mints to Mr. Bush during their Texas travels.

"I hate that," Mr. Hernandez said. "He doesn't call me Altoids Boy. He calls me Izzy."

Two years ago, the online edition of The New Republic, a liberal magazine, singled out Mr. Hernandez as a member of the Bush "hackocracy."

But sitting in his corner office the other day, recounting his travel this past year to Peru, China, Vietnam and Panama, Mr. Hernandez — who in his Department of Commerce job supervises 1,600 employees in 80 countries — had the final word.

Mr. Bush, he said, is simply giving him an opportunity to show what he can do.

"Everyone has their own journey, their own story," he said. "I feel like I climbed this mountain with the president, and I'm getting a chance."

Swift Action Promised At Walter Reed (WP)

By Dana Priest And Anne Hull, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Investigations Urged as Army Moves to Make Repairs, Improve Staffing

The White House and congressional leaders called yesterday for swift investigation and repair of the problems plaguing outpatient care at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, as veterans groups and members of Congress in both parties expressed outrage over substandard housing and the slow, dysfunctional bureaucracy there.

Top Army officials yesterday visited Building 18, the decrepit former hotel housing more than 80 recovering soldiers, outside the gates of the medical center. Army Secretary Francis Harvey and Vice Chief of Staff Richard Cody toured the building and spoke to soldiers as workers in protective masks stripped mold from the walls and tore up soiled carpets.

At the White House, press secretary Tony Snow said that he spoke with President Bush yesterday about Walter Reed and that the president told him: "Find out what the problem is and fix it."

Snow said Bush "first learned of the troubling allegations regarding Walter Reed from the stories this weekend in The Washington Post. He is deeply concerned and wants any problems identified and fixed." The spokesman said he did not know why the president, who has visited the facility many times in the past five years, had not heard about these problems before.

Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, said in an interview that the Army leadership had assured him that all the staff increases he had requested would be met. "This is not an issue," he said. "This is their number one priority."

He said the Army has agreed to fund what he called a "surge plan" that has been designed for the likelihood that the 21,500-person troop increase underway in Iraq will result in more casualties.

Weightman said case managers have been ordered to call each of the 700 outpatients to ask about problems they may be encountering. He has also put half a dozen senior enlisted officers from the hospital in charge of the outpatients' companies normally in the hands of lower-level platoon sergeants. Also, a medic will be stationed 24 hours a day at the Mologne House, the largest residence on the 113-acre post, to help soldiers with medical or psychological problems.

Harvey said he was surprised and disappointed by the conditions and the bureaucratic delays. "In the warrior ethos, the last line says you should never leave a fallen comrade, and from that facility point of view we didn't live up to it . . . and it looks to me we may have not lived up to it from a process side," he said, adding that conditions at the building are "inexcusable."

"It's a failure . . . in the garrison leadership . . . that should have never happened, and we are quickly going to rectify that situation," he said.

"We had some NCOs [noncommissioned officers] who weren't doing their job, period," Harvey said. He said he and Cody will report regularly to Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates on a plan to fix the conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0134892

The Post series documented tattered conditions at Building 18, including mold, rot, mice and cockroaches, but also a larger bureaucratic indifference that has impeded some soldiers' recovery.

At Building 18 yesterday, platoon sergeants with clipboards went from room to room inspecting for mold, leaks and other problems. A broken elevator was repaired, and snow and ice were cleared from the sidewalks.

The secretaries of the Army and Navy announced that they had begun a broader review of Walter Reed and the National Naval Medical Center and that an independent review group will be formed to investigate outpatient care and administrative processes. Walter Reed is set to close in 2011, and the naval facility in Bethesda will be expanded to handle the additional wounded.

Walter Reed's fixes are unlikely to immediately quiet the criticism from members of Congress, who received a flood of calls from the public and veterans groups asking how the problems could have been unknown to officials -- some of whom regularly visit Walter Reed.

"We need to bring the Army people in and say, 'What the hell is going on?' " said Rep. Bob Filner (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Veterans Affairs Committee.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) asked the House Armed Services Committee to investigate outpatient care at Walter Reed. "The treatment reported in The Post of our troops and our veterans is disgraceful," Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Several senators, including presidential candidate Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and former presidential candidate John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), announced they are co-sponsoring legislation to simplify the paperwork process for recovering soldiers and increase case managers and psychological counselors. The bill would also require the Army to report more regularly to Congress and the inspector general about the living conditions of injured soldiers.

Jeff Miller (Fla.), the ranking Republican on the House Veterans' Affairs subcommittee on health, said: "The neglect being experienced by some wounded service members is outrageous. The Defense Department is never shy about asking for supplemental funds for operations and equipment; I cannot imagine why housing for recuperating wounded would not be a similarly high priority."

Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), former chairman of what was then known as the House Government Reform Committee, urged the committee to hold a hearing at Walter Reed to give members an "invaluable firsthand look" at how the Army is processing the wounded. "Improvements to date have been episodic, and in some case, short-lived," Davis said in a statement.

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson contributed to this report.

Leadership Blamed For Shabby Army Hospital Building (CNN)

CNN, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Army Secretary Francis Harvey blamed a failure of leadership for substandard conditions in a building that is part of Walter Reed Army Medical Center and vowed Tuesday to move quickly to fix the problem.

"We failed here, we failed in having a facility like this," Harvey told CNN. "Unfortunately, it's a leadership problem."

Inside Building 18, used for outpatients who suffered wounds in Iraq and Afghanistan, workers were repairing plumbing, covering holes in ceilings and repainting mold-covered walls. (Watch a tour of the run-down facility)

Harvey said he learned about the conditions in the building, a former hotel where some soldiers have been recuperating for more than a year and a half, on Sunday, when the Washington Post broke the story.

"If we would have known about this, we would have fixed it," he said. "Unfortunately, we didn't know about it."

The article, titled "The Other Walter Reed," said some outpatients at the facility include veterans who suffer from depression and were involved in overdoses and suicide attempts.

Walter Reed is the Army's top medical facility. It opened in 1901 in a single small building and now is a complex of structures with 28 acres of floor space.

The hospital can accommodate 250 patients and admits more than 14,000 a year. Thousands use its outpatient facilities daily.

President Bush has been seen visiting wounded troops at the hospital several times, and presidents often receive medical care there.

The Base Realignment and Closure Commission in 2005 recommended closing Walter Reed in 2010.

Harvey said an "action plan" was being put together "to ensure across the board that our soldiers are being taken care of with the highest quality medicine possible in the kind of facilities that provide a quality of life for the soldier that is equal to the quality of their service."

He added, "To have it in this condition is disappointing to me, unacceptable to me as the secretary of the Army, and we have a plan in place."

DOJ_NMG_0134893

Walter Reed Probes Former Aid Director (KCS/AP)

The Kansas City Star/AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON - Walter Reed Army Medical Center is investigating the former head of a program that aids injured soldiers.

The probe involves the activities of Michael J. Wagner, who until last month ran the Army's Medical Family Assistance Center, Army spokesman Paul Boyce said Tuesday. The center links businesses, charities and other donors with wounded troops who need financial help or with families strained by living costs, air fares and other expenses when they come to Washington to visit or help care for injured soldiers.

The Washington Post - citing documents and interviews with current and former assistance center staff members - said Wagner was seeking funders and soliciting donations for a Dallas charity at the same time he administered the Army program.

Wagner is now a director of the Texas-based charity, the Military, Veteran and Family Assistance Foundation, a nonprofit group that provides services and resources for veterans and their families.

He could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday at the foundation office.

The Post said that in a telephone interview Wagner denied he had solicited funds for the charity or made contact with donors during office hours. "It's just not true," he was quoted as saying. "I intentionally stayed out of that. I couldn't do that. I couldn't do both."

Wagner said the charity was founded by his brother and that he did not officially become its executive director until he left Walter Reed, according to the Post.

The story was the latest in a Post series that also disclosed bureaucratic delays and substandard living conditions endured by some soldiers there as outpatients, as well as problems in receiving benefits.

Democratic Sens. Barbara Mikulski of Maryland and Patty Murray of Washington urged Defense Secretary Robert Gates in a letter Tuesday to launch an inspector general's investigation into what they called the "deplorable living conditions facing returning Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans." They urged him to investigate conditions at the Navy's top hospital - the National Naval Medical Center - in Bethesda, Md.

"If conditions at Walter Reed, the crown jewel of military health care facilities, have degraded to the point where mouse traps are handed out to patients, how can we feel confident that our troops and veterans truly have the care and transition assistance they have been promised at any facility across the country?" the senators wrote.

Two other Democratic senators - presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., and freshman Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo. - said they are working on legislation to improve the care of war veterans, including measures designed to improve how they are treated as outpatients while still on active duty. The legislation would require more frequent hospital inspections, establish timelines for repairs to facilities that don't meet standards and improve access to psychological counseling, Obama's office said in a statement.

The Pentagon responded Tuesday by announcing that the Army has begun a review of medical care at Walter Reed and the Navy has undertaken a similar review at its National Naval Medical Center. The Pentagon also said an independent review group would be formed to investigate outpatient and administrative issues at the two military medical centers.

The Pentagon said the reviews would be done "promptly," but it gave no specific timetable.

The problems at Walter Reed also caused a stir at the daily press briefing at the White House, where presidential spokesman Tony Snow deflected all requests for comment to the Pentagon.

"The president is committed to these people, committed to men and women who have served. We need to make sure that whatever problems there are get fixed," he said. "What I'm telling you is, let's sort through the facts."

Snow at first was unable to say how President Bush learned of the problems. Later, he amended the transcript of his briefing with a statement saying Bush first heard of the allegations from the Post stories.

Rotten Homecoming (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

IF YOU LISTEN to the PR operation at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, the U.S. military's gleaming flagship hospital offers veterans the best treatment available. What doesn't get mentioned is the bureaucratic contempt and physical squalor that too often await badly injured outpatient soldiers on the Walter Reed campus, the subject of a four-month Post investigation detailed in articles published Sunday and Monday.

Reporters Dana Priest and Anne Hull and researcher Julie Tate spent hundreds of hours inspecting conditions and interviewing injured troops and their loved ones at the Walter Reed outpatient facilities. Their findings: Veterans' rooms are rank; bureaucratic hassles and paper-pushing make the process of repairing buildings, redressing patient grievances and providing veterans with basic goods depressingly inept; administrators' neglect of patients' mental and physical health borders on the criminal; and, most distressing, many veterans leave Walter Reed without the compensation they clearly deserve for their sacrifices.

DOJ_NMG_0134894

The walls of one soldier's room were covered with black mold, and the ceiling of his shower had a large hole. Soldiers who lost their uniforms while undergoing emergency treatment on the battlefield have had to present their purple hearts to get replacement clothes. Amputees and patients on taxing drug regimens are required to report for formation early in the morning, even if it means trudging over accumulated ice and snow. Lost paperwork, which in one case resulted in an obviously impaired veteran getting an order to report to Germany, is a constant problem, sometimes forcing soldiers and their relatives to live at Walter Reed for 18 months or longer as their cases are processed.

Most infuriating are reports of official efforts to deny disability benefits to discharged fighters. The Army tried to deny disability compensation to Cpl. Dell McLeod, who suffered a head injury that left him aimless and unable even to count change at the cafeteria. Army officials' argument: Because he had done poorly in high school, his current mental state might not have been caused by the steel door that smashed his skull in Iraq. If the Army determined that he was mentally fit to serve in the first place, it cannot now abscond from its responsibility for the consequences of his service overseas. Cpl. McLeod ended up getting a settlement from the command at Walter Reed -- despite base staffers' best efforts -- only after his wife got a congressional staffer involved.

Walter Reed's commander, Maj. Gen. George W. Weightman, says that conditions on the post will improve rapidly. His response is commendable, and it should not be forgotten that thousands of professionals and volunteers, civilian and military, are working hard to help veterans heal and adjust. But it also should not have taken newspaper articles to bring change to outpatient conditions at Walter Reed. And while filthy conditions at Building 18 are a temporary problem for these veterans, lowball settlements may leave soldiers and their families impoverished for life.

US Deficit Is Shrinking, For Now (CSM)

By Mark Trumbull

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

Despite the ongoing costs of US military campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan, the outlook for the federal budget has grown substantially brighter.

Tax revenues are rising much faster than spending, according to Treasury Department numbers released last week. The recent trend is strong enough that, were it to continue, the budget could move into surplus in barely a year, one economist calculates.

Already, the federal deficit is shrinking toward about half the size that it has averaged since 1970, when analyzed as a percentage of gross domestic product.

The shift reflects a strong economy, with higher incomes and corporate profits generating a bigger flow of tax revenue. In turn, the Treasury's progress could help the economy by buoying investor confidence in the nation's fiscal position.

Although it is a welcome change, the improvement does little to stave off the long-run challenges to the nation's financial health, many economists say. Baby boomers are starting to retire, placing new demands on government. Costs for healthcare programs like Medicare are still projected to rise faster than overall inflation.

"The picture is getting brighter," and if there's no recession over the next several years "there are going to continue to be some good strides made," says Mark McMullen, a senior economist at Moody's Economy.com in West Chester, Pa. But "it's unlikely that we're going to see a balanced budget anytime in the near or long term."

Some experts say the budget could achieve balance in the short run of the next few years. In unveiling its proposed budget this month, the Bush administration forecast black ink on the federal ledger in 2012. The nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO), in its recent annual outlook, also shows a surplus for that year.

A year ago, the CBO's forecast for the 2007 fiscal year called for a deficit of $270 billion. In the annual outlook released last month, the 2007 gap is projected at $172 billion.

"Right now, we're in some sense in a relatively good spot," says Jim Horney, a budget analyst at the Center for Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal think tank in Washington. "We're in the sixth year of an economic expansion," a time when federal revenues often rise along with a growing economy.

But both the CBO and the White House make important assumptions that are far from assured.

The CBO's annual outlook assumes that President Bush's tax cuts phase out in 2010 as scheduled, thus adding new tax revenues.

Mr. Bush's budget calls for the tax cuts to be made permanent, but foresees a surplus in 2012 thanks to a sharp fall in Iraq spending and robust productivity growth in the economy.

DOJ_NMG_0134895

But several issues are unsettled. Among them: How much will military operations in Iraq and elsewhere cost? Will Congress make some of the Bush tax cuts permanent? Will Congress scale back the alternative minimum tax (AMT), which is poised to take a rising tax toll on middle-class Americans in the years ahead?

The answers will have a big impact on the budget, and may not be resolved before a new president takes office in 2009.

The long-term outlook remains sobering, all sides agree. The cost of Medicare, in particular, is slated to soar due to healthcare inflation and an aging population.

Even the near-term outlook comes with an asterisk. When Bush took office in 2001, the CBO was forecasting a decade of budget surpluses totaling more than $5 trillion. Then came a recession, the terrorist attacks of 9/11, and enormous wartime spending. The Bush tax cuts helped to stimulate the economy, but at the cost of lower tax revenue.

"We had three years where revenues went down," says Mr. Horney. "All that has happened is that we have ... caught up from the really bad decline that we had."

Still, analysts say the recent budget gains are good news for the government and the economy.

The budget deficit now stands at about 1.4 percent of the nation's GDP, well below the 2.3 percent that's been the norm since 1970, according to economist Michael Darda of MKM Partners in Greenwich, Conn. "At the current pace, the budget could move back into surplus as early as May 2008," Mr. Darda wrote in a report to clients last week.

That isn't a forecast, but it shows how the nation's fiscal health is closely related to that of the overall economy.

A more stable budget outlook, in turn, has benefits for the economy.

The less money the government has to borrow to pay its bills, the more is left for investment in new goods and services. Alternatively, the nation will be less reliant on foreign lenders to fund that investment – debt that siphons away a portion of national wealth.

"Unexpectedly strong revenue growth" has improved the outlook quite a bit, says Mr. McMullen.

In the CBO projections, for example, the nation's public debt is forecast to fall from 37 percent of GDP in 2006 to 30.5 percent of GDP in 2012.

In the longer run, the rise of entitlements such as Medicare could force difficult choices to keep that debt from rising again.

Conservatives say it will be vital to contain costs. "If nothing changes in Washington then both revenues and spending will be higher," says Chris Edwards, a tax expert at the libertarian Cato Institute in Washington. "It'll hammer the economy," he says, as government takes a larger share of GDP.

Others say the answer will probably involve tax hikes as well as some reductions in promised entitlement benefits – and that a modest increase in taxes need not damage economic growth.

Both sides agree on the need to tame medical inflation, if not on how to do it.

"If we were able to reduce the growth of the cost of healthcare," says Horney, "that would definitely be good for the economy."

Murtha Sees Security Threat In Trade Deal (HILL)

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.), a close ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), is calling elements of a Peru free-trade agreement (FTA) signed by the Bush administration a threat to national security. The chairman of the House Defense Appropriations subcommittee has warned Democratic leaders on trade that the deal grants a United Arab Emirates company the ability to invest in U.S. ports.

Murtha has asked Ways and Means Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) to demand that the administration alter the free-trade deal it negotiated with Peru to prevent enterprises there from investing in U.S. landside port activities.

If the administration fails to make such changes, Murtha and Rep. Gene Taylor (D-Miss.) charge that a “trade pact-granted right” to invest in U.S. ports would be handed to Dubai Ports World (DPW). The United Arab Emirates-based company last year found itself at the heart of a controversy when the administration gave it the go-ahead to operate several U.S. ports.

Murtha and Taylor argue that the issue is particularly sensitive with the pending Peru FTA because Dubai Ports World has acquired a 30-year concession to develop and operate a new container terminal just outside of Lima. The move makes DPW an enterprise in Peru that under the FTA would be able to make investments in the U.S., according to the congressmen.

Congress seemed set to approve legislation blocking

DPW’s ability to take over U.S. ports before the company voluntarily backed out of the deal. DPW last week completed its sale of U.S. ports.

Like other U.S. free-trade agreements, the one with Peru includes a provision allowing the U.S. to block investments if they are considered national-security threats. Murtha and Taylor, however, argue the provision is insufficient since Peru could in turn sue the U.S. under the deal's dispute-settlement system. A successful challenge could cost the U.S. millions in taxpayer dollars, the two congressmen say.

DOJ_NMG_0134896

Under the Peru FTA, a dispute could be brought either to a World Trade Organization panel, or to a tribunal set up under the Peru FTA that would consist of one U.S. national, a Peruvian national and a national from a third country.

"Members of Congress again will be asked to support these agreements relying on the hope that a foreign tribunal deigns to permit us to justify our violation of the agreements by accepting our claim of an Essential Security Exception," Murtha and Taylor wrote in a letter last month to Rangel and Rep. Sandy Levin (D-Mich.), the chairman of the Ways and Means Trade subcommittee.

"It is unconscionable to knowingly agree to any trade agreement that contains obligations that limit our national security authority regarding sensitive infrastructure such as our ports," the letter said.

A Ways and Means spokesman noted that Rangel and Levin raised the same questions during debate over the U.S.-Oman free-trade deal last summer, and said Rangel and Levin would stay in touch with Murtha and Taylor on the issue. A Levin spokeswoman went further and said Levin's view is that the landside port provision needs to be changed in the Peru deal.

So far this year, public discussions between House Democrats and the administration on the Peru FTA and a similar deal with Colombia have centered on labor provisions. For example, Rangel and Levin did not raise the ports issue with U.S. Trade Representative Susan Schwab during a hearing on trade policy last week.

The ports issue nearly sank the generally uncontroversial Oman deal. The Republican-controlled House approved the Oman FTA in a 221–205 vote, with only 22 Democrats voting in favor.

During the Oman debate, the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative argued that under the "essential security" provision in U.S. trade deals, nothing in a deal can prevent the country from applying measures it deems necessary for protecting essential security. USTR also emphasized that this essential-security exception is self-judging, meaning that the validity of the defense in a trade dispute before an international tribunal would be based on what the U.S. government considers necessary to protect essential security, rather than the conclusions of a tribunal.

"This is really a red herring," said USTR spokesman Sean Spicer, adding that USTR has worked to educate members about the essential-security provision since the Oman debate. USTR also has noted that those participating in landside port activities do not control, manage or operate a U.S. port. Landside port activities include operating and maintaining docks and loading and unloading vessels.

Rangel, Levin, then-Rep. and current Sen. Ben Cardin (D-Md.) and Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Calif.) last year asked the administration to clarify how this self-judging interpretation was consistent with trade deals the administration has pursued. They noted the essential-security exception could be challenged in dispute settlement under the Peru FTA, and that World Trade Organization panels have suggested they could interpret whether the use of this exception was valid.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Greg Pierce

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

About-face

Ohio Gov. Ted Strickland said he would welcome Iraqi refugees to Ohio, a change of course from comments the governor made last week. He said the earlier remarks were meant to express frustration with President Bush instead of the people displaced by the war.

The Democrat told the Associated Press last week he was not inclined to accommodate any refugees because doing so would help bail out the president.

"I am sympathetic to the plight of the innocent Iraqi people who have fled that country," he said. "However, I would not want to ask Ohioans to accept a greater burden than they already have borne for the Bush administration's failed policies."

On Monday, he said he had been attempting to express his frustration with the Bush administration and the Iraq war, which he opposed when he was serving in the U.S. House.

"It's one of those incidents out of many [when] I've said something inartfully and conveyed something that I did not wish to convey," said Mr. Strickland, who was elected Nov. 7 and sworn in last month. "I guess it means that when you're a governor, people seem to be interested in what you say, which is fine, but I think everything has a context."

Mr. Strickland's initial comments were in reaction to an administration plan to allow about 7,000 Iraqi refugees to settle in the United States over the next year.

Johnson's move

More than two months after suffering a brain hemorrhage, Sen. Tim Johnson, South Dakota Democrat, has left a Washington hospital and entered a private rehabilitation facility, his office said yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0134897

A spokeswoman refused to say whether the senator remained in Washington or was moved to a facility in South Dakota, citing family concerns about press scrutiny. "They just want him to focus on getting better and not worried about outside cameras snapping away," spokeswoman Julianne Fisher said.

Mr. Johnson's brain hemorrhage Dec. 13 and subsequent surgery highlighted his party's tenuous one-seat advantage in the Senate.

Mr. Johnson was rushed to George Washington University Hospital after becoming disoriented during a phone call with reporters and underwent emergency surgery hours later. He was diagnosed with arteriovenous malformation, a condition that causes arteries and veins to grow abnormally large, become tangled and sometimes burst.

Mr. Johnson will continue undergoing physical, occupational and speech therapy at the private facility. Dr. Philip Marion, the chief of rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, said the senator has made "great progress" and a final test showed no evidence the tangled arteries that triggered the senator's hemorrhage remain.

Mr. Johnson's office has said his recovery is expected to take several months, though he has been doing some work from his bed.

McCain's outreach

Republican presidential candidate Sen. John McCain is defending his outreach to conservative Christians, arguing that his effort is not political pandering to win the party's nomination.

The Arizona senator met privately Monday with religious broadcasters in Orlando, Fla., then answered questions about his appeal to conservatives in Vero Beach.

In the 2000 campaign, Mr. McCain angered the party's right by calling evangelist leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance." Last spring, he spoke at Mr. Falwell's Liberty University, although hard feelings still linger among some conservatives. Focus on the Family founder James Dobson has said he won't support Mr. McCain.

"Nobody accused me of courting and pandering to the liberals when I went to the New School," Mr. McCain told the crowd, a reference to the New York City school. "What I have found out in my life, is that every time I have done something for political reasons and not the right reasons, I have paid a very heavy price for it -- a big price."

Mr. McCain said he is trying to reach out to all elements of the party.

"I don't know which part of the party is going to be more influential or not," he said. "I've tried always in my political career to have a big-tent party, where a lot of people are welcome with differing views."

Backing Rumsfeld

The White House yesterday defended Donald H. Rumsfeld after criticism from Republican Sen. John McCain that he was one of the worst defense secretaries in history for his handling of the Iraq war.

Mr. McCain, one of President Bush's key allies in Congress on Iraq, is running for president.

"I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history," the Arizona senator and Vietnam War veteran said on the campaign trail in South Carolina on Monday.

The White House backed Mr. Rumsfeld, but was careful not to criticize Mr. McCain in doing so.

"We think Donald Rumsfeld was an enormously consequential and effective secretary of defense and somebody who led to the transformation of the Department of Defense. Senator McCain holds a different point of view," White House spokesman Tony Snow said.

A day after Republicans lost control of Congress in elections in November in large part owing to concerns about the Iraq war, Mr. Bush accepted Mr. Rumsfeld's resignation and replaced him with Robert M. Gates.

"The thing that's important to us right now is that Senator McCain is a strong supporter of the president's position on the way forward in Iraq and somebody who has been an eloquent voice and a reliable leader on the issue. And we appreciate it," Mr. Snow said.

Asked if Mr. McCain's comments should be chalked up to election politics, Mr. Snow replied: "I left the chalk at home."

Mitt's introduction

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney this week will air his first presidential campaign ad to introduce himself to voters in several early-voting states, the Associated Press reports.

The 60-second spot describes the Republican candidate as a "business legend" who "rescued the Olympics" and "turned around a Democratic state."

Mr. Romney himself adds: "This is not a time for more talk and dithering in Washington. It's a time for action."

The ad is set to air starting today. It will rotate between Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina, Michigan and Florida.

It is the first ad by a top-tier contender in a campaign analysts think will cost more than $1 billion by the time it ends in November 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0134898

A fellow Republican, Rep. Duncan Hunter of California, staging a long-shot bid for the presidency, aired the first ad of either major party in December with a limited buy in South Carolina, North Carolina and South Dakota.

Greg Pierce can be reached at 202/636-3285 or gpierce@washingtontimes.com.

VA Regains Access To Medical Records (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

The Defense Department is once again permitting Department of Veterans Affairs doctors to get full medical records they say they need to treat severely injured troops arriving at VA hospitals from Iraq and Afghanistan.

Pentagon officials cut off VA's access on Jan. 23, concluding that privacy concerns and federal regulations barred the department from using the military's Joint Patient Tracking Application system without a formal data-sharing agreement.

VA physicians, who handle troops with brain and other serious injuries at four trauma centers, strongly protested the cutoff, saying that they rely on the tracking system to help them determine the best treatment for the wounded.

Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee, and ranking Republican Larry E. Craig (Idaho) wrote Undersecretary of Defense for Personnel David S.C. Chu on Feb. 6 that they were "deep[ly] concerned" the VA doctors had been cut off.

The Pentagon on Thursday declined to comment on the situation when we called, and the senators had received no response.

On Friday, VA officials notified the senators that access to the tracking system had been restored. Akaka and Craig said they were pleased the problem had been resolved. So, most likely, is everyone else.GOP Supporter Faces Terrorism Charges

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) said yesterday that it will donate to charity the $15,000 it received in recent years from Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari if Alishtari is convicted of assisting terrorists.

Alishtari, a.k.a. Michael Mixon, pleaded not guilty in federal court in Manhattan on Friday to charges of terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering, among other things.

Alishtari, on a Web rÃ©sumÃ© he apparently posted this year, says he was named to the NRCC's "White House Business Advisory Committee" and was named the NRCC's New York state businessman of the year in 2002 and 2003.

He was indicted in a plan to send $152,000 to Pakistan and Afghanistan to support a terrorist training camp, the Associated Press reported. And he was accused of funneling $25,000 from a bank account in New York to an account in Montreal, allegedly to support terrorists.

"We are extremely concerned and disturbed by these charges," NRCC communications director Jessica Boulanger said in a statement -- or understatement -- "but we need to be careful not to rush to judgment as the judicial process moves forward." He's a businessman in New York, after all, not some guy in Guantanamo. "If the individual in question is found guilty of a crime," Boulanger said, "it is our intent to donate the money to charity."

In most cases, political contributions from controversial sources are often returned to donors, but obviously it wouldn't do to return the money to someone charged with helping fund terrorists. Never know where the money might end up.Author, Author!

Seems Robert Andrews, deputy undersecretary of defense for counterintelligence, former Green Beret and former CIA officer, has his own after-hours job. Andrews, it turns out, is a novelist and, we're reliably informed, an excellent one.

None other than publisher Otto Penzler, owner of the Mysterious Bookshop in Manhattan and the first and last word on American mystery books, last week notified Andrews that his short story "Solomon's Alley" had been picked for inclusion in the 11th volume of Houghton Mifflin's Best American Mystery Stories 2007, to be published in October.

Penzler says he picked about 50 stories from around 1,500 submitted. All were published in 2006. Then Miami Herald columnist Carl Hiaasen, mega-best-selling author of some of the funniest novels ever written, selected the final 20.

Andrews is the author of four novels dealing with the spy business and three detective mystery stories set in the District. One involves the murder of a Washington Post diplomatic reporter.Will Bolton Tell All?

Speaking of authors, John Bolton's tell-all book on his days at the State Department and as ambassador to the United Nations could be coming out as early as the end of this year.

All right, maybe not a classic "tell-all" -- perhaps just a "tell-some" -- but top folks in Foggy Bottom and at the United Nations are most surely not going to be happy when this one comes out. The buzz is that it's going to focus mostly on Bolton's work at the United Nations, where he's said to be still upset at his inability to lop off 10 of the building's 38 floors that he had said were expendable. The book is likely to rank the floors in order of those most expendable.

Unclear how Bolton will treat his most recent bosses, Colin Powell and Condoleezza Rice. His view of Rice may have altered a bit after last week's agreement with North Korea on its nuclear program, an agreement Bolton and other conservatives have criticized as "a bad deal." There are others at State sure to come in for their share of abuse.

DOJ_NMG_0134899

No working title yet and no publisher, although several have expressed interest. But if this is to come out before Christmas, he'd better get typing.

Johnson Update (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

More than two months after suffering a brain hemorrhage, Sen. Tim Johnson (D-S.D.) has left a Washington hospital and entered a private rehabilitation facility, his office said yesterday.

A spokeswoman refused to say whether the senator remained in Washington or was moved to a facility in South Dakota, citing family concerns about media scrutiny.

The Democrat's Dec. 13 brain hemorrhage and subsequent surgery highlighted his party's tenuous one-seat advantage in the Senate.

Johnson will continue to undergo physical, occupational and speech therapy at the private facility. Philip Marion, chief of rehabilitation at George Washington University Hospital, where Johnson had been treated, said in a statement released by Johnson's office that the senator has made "great progress" and that a final test showed no evidence that the tangle of veins and arteries that triggered the senator's hemorrhage remains.

Johnson's office has said his recovery is expected to take several months, though he has been doing some work from his bed.

More And More, Retirees Are Finding That It Pays To Have Worked For The Government Instead Of The Private Sector (USAT)

By Dennis Cauchon

USA Today, February 21, 2007

Johnnie Nichols, a civilian Defense Department employee, contributes to a federal pension that will let him retire at age 56, after 32 years of service.

His wife, Kimberly, a math teacher at a private business college, has no pension after two decades of teaching and running a horse farm. Their marriage reflects the new world of retirement: government employees who have secure benefits and private workers who increasingly are on their own.

"If we were both in her shoes, we'd be in a world of hurt," says Nichols, 45, an information technology manager in Middletown, Ind. "We wouldn't be able to retire until age 67."

As the first wave of 79 million baby boomers heads to retirement, the nation is dividing into two classes of workers: those who have government benefits and those who don't. The gap is accelerating in every way: pensions, medical benefits, retirement ages.

Retired government workers are twice as likely to get a pension as their counterparts in the private sector, and the typical benefit is far more generous. The nation's 6 million retired civil servants — teachers, police, administrators, laborers — received a median benefit of $17,640 in 2005, according to the Congressional Research Service. Eleven million private-sector retirees covered by traditional pensions got $7,692.

Governments' generosity could have serious consequences for taxpayers and pensioners. Some states — including Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, New Jersey, Ohio and West Virginia — have troubled retirement systems that may require huge tax increases, spending cuts or even defaulting on promised benefits. The U.S. government has a bigger unfunded liability for military and civil servant retirement benefits ($4.7 trillion) than it does for Social Security ($4.6 trillion).

The pension gap will continue to widen because governments pump far more money into employee pensions than companies do. Civil servants earn an average of $12.38 an hour in benefits, about $5 an hour more than private-sector workers, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The difference was just $2.70 an hour in 1995.

Pension promises have "gotten out of hand," says Peter Hanson, 73, chairman of NAI James E. Hanson Inc., a real estate firm in Hackensack, N.J. His firm offers a healthy private pension — up to 25% of compensation, given to employee retirement accounts — but it is tied to profits and given as a lump sum, not a lifetime promise of benefits.

Supporters of government pensions say the decline in private pensions is the problem, not the generosity of public retirement plans. "Rather than lower the bar for public employees, we need to stabilize retirement programs for everyone," says Richard Ferlauto, director of pension and benefit policy for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, a union with 1.4 million members.

He acknowledges public pensions are getting more scrutiny. "People want to know, 'Why should you have more security than us?' " he says. "It's pension envy."

DOJ_NMG_0134900

State and local governments have sweetened retirement benefits during the past decade at a time when corporations have soured on them because of their cost. Only 18% of private workers now have traditional defined benefit pension plans, compared with more than 80% of government employees.

Contrary to a widely held notion, the extra government benefits aren't compensation for lower pay. Most government workers are paid more than private employees in similar jobs, and the wage gap is growing.

A typical full-time state or local government worker made $78,853 in wages and benefits in the third quarter of 2006, $25,771 more than a typical private-sector worker, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reports. The difference was $7,604 in 2000. The compensation advantage holds true for all types of public workers, from teachers to laborers and managers. Better benefits for government workers is the biggest reason for the growing compensation gap.

"The government is in direct competition with us for employees. It's hard to compete against these benefit packages," says James Bellis, owner of Tree Tech, a 120-worker tree trimming company in Randolph, N.J. His company has a 401(k) plan that matches up to 2% of employee pay.

By comparison, tree trimmers working for a government in New Jersey would get a pension benefit worth more than three times that.

Superior retirement benefits for civil servants can be traced to the establishment of Social Security, which originally did not cover government employees, says E.J. McMahon, a pension expert at the Manhattan Institute, a conservative think tank that deals with economic policy. Today, three-fourths of government workers participate in Social Security, but their overall benefits have not been reduced accordingly, he says.

The boost in benefits since the 1960s reflects the rising power of public employee unions, which have thrived as industrial labor unions and the benefits they won have eroded, he says.

The growing benefit gap makes government an increasingly attractive employer.

Anneliese Crosby, 46, who codes medical records at a private hospital in Manchester, N.H., is trying to get a government job for financial reasons — better pay, benefits and job security. The hospital recently ended its pension plan for new employees. That didn't affect Crosby, but her retirement depends mostly on contributions to her tax-deferred retirement account.

"It's scary. I feel like I need a second job or to be on the lookout for a new job," she says. "I should put more in my retirement account, but I can't afford it."

Her solution: Apply for a similar job at a Veterans Affairs hospital. She'd get a pay raise, better benefits and a secure future. "My ex-husband keeps encouraging me to get a government job, and he's right about that," she says.

Pensions for civil servants often are superior to private pensions in subtle ways that make a huge financial difference. For example, government pensions:

·Generally base benefits on a worker's top three earning years. Private pensions typically base benefits on the top five years of pay, which lowers the average.

·Often let retirees add the value of overtime, unused leave and other benefits into the pension formula. The results can be extreme. Dover, N.H., Police Chief William Fenniman, 46, added more than $200,000 for severance, sick leave and other payouts into his three-year salary average when he retired in January. This will boost his retirement benefit to as much as $125,000 a year, more than he made as chief.

·Permit early retirement at age 50 or 55 with less of a benefit reduction than private pensions.

·Provide free or subsidized medical care for retirees under age 65 and supplemental coverage after that for those on Medicare.

·More often provide automatic cost-of-living increases to benefits.

Baby boomer retirements will force governments to confront the rising costs of civil servant benefits. The U.S. government's unfunded retirement obligation grew $200 billion last year to $4.7 trillion. That's the amount the government would need today, set aside and earning investment returns, to pay for promised retirement benefits.

Before 1984, federal workers had a defined benefit plan and no Social Security. Today, new employees have Social Security and a pension that is part defined benefit plan (lifetime monthly payments) and part defined contribution (a lump sum at retirement).

The pension is more generous than most private pensions, but workers have to pay more to take advantage of the plan. "You have to be aggressive about making contributions if you want a good retirement," says Nichols, the Defense Department employee.

Unlike private pensions, though, the federal system still encourages early retirement. "The sweet spot for me is about age 56. When I run the numbers, the system almost forces me to retire" early, Nichols says. For example, he expects to qualify for a free supplemental annuity at age 56 that provides a benefit equal to what he'd get at age 62 under Social Security.

DOJ_NMG_0134901

Another big incentive to retire early: Most governments offer health insurance to early retirees until they qualify for Medicare at 65. Massachusetts spent $377 million on retiree medical benefits last year. The state's unfunded liability for such costs is $13.3 billion, nearly as much as its actual debt of $18.5 billion, which is counted separately.

"It's a burden on taxpayers, of course," says Delores Mitchell, executive director of the Massachusetts Group Insurance Commission, which runs the program. But she doesn't foresee major benefit cuts. "States have a tradition of treating retirees well."

Medical insurance may be the most vulnerable benefit because it has fewer legal protections than pensions, which often are guaranteed in state constitutions. Orange County, Calif., recently slashed promised retiree medical benefits, cutting its liability from $1.4 billion to $600 million. The county hasn't done anything about its pension problem.

"Pension benefits are like a lobster trap. You can get in, but you can't get out," says John Moorlach, an Orange County supervisor who has tried to reduce retirement benefits for government workers.

He blames elected officials for awarding unsustainable retirement benefits to win support from employee unions. "Elected officials love to give generous retirement benefits because they don't cost anything today and they'll be out of office when the payments come due," Moorlach says. "And the public? Eyes droop with boredom when you bring up the topic."

The financial soundness of civil servant pensions varies across the country. Government pensions are, on average, in a similar condition as private pensions — about 20% below the assets needed to be properly funded. But some states, especially in the industrial Midwest, have severely troubled pensions.

"The taxes needed to pay for these promises would push many of these states' economies into a death spiral," Chicago bankruptcy lawyer James Spiotto says.

He says public employee unions should not overestimate legal protections for pension benefits. Localities can shed their obligations in a bankruptcy filing, and states, as sovereign governments, can ignore the requirements, he says. "Unions can win all the litigation and still lose because the judgments can't be enforced," Spiotto says.

Tim Lee, executive director of the Texas Retired Teachers Association, says unions understand the cost of the retirement benefits. He says his association's top goal is improving the financial health of the pension fund, not winning new benefits.

As expensive as government pensions are to taxpayers, civil servants don't feel the benefits make them rich. Frank Caron, 49, maintains lab equipment at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. He makes about $40,000 a year.

He has contributed heavily to his pension, including an extra $74 a week to restore pension credit for earlier government jobs. That will let him retire:

·At 55 with 47% of pay;

·At 60 with 72% of pay;

·Or at 65 with 103% of pay.

He also will have medical benefits and be eligible for Social Security at 62. "I've worked hard to have my ducks lined up in a row for retirement," he says.

FEDERAL DIARY: Thrift Savings Plan Hopes To Engage No-Shows (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 21, 2007

For lack of a better phrase, we'll call them the TSP No-Shows.

Some members of the Thrift Savings Plan rarely or never check to see how much money is in their retirement accounts. Others have seemingly vanished because their mail is returned to the TSP as undeliverable.

To some extent, the problem of dropouts in a large organization should not be surprising. The TSP, the 401(k)-type program for government workers, has more than 3.7 million members around the world. With more than $210 billion in assets, it is one of the nation's largest retirement programs.

But the no-shows have emerged as a concern at the TSP, in part because of what the staff at the Federal Retirement Thrift Investment Board, which oversees the TSP, learned from a recent survey.

The survey found that about 16 percent of TSP members rarely or never review their retirement accounts. What was of more concern was the response from those who have most at stake in the TSP -- employees covered by the newer Federal Employees Retirement System -- because TSP savings will be a larger share of their retirement income. Of that group, 18 percent said they almost never or never look at their accounts.

The TSP also stumbled onto another problem while conducting the survey. Almost 10 percent of the questionnaires were returned to the TSP as undeliverable, suggesting that the retirement program has a similar percentage of incorrect addresses in its records.

DOJ_NMG_0134902

To reach out to the no-shows, the TSP staff yesterday proposed sending an annual account statement to all 3.7 million plan participants. The cost of producing, printing and mailing the yearly statements would be $2.2 million to $2.6 million, based on preliminary estimates, said Gregory T. Long, TSP's director of product development.

The TSP provides quarterly account statements to participants through the plan's Web site. Paper statements are sent to participants who ask for them, and about 367,000 signed up to get statements in the mail.

The TSP shifted quarterly statements to the Web in 2003, and the effort has been successful, by and large. About 83 percent of respondents in the TSP survey said they were satisfied with their ability to get account information on the Internet. The elimination of quarterly paper statements saved the TSP more than $7 million last year.

Still, Long said yesterday, the TSP needs to take another look at the paperless policy in light of concerns about delivery of benefits, account security, participant education and notification requirements under the recently enacted Pension Protection Act.

A memo provided to the board by Long and Veronica Mance, a TSP benefits analyst, said participants who do not use the TSP Web site or receive paper statements may be unaware of their account balances, "resulting in poor retirement planning."

Those "disengaged participants" also may leave unpaid benefits in the plan or allow fraudulent activity on their accounts to go undetected, the memo said.

The board, chaired by Andrew M. Saul, gave Long a green light to design a single-page, doubled-sided document that would summarize account activity annually. Long said he hopes to have a firm cost estimate and proposal ready for board approval by spring.TSP's International Chase

Not all TSP participants are disengaged.

Last month, the TSP handled trades worth more than $1 billion in its international stock index fund, as participants tried to maximize their returns. The participants also ran up $523,123 in trading costs, far more than the costs incurred by the large and small-cap U.S. stock funds, Tracey A. Ray, the TSP chief investment officer, reported to the board.

The trading costs for the I Fund are high because the Australia and Asian stock markets close before the fund manager, Barclays Global Investors, receives the TSP buy-and-sell orders for the day. The trades are executed the following morning and in times of greater volatility, as was the case last month, the time lag can be costly.Take That, Jack!

Jack Bauer, the government's superagent on Fox's "24," leads a tortured life. But his TV dad, the evil Phillip Bauer, really knows how to hurt his son. In Monday's installment, the dad says to Jack:

"You know, none of this would have happened if you hadn't turned your back on me. So that you could become -- what? -- a civil servant."

Yipes!

Helen Thomas Moving Back After 46 Years Down Front (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 21, 2007

Every theater-style seat in the White House briefing room, now closed for renovation, had a brass plaque inscribed with the name of a news organization. Only one, in the middle of the front row, had a name: “HELEN THOMAS,” it said. The unique assigned seat between the chairs for CBS News and ABC News was reserved for the legendary United Press International correspondent who is now a columnist for Hearst Newspapers.

The press corps is scheduled to move from temporary facilities back into the spiffed-up, rewired briefing room in May or June. Thomas, who has been questioning presidents and press secretaries for 46 years, plans to be there. But her front-row seat won’t be. Plans call for her to be moved to the second row to make room for a cable news channel – a sign of Washington’s changing pecking order, and of the new ways that Americans get their news.

“I didn’t think I had a monopoly on that seat,” Thomas, 86, said in a telephone interview. “Since my peers have decided that I don’t belong there, I’ll bow to their – I’ll drink the – What did Socrates drink?”

Hemlock?

“I’ll drink it,” she said. “You have to submit to the will of the people, and apparently this is the will of my peers. It’s OK with me. I’ve had a good run in the front seat.”

Thomas has been at the front of the class ever since scribes just pulled their chairs up around the press secretary. Now, the assigned seats are coveted real estate – both as a sign of status and because the closer you sit to the front, the better your chance of getting called on – whether the person giving the briefing is Tony Snow or the president himself.

Thomas usually comes to the press secretary’s morning “gaggle” but does not always attend the afternoon briefing, so sometimes her seat is empty. It’s the only seat that traditionally is left vacant if unoccupied. Every other chair gets filled in by those without regular seats, whose questions do not always live up to Thomas’s zingers.

DOJ_NMG_0134903

Thomas has retained her edge over the years and asks blunt, argumentative questions, often sympathetic to Palestine. Nevertheless, press secretary Tony Snow treats her with deference. One day, he mysteriously said from the podium that he wanted to see her afterward. It turned out he wanted her to sign one of her books.

Asked in December if President Bush had factored in "how many people will die" in forming his Iraq strategy, Snow replied patiently, "Helen, you ask that question every day."

"It's a very valid question," she said. Snow said: "It's a question he thinks about every day."

The old briefing room had eight rows of six seats across. The new one will have seven rows of seven seats, so the departure of Thomas would mean two more front-row spots. Both CNN and Fox have expressed interested in moving up from the second row. Thomas will move back. "Her special place in history is secure," said one of the correspondents involved in the decision. "Only one columnist in all the United States has a seat in the briefing room. Helen. She still will."

The Politico's Anne Schroeder first wrote about the possibility of a move for Thomas in her "Shenanigans" column, and now the details appear to be worked out. Steve Scully, president of the White House Correspondents Association, which traditionally decides the seating arrangement, said Thomas was "very gracious" when he approached her about the possible change.

"The wires and three networks have had a front-row seat dating back to the Nixon administration, when the West Wing briefing room opened," explained Scully, who is C-SPAN's senior executive producer and political editor. "When discussions began two years ago about redesigning the briefing room, both Fox and CNN expressed an interest in having a front-row seat. Among the criteria for seating arrangements are the size of the news organization a reporter represents and the frequency with which they attend the briefings. Helen Thomas remains the dean of the White House press corps, and we will make certain her needs are met. She has been terrific in understanding our situation." A final decision will be made by the group's board within a month.

The cover of Thomas's latest book -- "Watchdogs of Democracy?" -- shows the rows of briefing-room seats with whimsical Post-It Notes labeled with the names of news organizations. She says in the book that she has retained her chair by dint of seniority. Asked in the interview if she'll still come in to occupy a second-row seat, she replied: "Of course."

Thomas left the ailing UPI and became a columnist for Hearst in July 2000. She started covering the White House on Jan. 20, 1961 – the inauguration of JFK. At the time, the press was crammed into what she calls "Kissinger's old office," now the National Security Affairs Office. "A very tight little island, long before the advent of regular television and radio," she recalled. About 10 people hung out there. She became UPI's White House bureau chief in 1974 and held that title until she moved to Hearst, where she writes columns, such as one titled "Cheney the Irrelevant."

She is deeply disillusioned by the state of press-presidential relations. "I think we have a public trust, and I think we have fallen down on the job," she said. "The newest crop of journalists don't do their job. For one thing, they're being blocked. I think they came out of their coma on Katrina. But the questions that should have been asked have not been asked and time has passed us by."

I pointed out that there is a school of thought that questions are worth asking even if the president won't answer them. "At least the public'll know you're doing your job," she said. "Questions should be out there, because the American people have seen us become so compliant and complicit. You were there for the run-up to the war. Where were the questions? Who asked why, what, what do you mean? We drop bombs and we accuse the enemy of meddling? We attack a country that did nothing on us? We dropped bombs on innocent people and started this war. You were there. Nobody said why." When she paused and I filled the silence with "fascinating," she continued: "It isn't fascinating. It's rid– it's, it's sad."

As for how she thinks the next White House will handle the press, she said, "I think reporters should pin down the candidates and get them to almost sign on a dotted line that they're going to give regular news conferences. It's the only institution in our society where a president can be questioned on a regular basis. If he's not questioned, he can operate solo, as a dictator."

Earlier this month, Thomas received a Lifetime Achievement Award at the black-tie congressional dinner of the Washington Press Club Foundation. In 1974, The New York Times printed her byline over her exclusive year-end interview with President Gerald Ford, who was already arguing that President Richard Nixon's acceptance of the pardon amounted to a confession to his role in Watergate. In 1973, interviews by Thomas with Martha Mitchell, wife of Attorney General John Mitchell, helped expose Watergate. On Aug. 26, 1973, Thomas quoted Martha Mitchell as saying she had seen a Nixon campaign strategy book that included plans for Watergate-style operations, according to UPI's Web site.

Asked about White House stories she's proud of, Thomas said: "One was Martha Mitchell, calling for Nixon's resignation. And I think the whole Nixon era: We all were picking up things. I mean, we didn't get the big exclusive on Watergate. But we were writing stories. I've covered history every day since I've covered the White House, and that's how I view it. I was not in Dallas, but my boss was. He won the Pulitzer. He was in the third car. I can't recall. I do know that I was the only woman print journalist to go to China in '72 with President Nixon, and wrote many firsthand stories about China. You don't need my biography."

DOJ_NMG_0134904

Thomas was famous for her brisk "Thank you, Mr. President" – the now-defunct signal to end a news conference by the senior wire service reporter. UPI's Merriman Smith started the tradition when he covered Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Now, the president just stops when he wants to.

That Sinking Feeling (NYT)

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

How do you know when it's time to improve the country's roads and bridges, the water systems and power grids that the United States relies upon? There have been plenty of warning signs: spiking traffic congestion and spectacular blackouts. But at what point does the issue move from the province of anxious engineers to an outright national priority?

When sinkholes start swallowing repair trucks, it's a pretty good bet that it's time to pay attention. As William Yardley reported recently in The Times, the country's water and sewer lines, many of them a century old, are in terrible shape, leading to those collapsing roads. And the Army Corps of Engineers reported earlier this month that more than 120 levees around the country could fail in a major flood. New Orleans needs to remain an exception, rather than a sad model for the future.

According to the federal Environmental Protection Agency, just fixing the nation's aging wastewater infrastructure will cost as much as $390 billion. A report to be released next month by the consulting firm Booz Allen Hamilton notes that a successful business environment also demands more reliable energy, water and transportation systems. The report cites a Transportation Department finding that freight bottlenecks — with planes circling at overcrowded airports and cargo stacked up at overcapacity ports — are costing the United States economy $200 billion annually.

That means that America's ability to compete isn't just a matter of being inventive and having a good work ethic, but also depends on the ability to deliver products reliably and on time. The first president with a master's degree in business administration — hint, he's the current Oval Office occupant — should convene a task force of federal, state and local officials to address the growing problem.

If a company kept its factories in the condition that America keeps its infrastructure, you'd expect it to lose business.

Making Amends (WP)

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

WHEN ASKED yesterday on NBC's "Today Show" about his views on a federal passenger bill of rights, JetBlue chief executive and founder David Neeleman said, "Why should Congress tell us how to treat our people? We should be able to do that." In a perfect world that would be true. But recent events, including last week's JetBlue debacle, raise doubts.

The renewed push for a passenger bill of rights gained traction in the Valentine's Day ice storm, when nine fully loaded JetBlue aircraft sat on the tarmac at John F. Kennedy airport in New York, some frozen to the ground, for six to 10 hours. In addition to the hundreds who were held hostage on stifling planes that ran out of food and water, hundreds more were stranded as JetBlue's operations ground to a halt.

The seven-year-old carrier wasn't alone in wreaking havoc on travelers that day. But because JetBlue has been heralded for its customer service, it has borne the brunt of criticism. That explains why Mr. Neeleman has been pleading for public forgiveness and instituting his own "Customer Bill of Rights," which includes compensation for canceled and delayed flights, payments to those who are bumped, and the option to get off the plane after five hours.

Meanwhile, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) introduced a passengers' bill of rights on Saturday and Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) plans to do the same next week. Both bills require airlines to allow travelers to get off planes after three hours of delay. That's more reasonable than what JetBlue is offering. And Mr. Thompson's bill goes a step further to mandate frequent updates on the cause and timing of delays.

Kate Hanni, who founded the Coalition for an Airline Passengers' Bill of Rights after being trapped in Austin on an American Airlines jet with no food, water or access to a bathroom for eight hours in December, wants a mandated 150 percent refund for passengers who are bumped or whose flights are canceled or postponed. The congressional bills wisely avoid saddling the very competitive and not-very-profitable airline industry with potentially crippling penalties. Neither should the government be micromanaging airline customer service. But setting minimal standards of decency seems like a fair approach.

OTHER NEWS:

Blue Chips Hit Another High, Aided By Wal-Mart, Oil's Fall (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0134905

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Solid earnings at Wal-Mart Stores and a drop in oil prices outweighed weak results at Home Depot, sending the Dow Jones Industrial Average to another record.

The blue-chip average gained 19.07 points, or 0.1%, to end at 12786.64, up 2.6% on the year. Wal-Mart, a Dow component, rose 3.7% after the retail giant announced fourth-quarter profits that beat Wall Street's expectations. Home Depot posted its first full-year decline in earnings, but the results were largely in line with analysts' estimates. Shares fell slightly, off 0.2%.

Other market measures posted their highest closes in more than six years. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index edged up 0.3%, or 4.14 points, to 1459.68, up 2.9% on the year.

The technology-stock-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite Index added 0.7%, or 16.73 points, to 2513.04, up 4% on the year.

For the second time in a week, the Dow Jones Utility Average and the Dow Jones Transportation Average hit records on the same day as the Dow industrials, another sign of the broad market gains.

In early trading, stocks hovered in the red. But a steep selloff in the oil market put stock investors in a better mood, since lower energy costs often free up money for consumers to spend on U.S. goods and services.

Warmer weather in the Northeast and statements by Iran's foreign minister calling for more talks regarding his country's controversial nuclear program prompted the decline in oil prices. Crude futures for March delivery plunged $1.32, or 2.2%, to $58.07 a barrel, down 4.9% on the year at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

Analysts expect sharp criticism of Iran's nuclear program in a United Nations report due out today. But in large part, the market has factored in the likelihood of such criticism.

That left room for traders to interpret the foreign minister's remarks as a glimmer of hope, said energy analyst John Kilduff, of brokerage Fimat USA.

"We're definitely seeing some of the geopolitical fears come out of the oil price right now," said Mr. Kilduff.

In recent days, the market also has dealt with jitters over possible disruption of Nigerian supply due to political violence.

Another Dow component, Hewlett-Packard, reported earnings after the market close, beating analysts' estimates with a 26% rise in profits for its fiscal first quarter. In after-hours trading, the stock fell 38 cents, or nearly 1%, to $42.75 a share.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose1. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.34 billion shares, as 1,809 stocks rose and 1,504 fell.

Bond prices advanced2. The 10-year note added 3/32 point, or 93.80 cents per $1,000 invested, pushing the yield down to 4.680%.

The dollar strengthened3. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar rose to 119.99 yen, compared with 119.53 yen. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.3139, compared with $1.3156.

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com4

U.S. Stock Indexes Celebrate Milestones (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK — Another bad memory from the stock market plunge earlier this decade was wiped clean Tuesday from investors' minds.

The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 stock index, the broadest gauge of the U.S. equity market, hit an all-time high Tuesday, finally erasing all of its 50.2% loss suffered in the 2000-02 bear market.

The index rose 62.89 points, or 0.4%, to 14,796.54, eclipsing its former high of 14,751.64 set on March 24, 2000, at the peak of the last big bull market on Wall Street. The market capitalization of the U.S. stock market now stands at a record $18.5 trillion, Wilshire Associates says.

While the Wilshire 5000 is not as well known as the iconic Dow Jones industrial average, it is an important index because, given that it includes 4,924 components, it acts as a barometer of the broad stock market's health.

Since hitting its bear-market low on Oct. 9, 2002, the index has earned back $9 trillion in market capitalization, restoring much of the lost wealth suffered by diversified investors who did not invest most of their money in the much-harder-hit technology stocks that reside in the Nasdaq composite. The Nasdaq is still 50.2% off its all-time high.

DOJ_NMG_0134906

The Wilshire milestone came amid more records on Wall Street. The Dow Jones industrial average rallied to its 32nd record close since October, gaining 19.07 points to finish at 12,786.64. The small-cap Russell 2000 also hit a record, closing up 7.96 points to 826.11.

Despite posting gains, both the Nasdaq and Standard & Poor's 500 remained the two most conspicuous major U.S. stock indexes that still are below their 2000 record highs. The S&P 500 gained 4.14 points to 1459.68, leaving it 4.4% shy of its record. The Nasdaq gained 16.73 points to 2513.04.

A drop in oil futures and a flurry of merger deals, including one between Sirius Satellite Radio and XM Satellite Radio, gave the market a boost. Sirius shares rose 6% to $3.92, while XM jumped 10.2% to $15.41. (Q&A, 6B.)

Highlights:

Shares of Wal-Mart Stores gained $1.78, or 3.7%, to $50.26, its biggest percentage gain in nearly four months after the world's No. 1 retailer reported better-than-expected earnings. (Retailers' earnings, 2B.)

·Home Depot, the world's largest home-improvement retailer, reported a 28% drop in quarterly profit. Shares dipped 10 cents, or 0.2%, to $41.34.

Falling Oil Prices Help Push Dow To Another Record Close (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 20 -- Wall Street managed a moderate advance in an uneven session Tuesday after a drop in oil prices and encouraging comments from a Federal Reserve official allowed investors to shrug off disappointment over declining sales at Home Depot.

The Dow rose 19.07, or 0.15 percent, to 12,786.64, after falling more than 60 points earlier. The Dow ended the day at its 31st record close since early October and its biggest five-day rally since mid-November. The Dow also reached a new trading high, 12,795.93.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 4.14, or 0.28 percent, to 1459.68. The Nasdaq composite index rose 16.73, or 0.67 percent, to 2513.04.

Home Depot said sales at stores open at least a year dropped in the fourth quarter, suggesting that consumers were buying fewer home-improvement goods because of a sluggish housing market. Shares fell 10 cents, to $41.34.

The company's results sent the market down in early trading, but comments from outgoing Fed Governor Susan Bies, who said slumping demand for housing may have bottomed out, alleviated some concerns about the downturn dragging down the rest of the economy. Her remarks echoed those of Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who last week predicted that the economy will keep growing at a modest pace.

Oil prices, which fell $1.32, to $58.07 a barrel, on forecasts of warmer weather, also lent support to stocks. The decline in crude prices gave some investors reason to buy back into the market, as lower fuel costs curb consumer prices, which could help boost spending and reduce the chance of an interest rate increase.Movers

W al-Mart rose $1.80, to $50.28, after reporting fourth-quarter profit growth of 9.8 percent, which beat analyst estimates.

New River Pharmaceuticals rose $4.84, to $63.19. Shire, a British pharmaceutical firm, plans to buy New River for about $2.6 billion.

Hewlett-Packard rose 36 cents, to $43.13. The computer maker said holiday sales drove its profit up in the latest quarter by 26 percent.

Fed Buzz Advances Market (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- Wall Street managed a moderate advance in an uneven session yesterday after a drop in oil prices and encouraging comments from a Federal Reserve official allowed investors to shrug off disappointment over Home Depot Inc.'s declining sales. The Dow Jones Industrial Average set another closing high.

Home Depot said sales at stores open more than a year dropped in the fourth quarter, suggesting that consumers' appetite for home improvement goods is still dwindling because of the sluggish housing market.

The company's results sent the market down in early trading, but comments from outgoing Fed Governor Susan Bies, who said slumping demand for housing may have bottomed out, alleviated some concern about the downturn dragging down the rest of the economy. Her remarks echoed those of Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke, who last week predicted the economy would keep growing at a modest pace.

DOJ_NMG_0134907

"The overall trend of the market is basically positive," said Brian Gendreau, investment strategist for ING Investment Management, pointing to Mr. Bernanke's recent forecast of moderating growth and cooling inflation. "That's a great environment for equities. Unless you have some specifically nasty news, there's no reason why the trend shouldn't be upward."

Falling oil prices, which tumbled $1.32 to $58.07 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on forecasts of warmer weather, also lent some support to stocks.

The Dow rose 19.07, or 0.15 percent, to 12,786.64, after falling more than 60 points earlier. Yesterday's climb brought the index to its 31st record close since early October, and its biggest five-day rally since mid-November. The Dow also reached a new trading high of 12,795.93, just short of 12,800.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index rose 4.14, or 0.28 percent, to 1,459.68, and the Nasdaq Composite Index climbed 16.73, or 0.67 percent, to 2,513.04. The Russell 2000 Index of smaller companies rose 7.96, or 0.97 percent, to 826.11.

ConocoPhillips fell 57 cents to $65.58; Chevron Corp. fell 69 cents to $70.12; and Exxon Mobil fell 42 cents to $74.87.

Home Depot's weaker-than-anticipated sales also kept some pressure on stocks.

Home Depot fell 10 cents to $41.34 after reporting same-store sales that disappointed analysts. But Wal-Mart rose $1.78, or 3.7 percent, to $50.26 after issuing its financial results, which showed better-than-expected fourth-quarter profit growth and an upbeat forecast for 2007.

Hewlett-Packard Co. said after the market closed that holiday sales drove its profit up in the latest quarter by 26 percent. The results beat analysts' expectations, but the computer and printer maker's stock fell 43 cents to $42.70 in after-hours trading after closing up 36 cents at $43.13 in regular trading.

British drug company Shire is buying U.S. drug maker New River Pharmaceuticals for about $2.6 billion; Vulcan Materials is acquiring construction aggregate maker Florida Rock Industries for $4.6 billion; and EMI Group said it was approached by Warner Music about a takeover.

Florida Rock soared $19.58, or 42 percent, to $66.54.

Warner Music climbed 90 cents, or 4.9 percent, to $19.15.

New River, of Radford, Va., surged $4.84, or 8.3 percent, to $63.19.

Not all takeover talk was positive for stocks, though. General Motors Corp. slipped 39 cents to $35.95 as rumors continued to circulate that the struggling automaker is interested in buying Chrysler Group.

Advancing issues outnumbered decliners by about 5 to 3 on the New York Stock Exchange.

Mistrial In Malpractice Case After Defendants Aid Juror (NYT)

By Katie Zezima

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

BOSTON, Feb. 20 — A mistrial was declared on Tuesday in a medical malpractice case brought by the head football coach at the University of Notre Dame after a juror collapsed and the defendants, two doctors at Massachusetts General Hospital, rushed to help him.

The coach, Charlie Weis, who had N.F.L. coaching positions with the New England Patriots, the New York Giants and the New York Jets, has accused the doctors of negligence by letting him bleed internally for 30 hours after a gastric bypass in 2002.

Mr. Weis's lawyer said that he nearly died after the procedure and that the operation left his legs with nerve damage.

The doctors, Richard A. Ferguson and Charles M. Hodin, said that Mr. Weis knew the dangers of the operation and that bleeding was not uncommon after such surgery.

Around 10 a.m. as another doctor was testifying, a juror gasped and lost consciousness. The witness, with Drs. Ferguson and Hodin, rose and helped the juror, who was taken to a hospital.

After the juror left, Mr. Weis's lawyer, Michael Mone, asked Judge Charles T. Spurlock of Superior County in Suffolk County for a mistrial. In an interview, Mr. Mone said two jurors had told the judge that the events could influence their verdict.

"Like anybody, he wanted the case to be completed," Mr. Mone said of his client. "But he also wanted to have the case decided by a jury that was not affected by such an extraordinary event."

On Friday, the Patriots quarterback, Tom Brady, testified that after the operation he saw Mr. Weis drift in and out of consciousness and that leg pain subsequently often hobbled the coach.

Supreme Court Will Review The Way New York Selects Judicial Candidates (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — The United States Supreme Court agreed on Tuesday to review New York's method of selecting candidates to its own Supreme Courts — the 324 judges who have general trial jurisdiction throughout the state and whose nomination to 14-year terms is tightly controlled by a political process that two lower federal courts declared unconstitutional last year.

DOJ_NMG_0134908

The lower court rulings, which were stayed until after the 2006 election cycle, have created turmoil in the state's judicial politics and spurred calls for fundamental change in a system that dates to 1921. The political parties control the nominating conventions, and candidates who are not favored by the parties' leaders have no chance of getting on the ballot. The actual elections are for the most part uncontested.

From 1994 to 2002, these nominating conventions in the state's 12 judicial departments chose 568 State Supreme Court candidates, none of whom were challengers to the party favorites. The United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, in a ruling last August affirming a decision issued five months earlier by Judge John Gleeson of Federal District Court in Brooklyn, ruled that the system was so exclusionary as to violate the First Amendment right of the state's voters to freedom of political association.

"The First Amendment guarantees voters and candidates a realistic opportunity to participate in the nominating phase free from severe and unnecessary burdens," Judge Chester J. Straub wrote for a three-judge panel of the appeals court. He added that the United States Supreme Court's election-law precedents "establish that the First Amendment prohibits a state from maintaining an electoral scheme that in practice excludes candidates, and thus voters, from participating in the electoral process."

The ruling was appealed to the Supreme Court by the New York State Board of Elections, joined by several political organizations; the incumbent State Supreme Court justices; and by Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who was governor-elect by the time the appeal reached the court on Nov. 28.

Governor Spitzer's view of the case will be a matter of some interest as it goes forward. Addressing the Rockefeller Institute of Government shortly after his election as governor, Mr. Spitzer indicated that he did not support the existing system, which he said was "in dire need of reform." According to an account in The New York Law Journal, the governor-elect said that "there must be a way to primary onto the ballot," and added that "I will not support anything that has a closed convention structure, where only those who came out of the convention could be on the ballot."

Governor Spitzer's office in Albany said on Tuesday that he would have no comment on the Supreme Court decision to hear the case, New York Board of Elections v. Torres, No. 06-766. The court will take up the case when its next term begins in October. It could be a year from now, or longer, before the justices issue a decision.

That long waiting period presents considerable uncertainty. Under Judge Gleeson's original ruling, the state will have to begin to use a primary election system unless it comes up with another way to satisfy the court's constitutional concerns. A bill to establish primary elections as the way to choose State Supreme Court nominees passed the State Senate last year and was reintroduced at the beginning of the new session in January.

But primaries present their own problems, including the need for candidates to raise considerable amounts of money. (Money is also an issue with the nominating conventions; a judge who was arrested in Brooklyn on corruption charges several years ago asserted that the going rate in the borough for the Democratic nomination for judge was $50,000.)

A task force convened by the New York City Bar Association in response to the court rulings recommended a system of merit selection, under which bar associations, civic groups and others would screen and present a list of candidates from which the governor or, in New York City, the mayor would choose.

Mark H. Alcott, president of the New York State Bar Association, said on Tuesday that the organization had long supported a merit selection system. The shift to such a system would require a state constitutional amendment. The Constitution was amended in 1846 to require election of State Supreme Court justices.

The challenge to the convention system was brought by a group of judicial candidates, Republican and Democratic voters, and the civic group Common Cause, represented by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University Law School. The lead plaintiff, Margarita López Torres, who is now the Brooklyn surrogate court judge, tried and failed several times to obtain a Democratic nomination for State Supreme Court. As an elected Civil Court judge, she refused an order to make a patronage appointment of a law secretary, and complained that she was told by a party leader that she "did not understand the way it works."

Romney Mounting An Early Presidential Ad Campaign (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Mitt Romney, who entered the race for the Republican presidential nomination last week, will run television advertisements in five states starting Wednesday, the latest sign of how quickly the 2008 campaign is moving.

DOJ_NMG_0134909

The advertisements, 10 months before the first nominating contests next year, are an early move to inform Republican primary voters about his views and record at a time when he has come under some criticism by opponents for shifting his views on several issues.

The television advertising campaign will begin in Iowa and New Hampshire on Wednesday and then expand to South Carolina, Florida and Michigan, all states with early 2008 contests, his aides said. The advertisements will run for about two weeks.

Mr. Romney, a former governor of Massachusetts, becomes the first of the major presidential contenders of either party to buy television time. By contrast, in the 2004 election, Howard Dean, a Democrat seeking his party's presidential election, bought the first television advertisements only six months before the first nominating contests.

"It is very early," said Evan Tracey, chief operating officer of the Campaign Media Analysis Group, a firm based in Virginia that tracks advertising. "But everything this time is seemingly very early."

The advertisements include film from Mr. Romney's announcement last Tuesday in Dearborn, Mich., along with shots of him speaking at a rally at the Iowa State Fairgrounds that afternoon. As is typical with early introductory advertisements, they focus heavily on presenting information about someone who is little known outside his state, focusing in particular on his tenure as head of the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City.

The advertisement also offers a hint of how Mr. Romney may package himself in the campaign. "The Republican governor who turned around a Democratic state," the announcer says.

Some Romney supporters have been urging him to push back against criticism that he has shifted on issues as he has sought the backing of conservatives in his party — particularly his move from supporting abortion rights when he was a candidate in Massachusetts to opposing them now.

Recently, for example, Mr. Romney said in an interview on the ABC News program "This Week" that he just recently signed up as a member of the National Rifle Association and that he voted for Paul E. Tsongas, the former Democratic senator from Massachusetts, in his state's 1992 Democratic presidential primary, which is open to voters from both parties.

Mr. Romney's advisers said the advertisements had long been planned and should not be viewed as an expression of concern that he is being defined early by these questions.

"What the announcement did is stimulate a great deal of demand and interest about Mitt Romney from voters," said Kevin Madden, his spokesman. "What this does is introduce Mitt Romney to voters and gives more information about who he is. We don't enjoy the universal name identification that other candidates enjoy at this point."

Romney Goes Up On TV (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

Politico.com, February 21, 2007

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney goes up on the air tomorrow in parts of Florida, Iowa, Michigan, New Hampshire and South Carolina with his campaign's first ad. The 60-second spot, "Unplugged," features Mitt on the stump. There will also be a condensed, 30-second version.

Asked why the campaign would air commercials so far ahead of the first voting, Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said, "It's the perfect time."

"We just launched last week, and since then voter interest in Mitt Romney is continuing to grow and demand is rising," Madden continued. "This ad allows people to see and hear Mitt Romney as he works the campaign trail and makes his case for people's support."

The spot also allows Romney to boost his name ID in the key early states, where he currently lags far behind the better-known Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani. While Romney has put together a solid organization in each of these initial nominating states and created buzz with the political class, he's yet to penetrate the larger population. These ads aim to change that.

The Abortion Wars (POL)

Politico.com, February 20, 2007

The campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, whose stance on abortion has often been hard to pin down, now is attacking Sen. John McCain on the issue, accusing the Arizonan of ducking the debate over the right to life since his 2000 presidential bid.

"Ask the pro-life movement where his leadership has been in the six years since 2000 that he's been running for president," says Gary Marx, who is charged with handling conservative outreach for Romney. "What has he done?"

DOJ_NMG_0134910

But isn't it a bit audacious for the campaign of a candidate who was, in his own words, "effectively pro-choice" as late as his 2002 gubernatorial run, to now take shots at the record of a consistently pro-life opponent?

"We're making sure that all primary voters and [conservative] leaders have full picture on all the candidates," responds Marx.

Which is why Marx sent an e-mail (pasted in full below) last night to more than 100 influential social conservatives highlighting various news clips about McCain's stance on abortion, bolding and italicizing those lines that call into question the senator's commitment to ending the practice.

Romney's views on social issues, and particularly abortion, have received sustained scrutiny over the past few months and it's time that the other candidates face a similar examination, Marx says.

McCain, for example, "votes pro-life," Marx concedes, "but he still doesn't get it on what to do" to end the legalization of abortion.

Matt David, spokesman and rapid response guru for McCain, responded by noting his candidate's long record of opposing abortion.

"Senator McCain ran as a pro-life candidate, was elected as a pro-life senator and serves as a pro-life senator," he said.

McCain said Sunday on the campaign trail in South Carolina that, as president, he would support overturning Roe v Wade.

And what about Romney's own conversion on what conservatives call "the sanctity of life"?

Marx points out that Romney as governor vetoed funding for embryonic stem cell research, an emergency contraception bill and a measure that would change the defintion of when life begins.

While Romney's rhetoric was consistently pro-choice before being elected, his gubernatorial record "is 100% pro-life as a record," notes Marx.

That may be the case, but as long videos like this continue to appear on YouTube, it will be difficult for Marx and Co. to keep the focus on anybody's record on the issue but their own.

Mitt Romney's Extreme Makeover (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Precisely two years ago, Mitt Romney, then the governor of Massachusetts but already eyeing a 2008 presidential bid, sat in the coffee shop of a Washington hotel, doing his best not to explain his views on abortion.

Romney was speaking to a few of us from The Post, and my colleague Dan Balz noted the similarity between Romney's expressed views on abortion rights and the stance of another Massachusetts politician, Sen. John F. Kerry: Both men said they were personally opposed to abortion but did not support making it illegal.

From there, Romney proceeded to expound one of the odder positions I've heard in years of listening to politicians talk about a subject most would prefer to avoid: "I can tell you what my position is, and it's in a very narrowly defined sphere, as candidate for governor and as governor of Massachusetts," he said. "What I said to people was that I personally did not favor abortion, that I am personally pro-life. However, as governor I would not change the laws of the commonwealth relating to abortion.

"Now I don't try and put a bow around that and say what does that mean you are -- does that mean you're pro-life or pro-choice, because that whole package -- meaning I'm personally pro-life but I won't change the laws, you could describe that as -- well, I don't think you can describe it in one hyphenated word."

Got it? I didn't, and I asked, "Do you support making abortion illegal? I'm not talking about what you would do as governor of Massachusetts."

Romney: "But that's the furthest I'm going to take you right now. I'm governor of Massachusetts, and I'm telling you exactly what I will do as governor of Massachusetts, but I'm not going to tell you what I'd do as mayor of Boston or a congressman or any of those positions."

I reprint so much of Romney's answer (you can read or listen to the full exchange online) because its baroque circumlocutions seemed to say so much about him. It was hard to know what Romney actually thought about abortion rights other than that this was a political minefield it was best to avoid stepping into for as long as possible.

But it was also hard to see how a man with deeply held convictions on abortion rights -- either for or against -- could take a position so calibrated and inconclusive. Listening to Romney that day was like watching a chameleon in the fleeting moment that its color changes to suit its environment. Indeed, several months later, after vetoing a bill to expand access to emergency contraception, Romney wrote in the Boston Globe about how his views on the subject had "evolved and deepened."

Evolved, indeed. During his Massachusetts races, Romney paraded his conviction that "abortion should be safe and legal in this country" and promised that "you will not see me wavering" on Roe v. Wade.

DOJ_NMG_0134911

Now Romney says he opposes abortion except in cases of rape and incest or to save the life of the mother, and supports overturning Roe. At the National Review Institute Conservative Summit last month -- at the very hotel where he had told us of his commitment to not altering state law one way or another -- Romney boasted that each time an issue involving reproductive rights came up during his governorship, "on every single one of them I came down on the side of respecting human life."

Romney's "Extreme Makeover: Political Edition" goes beyond abortion rights. Once he supported allowing gays to serve openly in the military and backed a federal law to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation -- not anymore. He's gone from saying "I don't line up with the NRA" to becoming, last August, a life member.

Romney told the Boston Globe in 1994 that, as a registered independent, he voted in the 1992 Democratic primary for Paul Tsongas because Tsongas was from Massachusetts and he favored Tsongas's ideas over Bill Clinton's. Appearing last weekend on ABC's "This Week," Romney offered a contradictory explanation: "When there was no real contest in the Republican primary, I'd vote in the Democrat primary, vote for the person who I thought would be the weakest opponent for a Republican."

Surely a man with a Harvard MBA could do better than that. At the time of the primary, Tsongas was doing better than Clinton in matchups against George H.W. Bush. And Tsongas didn't need Romney's help trouncing Clinton in his home state.

To give this explanation the credit it doesn't deserve, Romney's rationale boils down to arguing that he didn't really mean his vote; he was just trying to game the political process. Those considering Romney in 2008 have reason to wonder what a politician who admits so freely to that kind of manipulation is willing to do to win their votes.

marcusr@washpost.com

McCain Defends Christian Outreach Effort (AP)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Republican presidential candidate John McCain is defending his outreach to conservative Christians, arguing that his effort is not political pandering to win the GOP nomination.

McCain met privately Monday with religious broadcasters in Orlando, Fla., then answered questions about his appeal to conservatives in Vero Beach.

In the 2000 campaign, McCain angered the party's right by calling evangelist leaders Pat Robertson and Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance." Last spring, he spoke at Falwell's Liberty University although hard feelings still linger among some conservatives. Focus on the Family founder James Dobson has said he won't support McCain.

"Nobody accused me of courting and pandering to the liberals when I went to the New School," McCain told the crowd, a reference to the New York City school. "What I have found out in my life, is that every time I have done something for political reasons and not the right reasons, I have paid a very heavy price for it — a big price."

The Arizona senator said he is trying to reach out to all elements of the party.

"I don't know which part of the party is going to be more influential or not," McCain said. "I've tried always in my political career to have a big tent party where a lot of people are welcome with differing views."

Conservatives are a critical voting bloc in the GOP primaries.

The Rev. Patrick Mahoney of the Christian Defense Coalition said after McCain's private meeting in Orlando that he helped repair damage with Christian conservatives.

"He recognized he cannot be president of the United States without reaching out to the evangelicals," Mahoney said. "There definitely is an uneasy relationship between McCain and people of faith, but he is reaching out and he is breaking down those walls. He helped himself in that room tremendously today."

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — John Edwards' presidential campaign wants to make it clear that he does not consider Israel a threat to world peace.

A spokesman for the 2008 Democratic candidate issued a statement Tuesday denying such a report on Variety.com. Columnist Peter Bart reported that Edwards told a Hollywood fundraiser last month that the possibility that Israel would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities is perhaps the greatest short-term threat to world peace.

The report was circulating on the Internet, and the Edwards campaign wanted to reassure its pro-Israel supporters that is not his position.

"The January 19th Variety article is erroneous," said Edwards spokesman Jonathan Prince. "Senator Edwards did not say nor does he believe that the greatest short-term threat to world peace is the possibility that Israel would bomb Iran's nuclear facilities. Senator Edwards said, as he has in the past, that Iran acquiring a nuclear weapon is one of the greatest short-term threats to world peace."

DOJ_NMG_0134912

Bart said Variety stands by its report. The host of the Jan. 9 fundraiser, Adam Venit of the Endeavor talent agency, did not respond to a message seeking comment.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama will deliver the keynote address next month at the annual Bridge Crossing Jubilee that commemorates the 1965 Selma-to-Montgomery voting rights march, organizers said Tuesday.

Obama is scheduled to speak at a March 4 service at Brown Chapel A.M.E. Church, the site in Selma where marchers gathered in the historic protest that gave blacks across the South greater access to the ballot.

Rep. Artur Davis, D-Ala., who district includes Selma, asked Obama to participate and plans to hold a fundraiser for the Illinois senator. Davis and Obama met while attending Harvard Law School.

The 1965 march helped spark passage of the Voting Rights Act, which allowed blacks to register across the South without the obstacles used by segregationists to limit their access to polling places.

Club-swinging troopers and deputies beat and turned back marchers at the Edmund Pettus bridge at Selma on March 7, 1965, an attack that became known as "Bloody Sunday" and helped galvanize national support for the voting rights movement. With a federal court order clearing the way, the march to Montgomery was completed later that month.

___

Associated Press writers Ben Evans and Nedra Pickler in Washington contributed to this report.

McCain Suffers In Polls Despite Iraq Stance (FT)

By Edward Luce

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Once considered the un-crowned Republican candidate for the 2008 presidential election, John McCain's fortunes are plummeting rapidly. And the senator's frustrations are beginning to show.

At a campaign stop in South Carolina on Monday, Mr McCain lashed out at Donald Rumsfeld, the controversial former defence secretary, as "one of the worst secretaries of defence in history". The 70-year-old Vietnam war veteran added: "We are paying a very heavy price for the mismanagement – that's the kindest word I can give you – of Donald Rumsfeld of this war. The price is very, very heavy and I regret it enormously."

In spite of his criticisms of the Bush administration's handling of the Iraq war since 2003, Mr McCain is starting to pay a price on the campaign trail.

Last month the Arizona senator came out strongly in favour of George W. Bush's "new way forward in Iraq", which involves sending another 21,500 US troops into the field. Since then, his poll numbers among registered Republican voters and among the US public at large have fallen sharply.

From being the virtually uncontested frontrunner among Republicans, recent polls show Mr McCain trailing Rudy Giuliani, the form-er mayor of New York seen by many as an "American hero" because of the leadership he displayed after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

According to the latest poll by Fox News, only 22 per cent of Republicans support Mr McCain's candidacy compared with 34 per cent for Mr Giuliani. Newt Gingrich, the former speaker of the House of Representatives, attracted 15 per cent support even though he has not yet decided whether to enter the race.

Meanwhile, Mitt Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, who is trying to position himself as a candidate of the powerful social conservative bloc, failed to get into double figures. Mr Romney's Mormon beliefs are seen as a severe handicap in a party where up to one-third of members are registered evangelicals.

Mr McCain is viewed with suspicion because of his support for stem cell research and lukewarm opposition to abortion and gay marriage.

He has stretch-ed voter credulity by making overt attempts to reconcile with the Christian right. He said the 1973 Roe vs Wade Supreme Court ruling that paved the way for abortion should be overturned.

Although Mr Giuliani is more liberal by far on social issues than either of the other candidates and is also on his third marriage, his image as a tough operator in what is widely expected to be a national security-dominated election in 2008 has assisted his poll numbers, say analysts.

Dewine, Castle Endorse Mccain (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134913

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) yesterday picked up a 2008 endorsement from Ohio's former GOP senator, Mike DeWine, who maintains strong name-recognition in the quintessential swing state, despite losing his seat last year.

Rep. Mike Castle (R-Del.) also joined McCain's 2008 bid.

Of the 17 House Republicans who voted with Democrats on last week's resolution condemning the Bush administration's plan to add troops in Iraq, five are public McCain supporters: Reps. Ric Keller (Fla.), Fred Upton (Mich.), Steven LaTourette (Ohio), Mark Kirk (Ill.) and Castle.

South Carolina To Test Rudy's Line On Judges (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 21, 2007

A speech Rudy Giuliani delivered to an abortion-rights advocacy group when he was mayor of New York City and more recent comments about the Supreme Court could complicate his efforts to woo conservative votes in crucial presidential primary states.

Giuliani will test his new abortion talking points with conservative voters today when he campaigns in South Carolina, a state that is expected to pose an obstacle to centrist GOP presidential candidates next year.

Giuliani, who was an outspoken supporter of abortion rights when he ran for city office in the 1990s, has shifted his position to appeal to conservative voters by promising to nominate conservative jurists to the federal courts if elected president. He has vowed to select judges like Chief Justice John Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel Alito Jr., conservative stalwarts on the Supreme Court who are viewed as abortion-rights opponents.

The credibility of that stance is undermined by remarks Giuliani delivered in April of 2001 to the National Abortion & Reproduction Rights Action League, now known as NARAL Pro-Choice America.

NARAL was perhaps the harshest critic of President Bush's appointments of Roberts and Alito to the high court. NARAL aired the first television advertisement opposing Roberts's nomination, accusing him of supporting violent anti-abortion groups while showing footage of a 1998 abortion clinic bombing.

The ad was met with such a barrage of protest that NARAL took it off the air. Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), then the centrist chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, condemned the ad, saying it was untrue and undercut the credibility of abortion-rights advocates.

Giuliani's remarks to NARAL could prove embarrassing because the Roberts episode is still fresh in the minds of many conservative activists the former mayor hopes to win over to his side.

"I thank NARAL for taking the lead in establishing freedom of choice for all of us, and as the mayor of New York City, I thank you for being here in New York City," he said in 2001.

Giuliani also indicated then that he supported changing the Republican Party's platform on abortion.

"In a recent poll by American Viewpoint, 65 percent of Republicans supported changing the plank in the Republican platform that calls for a constitutional ban on abortion," he said. "And over 80 percent of Republicans believe that the decision with regard to an abortion should be made by a woman, her doctor, and her family, rather than dictated by the government."

Abortion rights, Giuliani said, fit well within the Republican Party's philosophy of reducing the role of government in people's lives.

"So it is consistent with that philosophy to believe that in the most personal and difficult choices that a woman has to make with regard to a pregnancy, those choices should be made based on that person's conscience and that person's way of thinking and feeling," he said. "The government shouldn't dictate that choice by making it a crime or making it illegal."

At the NARAL lunch, Giuliani also said he and the assembled guests were "upholding a distinguished tradition that began in our city starting with the work of Margaret Sanger," a founder of Planned Parenthood and a pioneer of distributing birth control to the poor.

An official with Giuliani's campaign stressed that he has since clearly stated his personal opposition to abortion.

"I oppose it," Giuliani said during a Fox News interview this month. "I don't like it. I hate it. I think abortion is something that is a personal matter I would advise something against. However, I believe in a woman's right to choose. I think you have to ultimately not put a woman in jail for that. I think ultimately you have to leave that to a disagreement of conscience and have to respect the choice that somebody makes…"

Now that Giuliani is pinning his abortion stance to a promise on federal court nominations, he could be haunted by other public comments.

In July of 2005, he said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg fit criteria that would be important to him when picking a Supreme Court justice.

DOJ_NMG_0134914

"[W]hat's important to me is to have a very intelligent, very honest, very good lawyer on the court," he said. "Justice Ginsburg fit that category." Giuliani added that she was a "very qualified lawyer and a very smart person."

Ironically, Giuliani made his 2005 statements on Fox News's "Hannity & Colmes," the same show on which he made an appeal this month to conservative voters.

"I think the appointment of judges I would make would be very similar if not exactly the same as the last two judges that were appointed," he said. "Chief Justice Roberts is somebody I admire. Justice Alito, someone I knew when he was U.S. attorney, I also admire."

Influential conservatives say Giuliani cannot merely promise to nominate conservatives to the bench. They say he must address his personal stance on the issue.

"I think it's probably going to have to be stronger," the director of public policy for the South Carolina Baptist Convention, Joe Mack, said. "He'll have to deal with where he stands on the issue, not just on his court appointees. I think people are still going to want to know where he stands on the issue."

Mack said that if Giuliani has changed his mind on abortion, he will have to make his case convincing.

"What kind of case he makes will determine whether they accept it or not," he said, speaking of social conservatives from his state.

A conservative activist leader based in Washington, Connie Mackey, said Giuliani's comments need to be scrutinized.

"It's relevant," said Mackey, who works for the legislative-action arm of the Family Research Council, a group representing evangelical Christians. "Any conservative who thinks it's sufficient to get a promise that [Giuliani] will put strict constructionists on the courts are missing the point. You use the bully pulpit to advance an agenda you believe in and you put people in federal agencies who will do the work of your stated agenda. His stated agenda is that he's pro-abortion."

Giuliani made other statements in 2005 that will make it difficult for him to appease conservatives' concerns by promising to nominate judges in the mold of Roberts and Alito.

During a June 2005 interview on MSNBC's "Hardball," Giuliani said he would not select a judicial nomination based on his or her abortion views.

"I wouldn't pick a judge based on whether I knew or didn't know their position on choice," he said. "I'd pick a judge based on their overall record."

Perhaps more awkward for Giuliani now is a declaration he made in 2000 during an ABC interview with George Will that Roe v. Wade, the landmark Supreme Court decision establishing the right to an abortion, was good constitutional law. Even many defenders of abortion rights acknowledge that the legal justification behind the case was poorly reasoned.

These statements could turn up in campaign ads aired by his political opponents in the run-up to next year's primaries.

Obama Attracts Celebrities And Cash (AP)

By Michael R. Blood, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Checks from Hollywood's A-list stars such as George Clooney, Eddie Murphy and Barbra Streisand added up to a one-night take of $1.3 million for Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama.

Obama spoke to a star-studded audience at a closed-door fundraiser in Beverly Hills arranged by three of the industry's biggest names — DreamWorks studio founders Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen.

He told an audience that included Spielberg, Oscar nominee Eddie Murphy, actress Jennifer Anniston and singer Jackson Browne that they have "enormous power" that comes with "enormous responsibility" because of their impact on American culture.

"Don't sell yourselves short," he said in a 25-minute address. "You are the storytellers of our age."

Tickets were $2,300, the maximum individual donation to a federal campaign, or $4,600 for a couple. A later, private dinner at Geffen's home was being held for fundraisers who brought in at least $46,000 for the evening.

Before the fundraiser, Obama urged a crowd of thousands at an outdoor rally to help him transform America. The freshman senator from Illinois spoke of a government that is failing the country and a slash-and-burn political culture that stands in the way of significant change.

With the support of the electorate, Obama said, he could work to resolve such issues as an unpopular war in Iraq and a public education system that he said leaves too many people behind.

"We can do all these things. I can't do it without you," Obama, tieless and in shirt sleeves, exhorted the audience as supporters enthusiastically waved a sea of blue "Obama '08" signs.

The crowd was strikingly large for a rally a year before the state's expected February 2008 primary.

DOJ_NMG_0134915

The fundraiser underscored the intense competition among the party's leading 2008 candidates for Hollywood dollars and endorsements. The entertainment industry is a perennial source of cash for Democrats, with big names often donating to multiple campaigns while withholding formal endorsements until later.

Spielberg, for example, is a host of the event but has not made an endorsement. Katzenberg and Geffen are backing Obama.

The movie, television and recording industries gave $33.1 million to federal candidates and parties in 2004, with much of that coming from Hollywood, according to the nonprofit Center for Responsive Politics.

Obama's display of celebrity sizzle and campaign dollars challenges any assumptions that Hollywood dollars would default to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who has long-standing ties to the industry, along with her husband, former President Clinton.

"I think this guy is for real," said longtime Democratic consultant Garry South, who is unaligned in the 2008 race. "I was skeptical at first, but something is going on here. ... Whether it can sustain itself remains to be seen."

Clinton will be pulling in Hollywood dollars next month, when a fundraiser is scheduled at the home of supermarket tycoon Ronald Burkle, a longtime friend and fundraiser for her husband.

In addition to money, the state has taken on new importance in presidential politics with lawmakers poised to move its primary to Feb. 5 from June.

Among other candidates, Republican Rudy Giuliani was in the state earlier this month. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., is planning to appear Wednesday with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger in the Los Angeles area to discuss climate change.

Obama was on a three-day swing through California, his first since announcing his candidacy. He also held a fundraiser in San Diego's upscale La Jolla section.

Beside the celebrity giving, checks have come in from studio bosses, including Paramount Pictures studio chief Brad Grey; Richard Cook, chairman of Walt Disney Studios, and Ron Meyer of Universal Studios.

Hollywood Gives Obama Both Cash And Credibility (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Hollywood has always gravitated to the fresh face, so the crushing turnout there yesterday at a rally and a series of fundraisers for presidential contender Barack Obama followed a familiar Tinseltown story line.

The Democratic senator from Illinois drew thousands to a South Los Angeles park, then headed to Beverly Hills for a fundraising double feature that organizers said yielded him an estimated $1.3 million.

Movie stars Tom Hanks, Jennifer Aniston and Denzel Washington wrote checks, and scores of producers and agents paid $4,600 per couple -- the maximum allowed -- to jam a hotel ballroom for a two-hour, closed-door cocktail reception hosted by entertainment moguls Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen.

Those who collected $46,000 in checks for the event, which attracted 300 people, were invited to Geffen's house for a more intimate sit-down dinner with Obama.

Organizers said they expected the freshman senator to leave town flush not only with money but also with valuable connections in a city that has for decades served as a lifeline for Democratic presidential contenders.

Money collected now could provide an important boost, in that it will appear on Obama's first quarterly earnings report. Those figures, when released in April, will help signal his campaign's viability.

A clear undercurrent to yesterday's high-profile Hollywood swing was the ease with which Obama swept up support from entertainment industry titans who had once been squarely with President Bill Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"There will be lots of excitement about her," Donna Bojarsky, a Hollywood-based political consultant who attended last night's Obama event, said of Hillary Clinton. "But with him, there's this overwhelming sense that people could be getting in at the ground floor of a historic journey."

That is not to say Hollywood is leaving Hillary Clinton behind. Spielberg is one of many who have pledged to raise money for Obama, Clinton and former senator John Edwards. Next month, former supermarket magnate Ron Burkle will host a major fundraiser for Clinton.

"Senator Clinton has been a box-office hit in this town for 15 years," said Chad Griffin, a Hollywood-based political strategist and staff member in the Clinton White House. "Anyone who can survive the industry for 15 years has lasting power."

Obama Hat In Hand In La-la Land (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Christi Parsons

Chicago Tribune, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134916

BEVERLY HILLS, Calif. -- In Hollywood, it's never too early to be famous.

Never too soon to be "it." No such thing as too much attention. And no better place for a politician who is known as much for his celebrity as his record.

So on Tuesday night, Sen. Barack Obama made his debut as a presidential candidate among an A-list of Hollywood power and fame, tapping into one of the most formidable honey pots of Democratic money and connections. The crowd included Jennifer Aniston and Eddie Murphy as well as singer Natalie Maines of the Grammy-winning Dixie Chicks and movie producer Ron Howard.

And the hosts are among the entertainment world's best known and most powerful figures, Steven Spielberg, David Geffen and Jeffrey Katzenberg, the DreamWorks SKG partners. Studio bosses from Universal, Paramount, Disney and Fox each paid $2,300 for tickets to the event with the Democratic senator from Illinois.

It is the season's premier fundraising event in the cradle of American myth-making, one of the most important sources of money for presidential candidates. In addition to contributing money to its favored candidates, the entertainment industry also casts an aura of glamour and currency upon a hopeful trying to catch on as the next big thing.

So in a town that lives and dies by the ability to predict what will capture the imagination of the American public, candidates are feverishly making their pitches.

Attendance at such a star-studded event isn't necessarily a promise of political backing. In fact, Spielberg, has promised to help throw an upcoming event for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clintonof New York, one of Obama's chief rivals for the Democratic nomination. The two are fiercely battling for the heart of Hollywood these days, with Clinton getting ready for her own high-stakes fundraiser in the next few weeks and counting the support of several influential moguls and producers in the community.

But the fact that the DreamWorks partners are so early in staging such a big party — expected to net at least $1 million — has drawn notable attention to Obama, especially as media from around the world assemble in advance of this weekend's Oscar ceremonies. For others in the circle, say some, it signals Obama as someone to take seriously.

'Very discerning'

"These guys are very discerning people," said Anne Dunsmore, a California Republican fundraiser who was state finance director for both George W. Bush presidential campaigns. "When you bring something in—whether it's a candidate, a script or a business opportunity—and they sign off on it, it's a big deal."

Decades ago, studio executives were the main Hollywood players in industry relations with Washington. But the relationships are now so diverse and strong that it isn't unusual to see movie stars at the White House correspondents' dinner or at a witness table in a congressional hearing — the old joke about Washington being Hollywood for ugly people notwithstanding.

Along with the financial capital of New York, the lobbying community of Washington and the business services and manufacturing center of Chicago, Hollywood is one of the great sources of political money in the U.S. Republicans also make fundraising forays into the state where former actor and Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger now serves as governor, but Democrats are the primary beneficiaries of money from the entertainment industry.

Of the millions of dollars that the entertainment industry contributed to federal candidates and parties in the last presidential cycle, according to an analysis by the non-partisan watchdog Center for Responsive Politics, almost 70 percent went to Democrats.

"You can't run for president as a Democrat and not have a foothold in Hollywood," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), a key fundraiser for Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential election and head of the successful Democratic effort to retake the U.S. House in 2006. "It's such an important piece of the financial building blocks."

Emanuel's brother Ari is a top Hollywood talent agent who also has agreed to hold a future fundraiser for Obama.

Candidates of all political stripes come calling in those circles, and only partly because the pockets are so deep.

"Raising money in Hollywood is a two-fer," said Michael Toner, a Federal Election Commission member who was general counsel to the Bush 2000 presidential campaign. "First you raise the campaign money. And then you have the candidate associated with Hollywood celebrities, who are opinion-leaders in their own right."

Support from celebrities can sometimes be a negative, as when candidates denounce the West Coast contributions they didn't get by characterizing the donors as "out-of-touch" with working-class people.

"The implication is, 'They don't have our family values,'" said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst and senior scholar at the University of Southern California. "In general, it's that Hollywood doesn't lead the lifestyle of the heartland of America, so why listen to them?"

But industry leaders may actually have something to contribute when it comes to sizing up candidates, said Arianna Huffington, the founder of the political blog Huffingtonpost.com, who once ran against Schwarzenegger in the California governor's recall election. She remembers getting a phone call from producer, writer and director Norman Lear in 2004, inviting her to come over and meet a candidate running for the U.S. Senate in Illinois.

"I said, 'He's running for the Senate in Illinois, and you want me to come meet him?'" Huffington said, wondering why she should pay attention to a new candidate in a faraway state. Then she went anyway because she trusted Lear's instincts.

Barack Obama blew the room away, she said, just as Lear had predicted.

"Casting is what determines the success of a movie," she said in an interview. "Movies here don't get the green light if they don't have the right elements. To green light a campaign, you have to have the right leading man or leading woman ... It's about connecting. That cannot be taught."

For years, Bill and Hillary Clinton have been the political darlings of Hollywood, and their roots in the community run strong and deep. The senator's supporters include media mogul Haim Saban, producer Stephen Bing and actress Elizabeth Taylor. Billionaire Ron Burkle will hold a fundraiser for her in March.

"Sen. Clinton does not have to go on casting calls in Los Angeles," said Chad Griffin, a former Clinton White House aide and Hollywood-based political consultant whose clients include a number of high-profile entertainment industry figures. "She has the relationships and she has had them for 15 years ... The day she announced, most everyone I know maxed out to her and started making calls for her."

One jumps ship

But one of the Clintons' old friends is no longer on board. Two years ago, Geffen told a New York audience that Hillary Clinton can't win the presidency and declared her an "incredibly polarizing figure."

Much of Hollywood is deeply opposed to the war in Iraq, and Clinton not only voted to authorize the war but hasn't taken the kind of firm stance against it that many in the entertainment community would like to see.

One alternative is Democrat John Edwards, the former senator from North Carolina, who was in Los Angeles for a small fundraiser just a few days ago. Another is Obama, who some think may pick up steam as a result of the SKG fundraiser.

"In Hollywood, they move in packs," said Dunsmore. The DreamWorks partners have effectively "told everybody it's OK to go with Barack instead of Hillary. It's OK to explore your options."

In case things don't work out, there's also another figure waiting in the wings — former Vice President Al Gore. He's getting buzz right now for another reason — the film based on his book "An Inconvenient Truth" is up for an Oscar this weekend.

Mike Dorning reported from Beverly Hills and Christi Parsons from Washington, D.C.

Obama's Big Screen Test (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

Hillary is not David Geffen's dreamgirl.

"Whoever is the nominee is going to win, so the stakes are very high," says Mr. Geffen, the Hollywood mogul and sultan of "Dreamgirls," as he sits by a crackling fire beneath a Jasper Johns flag and a matched pair of de Koonings in the house that Jack Warner built (which old-time Hollywood stars joked was the house that God would have built). "Not since the Vietnam War has there been this level of disappointment in the behavior of America throughout the world, and I don't think that another incredibly polarizing figure, no matter how smart she is and no matter how ambitious she is — and God knows, is there anybody more ambitious than Hillary Clinton? — can bring the country together.

"Obama is inspirational, and he's not from the Bush royal family or the Clinton royal family. Americans are dying every day in Iraq. And I'm tired of hearing James Carville on television."

Barack Obama has made an entrance in Hollywood unmatched since Scarlett O'Hara swept into the Twelve Oaks barbecue. Instead of the Tarleton twins, the Illinois senator is flirting with the Dreamworks trio: Mr. Geffen, Steven Spielberg and Jeffrey Katzenberg, who gave him a party last night that raised $1.3 million and Hillary's hackles.

She didn't stand outside the gates to the Geffen mansion, where glitterati wolfed down Wolfgang Puck savories, singing the Jennifer Hudson protest anthem "And I Am Telling You I'm Not Going." But she's not exactly Little Miss Sunshine, either. Hillary loyalists have hissed at defecting donors to remember the good old days of jumping on the Lincoln Bedroom bed.

"Hillary is livid that Obama's getting the first big fund-raiser here," one friend of hers said.

Who can pay attention to the Oscar battle between "The Queen" and "Dreamgirls" when you've got a political battle between a Queen and a Dreamboy?

Terry McAuliffe and First Groupie Bill have tried to hoard the best A.T.M. machine in politics for the Missus, but there's some Clinton fatigue among fatigued Clinton donors, who fret that Bill will "pull the focus" and shelve his wife's campaign.

"I don't think anybody believes that in the last six years, all of a sudden Bill Clinton has become a different person," Mr. Geffen says, adding that if Republicans are digging up dirt, they'll wait until Hillary's the nominee to use it. "I think they believe she's the easiest to defeat."

DOJ_NMG_0134918

She is overproduced and overscripted. “It’s not a very big thing to say, ‘I made a mistake’ on the war, and typical of Hillary Clinton that she can’t,” Mr. Geffen says. “She’s so advised by so many smart advisers who are covering every base. I think that America was better served when the candidates were chosen in smoke-filled rooms.”

The babble here is not about “Babel”; it’s about the battle of the billionaires. Not only have Ron Burkle and David Geffen been vying to buy The Los Angeles Times — they have been vying to raise money for competing candidates. Mr. Burkle, a supermarket magnate, is close to the Clintons, and is helping Hillary parry Barry Obama by arranging a fund-raiser for her in March, with a contribution from Mr. Spielberg.

Did Mr. Spielberg get in trouble with the Clintons for helping Senator Obama? “Yes,” Mr. Geffen replies, slyly. Can Obambi stand up to Clinton Inc.? “I hope so,” he says, “because that machine is going to be very unpleasant and unattractive and effective.”

Once, David Geffen and Bill Clinton were tight as ticks. Mr. Geffen helped raise some $18 million for Bill and slept in the Lincoln Bedroom twice. Bill chilled at Chateau Geffen. Now, the Dreamworks co-chairman calls the former president “a reckless guy” who “gave his enemies a lot of ammunition to hurt him and to distract the country.”

They fell out in 2000, when Mr. Clinton gave a pardon to Marc Rich after rebuffing Mr. Geffen’s request for one for Leonard Peltier. “Marc Rich getting pardoned? An oil-profiteer expatriate who left the country rather than pay taxes or face justice?” Mr. Geffen says. “Yet another time when the Clintons were unwilling to stand for the things that they genuinely believe in. Everybody in politics lies, but they do it with such ease, it’s troubling.”

The mogul knows it’s easy to mock Hollywood — “people with Priuses and private planes” — and agrees with George Clooney that it’s probably not helpful for stars to campaign for candidates, given the caricatures of Hollywood.

I ask what he will say if he ever runs into Bill Clinton again. “ ‘Hi,’ ” he replies. And will he be upset if Hillary wins and he never gets to sleep in the Lincoln Bedroom again?

“No,” he says with a puckish smile. “It’s not as nice as my bedroom.”

Obama And The Old Racial Bind (WP)

By Courtland Milloy

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

Marcus Smith was working as a waiter at a Democratic fundraiser here the other night when Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) took to the podium. Smith, with dishes in both hands, stopped to listen. "I'd really like to see Obama become the first black president of the United States," he said later. Asked what made Obama black, he replied, "That little taste his father gave him was all it takes."

There it was again, a near reflexive need to categorize and assess by race.

Is Obama black enough for the black vote? Is he too black for the white vote? With a black father from Kenya and a white mother from Kansas, can he expect to take the mixed-race vote? It's as if the "color line" had been encoded into the American DNA.

Obama was doing what he could not to get boxed in.

"It's time to turn the page on division," he said. "What brings us together as Americans is that sense of hope, the audacity to believe that the way the world is today is not the way it has to be."

A "mixed" audience of 1,400 -- the largest ever for the state's annual Jefferson-Jackson Dinner (named for presidents Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson) -- applauded uproariously. But the truth of the matter is, each time the country has turned the page on division, more of it showed up on the next page.

"Will his race be a factor? Absolutely," said Tonza Ruffin, a lawyer from Windsor, N.C., who came to hear Obama. "He will have to go above and beyond to prove that he is capable of doing the job, more so than some of his white counterparts."

When asked the same question, Delthema Allen, a registered nurse also from Windsor, declared: "Absolutely not. Skin color is superficial." When asked what she thought of those who have questioned whether Obama is "black enough," she said, "He's black enough for me."

What happened to just being human? Virginia certainly had a hand in crushing that notion, enacting in 1691, for instance, legislation to ban marriages between free people of African descent and those of European descent. When human nature refused to cooperate, Virginia found a way to keep the social fiction going. In 1924, state officials passed the Virginia Racial Integrity Act, which relied on quackery in the form of the "one-drop rule." Anybody with "one drop of black blood" was black, according to the law, and was prohibited from marrying a "pure white." The color line had become a Gordian knot of racism.

According to a recent survey by Zogby International, a majority of whites, 55 percent, classified Obama as "biracial," and 66 percent of blacks classified him as black. To some, it was ridiculous to question whether Obama was "authentically black" when he was embraced by so many black people. But assigning him to that category only tightens the knot.

DOJ_NMG_0134919

Otis Lucas, who manages a group home in Richmond, tried this approach: "It's a very exciting dynamic. He's black and he's white and he's right." But that doesn't cut it, either.

Obama hinted at the crux of the problem when he paid homage to civil rights pioneers. "I stand on the shoulders of hundreds of giants, thousands of people who fought the good fight for so long," he said. And just what were they fighting? A category called white -- and the presumption of racial superiority that came with it. That left blacks with two choices: embrace their skin color with pride or accept it as a mark of racial inferiority. But both options were biological fraud. There is simply no such thing as race.

In 1989, Virginians elected L. Douglas Wilder the nation's "first black" governor since Reconstruction. As the grandson of slaves, the silver-haired statesman epitomized the quantum leaps that black people have made in their trek from slavery to freedom. Wilder demonstrated how far we had come.

Now Obama is showing us how far we have to go.

During a visit to the Virginia Capitol, Obama gazed at the restored White House of the Confederacy just a few blocks away and said, "This reminds us that the country has an enormous capacity for change."

But nearly 400 years after the first Africans arrived in Jamestown and were put to work as slaves, Obama is being shackled by racial categories.

And the color line stretches on.

Clinton Seeks Aid For Minority Students (AP)

By Brendan Farrington, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 21, 2007

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton on Tuesday criticized President Bush's education policy as doing little to help minorities and acknowledged that she is still searching for ways to raise minority student test scores.

More needs to be done to prepare children for school and to get parents involved in their education, Clinton said while visiting a historic black neighborhood during her first campaign trip to Florida since announcing her candidacy. She said Bush's No Child Left Behind Act isn't providing a solution for raising test scores.

"This achievement gap is deeply troubling to me," Clinton said. "If we don't invest in our children, our society and our economy will decline. This is not just something nice to do, this is something that we have to do."

Clinton, a New York senator and former first lady, spoke and took questions for an hour from the mostly black audience of 300 in the Liberty City neighborhood. The event was sandwiched between fundraisers in Tampa, Miami and Hollywood that were closed to the press.

The federal government can do more to help minority businesses by writing a road map for banks' roles in the communities, Clinton said.

"We've got to change our laws so that they inspire and motivate more lending institutions to look at how they can serve the entire community again," she said. "We've got to get them to look at a community even if they are multinational banks and we can do that through regulation and law."

Clinton also called for microlending programs and helping business owners to develop stronger business plans so they are more credit worthy.

The Liberty City event was a signal that Clinton is going to fight hard to keep black voters on her side in a primary race in which Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, who is black, is gaining popularity.

"The black community is betwixt and between. We all love Clinton, but at the same time Obama has a lot of people who love him in the community, too," said Hans Ottinot, a 38-year-old Haitian-American lawyer who grew up in the neighborhood.

"She's showing us, 'Look, the black community has been a major supporter and I want to keep you as a major supporter.' It's a clear message. I don't think it was subtle," Ottinot said.

After the community meeting, Clinton attended a $100-per-ticket cocktail reception in Hollywood, which was followed by a reception at $2,500 per person.

Her campaign announced endorsements from Florida Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz and Alcee Hastings, whose Broward County district is predominantly black.

The Mononym Platform (NYT)

By Peter Funt

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

THERE'S something missing in Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton's recently unveiled presidential campaign, something so conspicuous in its absence that it's certain to set off debate — not on Pennsylvania Avenue, but on Madison Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0134920

What's missing is her surname. Someone has apparently decided that Mrs. Clinton will be the first major single-name candidate since 1952, when Ike's P.R. gurus realized that "Eisenhower" was tough to fit on a bumper sticker.

Mrs. Clinton announced her intentions via the Internet on a Web site called "Hillary for President." Incredibly, on the day of her announcement, the name "Clinton" did not appear anywhere in the long text on the site's home page — except when linking to articles from The Associated Press and The Washington Post, and at the very bottom in the obligatory fine print: "Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President Exploratory Committee."

In an apparent attempt to model her marketing on the likes of Madonna, Beyoncé and Cher, Mrs. Clinton's site proclaimed: "Today, Hillary took the first step ..." and "Send Hillary a message of support ..." and "Hillary is the Democrats' best shot."

As New Yorkers may recall, Mrs. Clinton gradually became comfortable presenting herself as simply "Hillary" in both of her Senate campaigns. But what works in New York, where tabloid newspapers are fond of calling her "Hill," may not play on the national stage. A close inspection of the site reveals how determined its designers were to cleanse the campaign of the Clinton name. In the senator's 1,937-word biography, the name "Clinton" appears just once, halfway in ("she followed her heart and a man named Bill Clinton to Arkansas"). That's it. "Hillary" appears 38 times.

Mrs. Clinton had little choice but to use her full name in her Web address, yet she meticulously avoided it in the actual title. Why? Is it because she doesn't wish to draw attention to her marriage to the former president? (Doubtful, her husband is now a draw.) More likely it's because she knows that she's the only candidate whose name lends itself to Oprah-ization.

Organizers for John Edwards and John McCain presumably considered, and rejected, naming their sites "John for President." And it's hard to imagine that President Bush would have gotten much traction from a site titled "George for President."

The real genius in Mrs. Clinton's approach is that it trumps Senator Barack Obama. He can't possibly win with a "Barack for President" site. The only thing less compelling would be a site that made use of his middle name: Hussein for President.

If nothing else, Mrs. Clinton has shifted attention away from the nagging question of whether America is ready for a female president. She clearly prefers to have voters wonder whether America is ready for a president who wishes to be known exclusively by her first name.

Democrats Turn Nevada Into Political Boomtown (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, February 21, 2007

CARSON CITY, Nev. — It all came down to Nevada in the presidential election on NBC's The West Wing last year. Now Nevada is politics central in real life, overrun with Democratic White House candidates hoping to win the state's new early caucuses next year.

With eight prospects participating in a forum today, this small state capital is experiencing a crush of attention usually reserved for places like Keene, N.H. or Davenport, Iowa. "This is a whole new ballgame," says D. Taylor, president of the 60,000-member Culinary Union. He goes by his first initial.

Nevada's sudden clout arises from its new Jan. 19 slot on the Democratic primary calendar, between the Iowa caucuses (Jan. 14) and the New Hampshire primary that start the nomination season. Two questions surround Nevada: Can the state pull it off? Will New Hampshire, now slated for Jan. 22, move earlier to stay second?

The Democrats' elevation of Nevada reflects their rising hopes for political success in Western states. President Bush won Nevada by less than 3 percentage points in 2004.

"If they want to be elected president … they have to win the West now," says Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "That's why the caucuses are here and the convention will be in Denver."

Nevada adds diversity to the crucial early phase of the Democratic nomination process in ways that go well beyond geography. It is fast-growing — it fell to second place last year in growth rate after spending 19 years in first, according to the U.S. Census Bureau. It is nearly one-quarter Hispanic. The state also has more than 166,000 union members — nearly 15% of the Nevada workforce, compared with 12% nationally. Unions are growing. One example: The Culinary Union has tripled in the past 15 years.

Jean Hessburg, who ran the Iowa caucuses in 2004, now is managing the Nevada caucuses and says she expects them to be as big a draw for candidates as Iowa. "None of them is secure enough to skip a state" early on, she says. "They'll all play. You can tell that even now."

Today's forum, sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, is the first of at least five multicandidate events between now and the caucuses. With the exception of Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, all of the Democratic prospects RSVP'd yes. Obama pleaded a scheduling conflict and, warding off hard feelings, campaigned in the state last weekend.

DOJ_NMG_0134921

State Senate Minority Leader Dina Titus gets a taste of her new powerbroker role this morning. She scheduled back-to-back, 45-minute meet-and-greets, complete with coffee and Danish, for New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack and Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd. Delaware Sen. Joseph Biden had breakfast with legislators Tuesday.

"We're very excited," Titus says. "The Republicans are regretting they didn't do something like this."

Actually not, says Zac Moyle, executive director of the Nevada GOP, which holds a primary in April 2008. He says Republican presidential candidates visit the state often while Democrats are just showing up now. Furthermore, he says, they're playing catch-up because "over the last 10 years, Republicans have had the better grass-roots organization."

Still, he says, "Any time Nevada gets attention, that's a good thing."

Reid and other Western Democrats say they expect candidates will be talking more about Western issues such as land and water use. Nevada Democrats plan to use the caucuses to strengthen their party.

Eric Herzik, a political scientist at the University of Nevada in Reno, says they could be on the right track. "Anything they can do to get the mobilization started should help them," he says.

Jon Ralston, a columnist and commentator on state politics, says Democrats "failed miserably at outreach" in the last two elections and wonders if they can overcome a huge vote deficit in rural Nevada, where turnout is high.

Overall turnout in general elections here is weak, dragged down by low turnout in urban areas such as Las Vegas. In 2000, less than 44% of the voting-age population turned out — one of the lowest rates in the nation. In 2004, when Nevada's mid-February caucuses drew no special attention, about 10,000 Democrats showed.

"This is a big experiment," says Titus. "Everybody works around the clock. People don't belong to organizations much. They don't have neighborhood coffee shops." But there are other ways to reach potential voters, she says, such as through their unions and during shift changes at hotels and casinos.

The shift work causes concerns about participation on caucus day, says Hessburg. In Iowa, caucuses are held on a single evening in libraries, high schools, living rooms and firehouses.

Here, she says, Democrats are discussing ways to make the Nevada caucuses more accessible to shift workers. One idea would be to create a "precinct" that consists of workers at a certain hotel on a certain shift, then holding a caucus in the hotel ballroom at lunch hour.

Another challenge for Democrats is to register and activate Hispanics. Titus says their turnout is "notoriously low." She says help may come from the Southwest Voter Registration and Education Project and the campaign of New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, who is Hispanic.

Titus and other top Democrats say they will endorse a candidate at some point. Reid, however, says he doubts he will: "I have to work with four of these folks running."

Three Questions On Iraq War Must Be Put To Obama, Edwards (HILL)

By Lanny Davis

The Hill, February 21, 2007

Who won the issue of whether a vote for the 2002 Iraq war resolution was or was not a “mistake” at the time, I have three questions for former Democratic North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and Democratic Illinois Sen. Barack Obama that, for some reason, at least as far as I know, no one in the press has yet asked:

First, did you believe in October 2002 that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction — at least chemical and biological weapons, and possibly the beginnings of a nuclear program?

If the answer is yes (which I am assuming, since virtually everyone else did, including the majority of Senate Democrats who voted for the war resolution), then the second question is:

Do you still say it would have been a mistake to vote for the authorization even if you believed that Saddam in fact had WMD?

If the answer to that question is yes — and that appears to be the case as of now — then the third question must be asked and answered:

What would you have done to cause Saddam to dismantle and give up the WMD, once and for all?

A realistic, concrete answer is called for — especially because Mr. Edwards implicitly, if not explicitly, has criticized Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) for not stating she made a “mistake” in voting for the resolution. (Obama, it must be said, has not taken any shots directly at Clinton on this issue — as contrasted to John Edwards, although he reminds audiences that he was opposed to the war resolution, albeit while he was an Illinois state, not U.S., Senator.)

If their answer is to keep the U.N. inspection in place and to not worry about Saddam’s ability to hide the WMD in a hole in the desert or sell them to al Qaeda, then they should at least admit that that is a fairly major gamble in the case they turn out to be wrong. And they should at least concede to someone else making the good-faith judgment that Saddam needed to be taken out to avoid this danger. To repeat — a majority of U.S. Democratic senators made the same judgment, and only two — Sens. Edwards and John Kerry (D-Mass.) — have said their vote was a "mistake" — but without being forced to answer these three follow-up questions.

DOJ_NMG_0134922

It isn't really credible for Mr. Edwards and Sen. Obama to say now that they never believed Saddam had WMD back then. That must be deemed wisdom gained by hindsight — since neither one said so at the time (Obama as a state senator not facing the reality of having to cast the October 2002 Senate war authorization vote and John Edwards voting for it).

They can't duck these questions if they are allowing (or encouraging) the anti-war Democratic electorate to pressure candidates to admit they made a "mistake."

Although I am an ardent Iraq war critic and from the earliest days had serious doubts about granting the president discretionary authority to go to preemptive war in October 2002, I believe Sen. Clinton (whom I am supporting for president) has shown integrity and courage in refusing to pander to state that the vote at the time was a "mistake" — given the information and belief she had concerning Saddam's WMD AND the clear conditions she set in her Senate speech explaining her vote. First she stated her belief that Saddam had WMD and was ready to use them.

"It is clear … that if left unchecked," she said on the Senate floor, "Saddam Hussein will continue to increase his capacity to wage biological and chemical warfare, and will keep trying to develop nuclear weapons."

Second, she said she trusted President Bush to comply with two understandings about his use of the authorization power — that he wouldn't "rush to war" without allies and international support and that he would go to war only as a "last resort."

As she said on the Senate floor prior to her vote:

"A vote for the [the resolution] is not a vote to rush to war; it is a vote that puts awesome responsibility in the hands of our president and we say to him: Use these powers wisely and as a last resort …"

If she (and a majority of her Democratic senatorial colleagues) made a mistake, it was not the vote to authorize, based as it was on a belief in Saddam's WMD, but in trusting President Bush to comply with both of those understandings.

When she was in New Hampshire several weeks ago she stated, now with the benefit of hindsight, that she would not have voted for the resolution had she known then what she knows now — indeed, she notes that there would have been no vote at all, meaning the Democrats would and could have blocked a vote.

So the next time Mr. Edwards and Sen. Obama are in New Hampshire, the same questioner who insisted on Sen. Clinton admitting to the vote as a "mistake" in fairness should ask them these three questions.

The irony here is that Sen. Clinton is often criticized for seeming to be too calculating and opportunistic in taking positions on issues. Yet here she is standing on the truth and the facts known at the time, and refusing to pander and rewrite history.

Will Sen. Obama and Mr. Edwards at least grant her position as one of consistency, taken in good faith?

Lanny Davis writes for The Hill website's Pundits Blog (pundits.thehill.com). He is a partner in the Washington, D.C. office of the law firm Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe. A resident of Potomac, Md., he has authored several books and been a commentator on many TV political programs.

The Latino Revolution (HILL)

The Hill, February 21, 2007

A revolution is underway among America's Latino population that will have profound implications for the future of American politics. Of the 41.3 million Hispanics in the United States today, 37 percent identify themselves as "born-again" or "evangelical." Just 10 years ago, the proportion that did so was about 15 percent. All told, there are now about 11 million Evangelical Protestant and 3 million Evangelical or Charismatic Catholic Latinos in the United States. In 1996, there were only 4 million.

This explosive growth in Evangelical religious affiliation among Latinos — about 1 million converts annually — portends huge changes for American politics. With the Latino population swelling from 22 million in 1990 to 41 million in 2004, any change of these proportions in the beliefs of Hispanic-Americans will have a momentous impact on politics.

Evangelicals, of any race or ethnicity, are fertile ground for Republicans and may provide a huge opening to swing the formerly Democratic Hispanic vote toward a more even-handed stance or even make it a core element of an emerging Republican majority.

I recently met with Rev. Sam Rodriquez, the leader of the national association of Evangelical Latino churches. He's a Republican dream: pro-life, anti-gay marriage, and a Bush voter. He notes that the growing religious faith and the increase in Evangelical enrollment — particularly in the Pentecostal Church — may presage a sea change in Hispanic political affiliations.

Unfortunately, the hostile reception immigration reform has received from the GOP side of the aisle in Washington is turning off the very voters the Republicans can now, for the first time, hope to attract to their side. Based on a fear of Democratic domination of the Hispanic vote, Republican insistence on barring the way to citizenship and voting rights for undocumented or illegal immigrants may drive these very potential Republican supporters back into Democratic arms.

DOJ_NMG_0134923

The Latino population is clearly the jump ball in American politics. While now only 8 percent of the registered voters — but 14 percent of the population — the Hispanic vote is going to swell in the coming decade and tip the 50-50 balance now prevailing between the two parties. Red states like Texas, Arizona and Florida may become sharply and suddenly blue when Hispanic voting reaches its full potential among those currently here, not to count those who will come in the future. Texas, for example, is now a majority-minority state in population. Its GOP affiliation is an artifact of the past if the Hispanic vote goes Democratic.

But the fervent religiosity and increasing support for Evangelical positions and thinking among Hispanics may be the saving grace for the GOP if they let it happen. According to the Rev. Rodriquez, half of Evangelical conversions among American Latinos occur in their home country; half take place after they enter the United States. The handwriting is clearly on the wall — traditional Catholicism is on the wane among America's Hispanics. Can Democratic affiliation be similarly in danger?

In 2000, Gore carried America's Hispanics by 30 points. But Bush's ardent cultivation of the Latino vote paid off in 2004 and Kerry carried them by only 10 points. However, the best efforts of Republican congressmen like Tom Tancredo (R-Colo.) succeeded only in driving Latinos back into the arms of Democrats: They voted Democratic in 2006 by 47 points.

It's time for the Republican Party to start thinking of its future and embrace the basic tenets of immigration reform to win the inevitably increasing proportion of the U.S. vote cast by Hispanics.

It is pure folly to say that we will force 11 million people back across the border in order to obtain legal entry. Such a forced population movement would be unparalleled in American history and would be reminiscent of German-Polish-Russian forced migrations during the years right before, during, and after World War II.

Immigration reform calls for an earned path to citizenship that most Americans can and should support. If Latinos work, pay taxes, do not commit crimes, and learn English for several years, they should be able to become citizens. These requirements are not applied to any other immigrants and are due penance for illegal entry into the United States.

It's time Republicans awakened to the political opportunities of Evangelical Hispanic conversions and got with the program.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of "Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race." To get all of Dick Morris's and Eileen McGann's columns for free by email, go to www.dickmorris.com.

Biden's Son Sues Ex-Partner (WP/BLOOM)

By Jenny Strasburg And Thom Weidlich

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

R. Hunter Biden, a Washington lobbyist, accused a former business partner of lying about his professional credentials and finances after they agreed to buy a hedge fund investment firm in 2006, according to a complaint in New York state court.

Biden, son of Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), and James Biden, the senator's brother, countersued Anthony Lotito Jr. on Feb. 13, saying he hid debts and falsely claimed he held securities licenses to lure them as partners in the planned $21.3 million acquisition. Lotito also persuaded the Bidens to hire a lawyer who had been convicted of fraud, according to the complaint.

"Had James and Hunter Biden known the truth about Anthony Lotito, they never would have gone into business with him," says the complaint, which accuses Lotito of fraud and seeks at least $10 million.

Lotito, 49, sued the Bidens on Jan. 5, claiming that they illegally excluded him from a takeover of New York-based Paradigm Cos. while negotiating a better deal for themselves. The Bidens now control Paradigm. The dispute highlights Hunter Biden's unusual dual roles as lobbyist and investment executive at a time when hedge funds face greater regulatory scrutiny.

Hunter Biden, 37, stepped down last month from daily oversight of Paradigm Global Advisors, a unit of Paradigm, which has about $500 million in client money invested in hedge funds. Biden became chairman of the firm, founded in 1991. He remains a lobbyist with Oldaker, Biden & Belair of the District, where he is partner and founder. James Biden, 57, is not involved in Paradigm's management.

Last year, the Bidens agreed to a partnership with Lotito that would pay him $25,000 a month to find investors for the Paradigm buyout, with an Oct. 31 deadline to close the transaction. Lotito "failed to secure even one investor" and all agreed in September to end the partnership, LBB Holdings USA, according to the Bidens' complaint.

They also claim that Lotito "fraudulently induced them" to hire John Fasciana, a New York lawyer, to represent the partnership in negotiations with Paradigm. Fasciana had been convicted in July 2005 on federal charges of conspiracy and wire and mail fraud related to a scheme to steal millions of dollars from Electronic Data Systems of Plano, Tex., the world's second-largest computer-services company. Fasciana was sentenced in November to four years in prison. He has appealed.

Separately, Fasciana sued the Bidens and Lotito in August, seeking $198,000 in legal fees he says they owe him. The Bidens denied the claim in November and countersued Fasciana, saying he overbilled and defrauded them by hiding his conviction.

DOJ_NMG_0134924

In his lawsuit, Lotito is seeking at least $100 million on claims of fraud and breach of fiduciary duty. He says the Bidens lied to him while agreeing Aug. 11 to take over Paradigm for an $8.1 million promissory note, or guarantee of payment.

Lotito says the Bidens, as his partners in LBB, were obligated to inform him of their competing bid for Paradigm. Instead, Lotito claims, they told him that the firm had "substantial liabilities" and little chance of success.

Lotito claims that he introduced Hunter Biden to Paradigm executives in January 2006 to help Biden find work outside of lobbying. According to Lotito's complaint, Sen. Biden said he was concerned that Hunter Biden's lobbying might affect his planned presidential campaign.

"It is apparent that Mr. Lotito is only invoking Senator Biden's name to garner media attention," Alan Hoffman, the senator's chief of staff, said in an e-mail yesterday. The senator is not a defendant in Lotito's complaint.

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Any allies left?

A White House pool report described yesterday's arrival of Vice President Dick Cheney in Tokyo, where he was "greeted by some extremely loud sound trucks" and "one unmistakable chant blaring from one of the trucks in a Japanese-accented male voice, chanting in English: 'Yankee go home, Yankee go home.' "

Stretched thin

FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III's recent testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee that FBI referrals for counterterrorism cases increased a whopping 671 percent between 2001 and 2003 -- and to this day require "difficult choices in determining how to most effectively use the available agents" -- did not go unheeded.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware has introduced legislation to add 1,000 FBI agents to the bureau's roster, all to focus exclusively on traditional criminal cases. Estimated cost: $160 million per year.

Gone private

Ambassador Cofer Black, the former ambassador-at-large and coordinator for counterterrorism at the State Department, and Rob Richer, who was the CIA's No. 2 for counterintelligence, will create a new "CIA-type" organization to address intelligence needs in the private sector.

"Terror attacks," "political instability," "avian-flu outbreaks," and even severe weather events will be on the radar of the company, which the pair names Total Intelligence Solutions.

Don't slurp

One-hundred guests at Teatro Goldoni's "Carnevale" last night were certainly watching their manners.

Judith Martin, aka "Miss Manners," was honorary queen at the lavish Save Venice Benefit, seated alongside honorary king Eric Denker, curator and senior lecturer at the National Gallery of Art.

The popular etiquette columnist and author of 12 books, who spent part of her youth in Europe, has a new release due out next month, "No Vulgar Hotel: The Desire And Pursuit of Venice." Considered the definitive manual for the hopeless Venetophile, she emphasizes:

"Love of Venice can strike anyone, not just romantic [weaklings]. Among the toughies with serious cases were Lord Byron, Richard Wagner, Ezra Pound and Ernest Hemingway. There is no cure for this affliction."

After an evening of Venetian cuisine and wine presented by Teatro's chef-owner Fabrizio Aielli and Marco Bolla, owner of Ristorante Lineadombra in Venice, guests were indeed "stricken" with Venetian charm.

Stone by stone

It's some two years behind schedule and about double the anticipated cost, but the much-anticipated underground U.S. Capitol Visitor Center just about has its final stone in place.

At nearly 580,000 square feet, or three-quarters the size of the U.S. Capitol itself, this $600 million polished cellar features a Great Hall, Exhibition Hall, congressional auditorium and Senate and House theaters, accented with marble, granite, solid wood, bronze and glass -- both floor panels and skylights.

Stone masons have placed the Tennessee Valley marble in basket-weave patterns, while on the Rotunda level the last stones are now being set at a pace of 70 per day.

Major construction should wrap up in the next few weeks, with a likely grand opening in early 2008.

Beats checkers

Jim Martin, president of the 60 Plus Association, the nonpartisan seniors advocacy group in Washington, is sitting at home convalescing from neck surgery 10 days ago.

"Who says basketball is not a contact sport?" Mr. Martin said when reached yesterday. "I'm wearing a neck brace for four more weeks, but this is the price I pay to be able to play in the Senior Olympics in mid-June in Louisville, Kentucky."

Mr. Martin's squad of seniors are the Virginia state basketball champions, and play three-on-three.

Professor Norton

That was Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, D.C. Democrat, bragging about the 100th anniversary of Hoyas basketball at Georgetown University, which is in the midst of another exciting season under head coach John Thompson III.

Mrs. Norton, many don't know, is a tenured faculty member of Georgetown University Law Center.

·John McCaslin, whose column is nationally syndicated, can be reached at 202/636-3284 or jmccaslin @washingtontimes.com.

What Does One Woman's Death Say About The Rest Of Us? (USAT)

By Douglas MacKinnon

USA Today, February 21, 2007

As our nation and world seemingly spin out of control, it's easy to understand why the passing of a proud, incredibly decent 65-year-old woman living alone would escape our attention.

Our somewhat fragile and overloaded minds can process only so much negative news at a time. With Iraq, Iran, the constant threat of terrorism, declining health care and global warming claiming center stage, we can certainly be excused if the death of one lonely individual went unnoticed.

But how this woman died should be of interest to us all.

On Jan. 17, Bessie Sanders of Washington was killed in a house fire. It was determined by the fire department that "Ms. Bessie," as she was known to neighbors, lost her life when the candle she was using for illumination in her bedroom accidentally started a fire. During the coldest part of the year, Ms. Bessie was using a candle for light because her electricity, gas and water had all been shut off.

In this country, the last remaining superpower, an elderly woman needlessly perished when her government failed her. Even as friends and neighbors alerted the District of Columbia that Ms. Bessie's utilities needed to be reactivated, according to The Washington Post, the bureaucracy apparently failed to do so because she did not personally make the call, and a Social Security number was not provided. District officials said they had no record of her asking for assistance.

Every winter, in most major cold-weather cities, stories such as Ms. Bessie's can be found. Of course, I'm willing to concede that I am sensitive to such news because most of my childhood was spent without electricity, gas, heating oil, water or phones. I grew up in abject poverty, living in Boston and parts of New England, and every winter was a crisis for my family. If my parents had no money for heating oil, we would use the gas stove to heat our home. If the gas was turned off, but we still had electricity, we would use space heaters. If all were shut off, my brother, sister and I often would go to sleep on the same mattress, covered by a thin blanket, watching our breath frost as we tried to stop shivering.

Like Ms. Bessie, we had to endure this pain because my parents refused to ask friends or family for help. Because of pride, shame or ignorance, three kids many years ago suffered, and an elderly woman of today died.

Iraq, terrorism, natural disasters and gang violence continue to fill our TV screens while, make no mistake, many of our fellow Americans go to sleep each winter night with no heat. How many of them, like Ms. Bessie, don't survive the experience? Clearly it happens, clearly it's preventable, and clearly it's a disgrace.

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimate that about 600 Americans die each year from exposure to the cold. Many of them have incomes that fall below the poverty line, and many are elderly. Keep in mind, those 600 deaths do not include people such as Ms. Bessie, who lose their lives to the cold because of fire or carbon monoxide-related accidents.

After the loss of Ms. Bessie, Terry Lynch, executive director of the non-profit Downtown Clusters of Congregations, told The Washington Post that instead of sending letters offering help to those whose utilities have been shut off, maybe government officials should go door to door. Better than the government, neighbors and families need to go door to door. If not us, who?

In today's world, it's more crucial than ever to hold tightly to family and friends. Let the bad news we cannot control wash over our overloaded senses, and let us instead focus on the individual just down the street who may literally live or die based on our actions.

Ms. Bessie did not make it, but there are thousands like her who still need our help.

What's it going to be?

Douglas MacKinnon is a former White House and Pentagon official and author of America's Last Days.

Cheney Reassures Japan On NKorea (AFP)

By Olivier Knox

DOJ_NMG_0134926

AFP, February 21, 2007

US Vice President Dick Cheney reassured Japan that the breakthrough North Korea nuclear deal was a "good first step" after a worried Tokyo refused to fund the pact.

Cheney opened talks here at the start of a Pacific visit to close US allies Japan and Australia meant to step up cooperation over North Korea and war-torn Iraq.

Japan was one of six nations involved in marathon talks in Beijing last week that led to an agreement for North Korea to shut key nuclear facilities in exchange for badly needed fuel oil.

But Japan has refused to provide energy aid to the nuclear-armed communist regime until it resolves an emotionally charged row over the past kidnappings of Japanese nationals.

The vice president discussed the kidnappings among other issues in a breakfast meeting with Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki, said Cheney spokeswoman Lea Anne McBride.

Cheney told the Japanese government's number-two that the North Korea deal was "a good first step," McBride said. "They agreed to work together to watch North Korea."

The conservative vice president was due to meet later Wednesday with Prime Minister Shinzo Abe, who has built his career on the abduction issue, and Foreign Minister Taro Aso.

Cheney was later welcomed at the palace by Emperor Akihito, who bowed and then shook his hand and said their meeting would strengthen the US-Japan alliance.

He was due later to address US troops onboard the USS Kitty Hawk which is docked south of Tokyo.

At Japan's request, the vice president added a last-minute meeting Thursday with Sakie and Shigeru Yokota, the parents of the most famous abduction victim, Megumi Yokota.

Megumi was a 13-year-old schoolgirl when she was bundled aboard a North Korean ship off Japan's western coast in 1977. Pyongyang has admitted kidnapping her but says she is dead.

Her case has triggered an outpouring of sympathy in Japan and growing international attention, including a song about her plight released Wednesday by Paul Stookey of famed US folk trio Peter, Paul and Mary.

Her mother met President George W. Bush at the White House last year.

On the eve of his meeting with Cheney, Abe met the families of the abduction victims and vowed never to establish diplomatic ties with North Korea until the cases are settled.

Japan sees itself as a top target of North Korea, which fired a missile over the country's main island in 1998, and has championed a hard line against the isolated regime.

But since his Republican Party was trounced in November elections, Bush has increasingly backed diplomacy to resolve problems with North Korea, which in 2002 he said was part of an "axis of evil" with Iran and Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

Cheney is not scheduled to meet Japanese Defence Minister Fumio Kyuma, who caused a stir in January when he said Bush was "wrong" to invade Iraq. He also accused Washington of failing to address local concerns in Okinawa, which is home to half the 40,000 US troops in Japan.

Cheney will later head to Australia, where Prime Minister John Howard has talked of sending up to 70 additional military instructors to Iraq and deploying more troops in Afghanistan.

He will also meet opposition leader Kevin Rudd, who has refused to back any increase in troops to Iraq. Rudd overtook Howard in an opinion poll last week.

Cheney's Visit To Japan Exposes Tensions (FT)

By David Pilling

Financial Times, February 20, 2007

Fumio Kyuma, Japan' s outspoken defence minister, on Tuesday felt obliged to explain why he would not be meeting Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, who on Wednesday begins a visit to Japan during which security will take centre stage.

Mr Cheney, Mr Kyuma explained, could not be expected to meet a mere defence minister. "There is a difference in rank. It is a matter that pertains to the [Japanese] prime minister," he said.

Behind Mr Kyuma's humble remarks lie an awkward diplomatic moment. Earlier this month he lashed out at US foreign policy, saying Washington was wrong to invade Iraq and lambasting its arrogant attitude towards Okinawa, the island where the bulk of US troops in Japan are stationed.

Tokyo remains Washington's main regional ally, and the relationship is ro-bust enough to survive minor disagreements, analysts say. Yet Mr Kyuma's remarks provoked outrage among Japan-handlers in the Bush administration and the embarrassment that has followed is one of several points of contention.

DOJ_NMG_0134927

Japan continues to support US policy in Iraq, a point recently underlined by Shinzo Abe, prime minister, in a speech to Nato and again in parliament.

However, Taro Aso, foreign minister, suggested that Washington's post-invasion strategy had been naive.

Tokyo has begun to pull out 550 ground troops stationed in Iraq to help reconstruction. It has also, however, stepped up the activity of its air self-defence force, which helps to supply US troops in Iraq.

There has also been concern in Japan about the deal struck with North Korea to shut down its main nuclear facility in exchange for oil. Some Japanese officials have, sotto voce, criticised Washington for conceding too much to Pyongyang.

Robert Dujarric, a security expert at the National Institute for Public Policy in the US, said: "The impression is that the deal was hammered out between the US, China and North Korea and that no one asked the Japanese what they thought."

In particular, Mr Abe's government has been embarrassed by the fact that the deal did not address North Korean abductions of Japanese citizens, although a senior foreign ministry official has countered claims Japan had been sidelined.

"I don't think it is the policy of the US to speed ahead at 100 miles per hour and leave behind all the other issues, including the abduction issue," the official said. "All the other five parties, including North Korea, know there needs to be a huge participation by Japan."

US Visit To Asia Likely To Shore Up N-deal (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

John Negroponte's first mission as US deputy secretary of state is expected to take him to Asia next week to shore up last week's breakthrough deal with North Korea, under which Pyongyang is to close its nuclear bomb-making facilities in return for aid and peace talks.

Mr Negroponte, the former national director of intelligence who took up his new post last week, would visit China, South Korea and Japan, officials said.

One said Mr Negroponte also planned to add Pyongyang to his itinerary, though others either denied this or said such a trip was unlikely at this stage. A US state department spokesman said only: "We have nothing to announce at this time."

Mr Negroponte would be the most senior US official to visit Pyongyang since Madeleine Albright, then secretary of state, in October 2000.

Last month the Bush administration abandoned its opposition to bilateral talks with North Korea by allowing Christopher Hill, its chief negotiator, to engage directly his North Korean counterpart in talks in Berlin.

That led to the breakthrough at Chinese-brokered talks in Beijing on February 13, after nearly 18 months of impasse.

The Bush administration, in particular Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state, has been fiercely criticised by Washington hawks over last week's deal. Officials admitted that a high-level visit to Pyongyang would be controversial internally.

David Frum, analyst at the American Enterprise Institute, wrote that the deal with North Korea contained no more safeguards against cheating than the failed agreement between Pyongyang and the US in 1994.

Under that deal, North Korea agreed to freeze its Yongbyon nuclear facility but the deal fell apart in 2002 when the Bush administration accused the communist regime of secretly enriching uranium. Pyongyang then expelled United Nations inspectors and resumed operations at Yongbyon, which culminated in its first nuclear test last October.

Mr Frum warned that the current deal, which involves the US removing North Korea from its list of state sponsors of terrorism, would harm close relations with Japan, which has an unresolved issue over citizens kidnapped by North Korea.

Meanwhile, Dick Cheney, US vice-president, arrived in Japan yesterday on an Asian trip that will take him on to Australia.

John Howard, the Australian prime minister, said on Tuesday that George W. Bush had phoned him for a lengthy discussion on North Korea. "The president is realistically optimistic," Mr Howard said of the prospects for the deal with North Korea.

Robert Einhorn, a proliferation expert who was part of the US delegation to Pyongyang in 2000, said a high-level visit to North Korea was important to sustain momentum. But he thought Mr Hill would be more likely than Mr Negroponte to become the first senior US official to visit Pyongyang.

Mr Einhorn described some of the actions required of North Korea in the first 60 days of the agreement as "textbook" measures, including the return of UN inspectors and installation of fresh seals on equipment. at the Yongbyon facility.

But he said other steps, namely that North Korea list all its nuclear programmes, were likely to be more contentious.

Iran Sets Condition To Halt Nuke Program (AP)

By George Jahn

AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134928

Iran's chief nuclear envoy said Tuesday his country wants to negotiate over its uranium enrichment program, on the eve of a U.N. Security Council deadline that carries the threat of harsher sanctions. But the country's hard-line president said Iran will halt enrichment only if Western nations do the same.

Sanctions could be triggered by a report from Mohamed ElBaradei, the head of the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency, to his agency's 35 board-member nations, expected Wednesday. That report is expected to say Iran has expanded enrichment activities instead of freezing them.

President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, speaking to a crowd of thousands in Iran, said his country was ready to stop its enrichment program, but only if Western nations do the same — something the United States and others with similar programs are unlikely to even consider.

"Justice demands that those who want to hold talks with us shut down their nuclear fuel cycle program too," he said. "Then, we can hold dialogue under a fair atmosphere."

The White House dismissed Ahmadinejad's call.

"Do you believe that's a serious offer?" White House press secretary Tony Snow asked. "It's pretty clear that the international community has said to the Iranians, `You can have nuclear power but we don't want you to have the ability to build nuclear weapons.' And that is an offer we continue to make."

Nevertheless, Ahmadinejad's speech was unusually conciliatory, avoiding fiery denunciations of the West. Iran's call for talks — voiced separately on Tuesday by Ahmadinejad, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and senior nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani — suggested an attempt to convey flexibility on the eve of the deadline.

Mottaki, in Turkey, said talks on the nuclear dispute should try to achieve an agreement allowing "Iran to achieve its rights" while eliminating "concerns" about its nuclear ambitions. Larijani, in Vienna, said his country was "looking for ways and means to start negotiations."

But the officials did not offer what the Security Council is demanding — an immediate and unconditional stop to enrichment. Iran has long insisted that it will not stop its nuclear activities as a condition for negotiations to start.

The United States and its allies suspect that Iran is using its nuclear program to produce an atomic weapon — charges Iran denies, saying its aim is to generate electricity. Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel, but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb.

Asked what Iran was seeking, Larijani said: "Constructive dialogue that could ... address the concerns" of both Tehran, which insists on enrichment as its right, and the world powers that fear the program would be used to develop nuclear arms.

While telling reporters his country was prepared to deliver "assurances that there would be no deviation ... toward a nuclear weapons program," he offered no new suggestions — and indirectly ruled out suspending enrichment, saying that was just a "pretext" to put political pressure on his country.

Larijani was even more direct in rejecting an enrichment freeze as a precondition for negotiations in talks with ElBaradei, according to diplomats familiar with the substance of their conversation.

"He ruled out suspension and said Iran was not afraid of (U.N.) sanctions," one of the diplomats told The Associated Press, speaking on condition of anonymity because his information was confidential. The diplomat said Larijani told ElBaradei that Iran could consider an enrichment freeze only as a result of talks — and not before sitting down at the negotiating table.

Iran has rejected the Security Council resolution as "illegal," and said it would not give up its right to enrich under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Tehran's refusal to freeze all its enrichment-related activities prompted the U.N. Security Council on Dec. 23 to impose sanctions targeting its nuclear and missile programs and persons involved in them. Back then, it gave the country 60 days to halt enrichment or face additional measures — a deadline that expires Wednesday.

Still, no sanctions were expected immediately.

Discussions on a new resolution aimed at stepping up pressure on Iran to suspend enrichment are expected to start next week, a Security Council diplomat said in New York, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

The council debate will focus on what new nonmilitary sanctions to include in a resolution, the European diplomat said. Possible new sanctions could include a travel ban against individuals on the U.N. list, an expansion of the list, economic measures such as a ban on export guarantees to Iran, and an expansion of the nuclear embargo to an arms embargo, the council diplomat said.

But Russia and China, both veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran, are likely to oppose economic sanctions or weapons bans. A travel ban was dropped from the initial resolution because of Moscow's opposition, so tough negotiations are expected, the diplomat said.

Striking a combative note after meeting ElBaradei, Larijani warned the United States against opting for force instead of negotiations over the issue of enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0134929

"If they ... move into the boxing ring, they would have problems," Larijani told reporters in response to a question about U.S. pressure on Iran to give up enrichment. "But if they sit at the chess table, then both sides would come to a result."

With the U.S. recently moving against Iranians whom it accuses of helping Shiite militias in Iraq and beefing up its naval presence in the Persian Gulf, Larijani's comments were seen as veiled warnings that any additional U.S. weight on his country would be met in kind.

"Anybody interested in ... irrational moves ... would definitely receive an appropriate response," he said.

Iran has brought its war games maneuvers over the past year into busy shipping lanes in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow mouth of the Persian Gulf through which two-fifths of the world's oil supplies pass, the top U.S. Navy commander in the Mideast said.

The moves have alarmed U.S. officials about possible accidental confrontations that could boil over into war, and led to the recent buildup of Navy forces in the Gulf, Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh said in an interview with the AP and other reporters in Bahrain.

The carrier USS John C. Stennis — backed by a strike group with more than 6,500 sailors and Marines and with additional minesweeping ships — arrived in the region Monday. It joined the carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower after President Bush ordered the buildup as a show of strength to Iran.

U.S. Rebuffs Iran On Eve Of Deadline (WSJ/AP)

Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Bush administration officials dismissed Iran's unusually conciliatory comments made on the eve of a United Nations deadline to suspend uranium enrichment. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said in a speech he would halt enrichment and enter "fair talks" so long as the West took similar measures. Iran's foreign minister and its main nuclear negotiator also called for talks. White House spokesman Tony Snow called Mr. Ahmadinejad's pledge a "false offer." The administration hopes to push for new sanctions next month.

Tehran Defiant As Deadline Nears (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Iranian leaders yesterday vowed to defy international pressure on the eve of a United Nations deadline demanding that Tehran halt its suspect nuclear programs or face new, harsher sanctions.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the U.N. nuclear monitoring arm, is expected to announce today that Iran has failed to meet a 60-day deadline set by the U.N. Security Council to suspend enrichment of uranium, a key step in the development of nuclear weapons.

The Bush administration dismissed a new offer from hard-line Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to shut down Iran's nuclear facilities if the United States and the West do the same.

"Do you believe that's a serious offer?" said White House press secretary Tony Snow. Added State Department spokesman Tom Casey, "I'm afraid what we're seeing so far is just more of the same defiance."

Iran insists that it has the right to pursue a nuclear program for civilian power needs, but the United States and European Union say past Iranian efforts to hide the extent of its program show that Tehran is secretly pursuing nuclear weapons.

The U.N. Security Council in December approved a series of targeted sanctions on Iran's nuclear research programs. The council held out the prospect of broader sanctions if Iran did not cooperate, but stopped short of threatening military action.

No action is expected today by the Security Council. Mr. Casey said intensive negotiations are already under way among the five permanent members of the Security Council -- the United States, Britain, France, Russia and China -- about a new resolution imposing new penalties and restrictions on Iran.

Moscow and Beijing have been reluctant to back the Bush administration's hard line on Iran and successfully held out against any mention of military action against Tehran in the nuclear dispute. But U.S. officials were encouraged by reports this week that Russia may delay the delivery of fuel for a planned nuclear plant it is building for Iran in the southern city of Bushehr. A spokesman for the Russian atomic energy agency said yesterday the possible delay is because of problems in receiving payment.

"I do think it's very clear to us that the Russians share our concerns about Iran's nuclear program," Mr. Casey said.

The United States has refused to rule out military action against Iran, but President Bush has said repeatedly that he wants to solve the conflict through diplomacy.

DOJ_NMG_0134930

Mr. Ahmadinejad told a gathering in northern Iran yesterday that Tehran would halt its uranium enrichment activities, but only if the United States and other nuclear powers did the same.

"If you want to speak from a position of power and make use of the oppressing leverage of some international institutions, you have to know that you will fail against the unity and resistance of the Iranian nation," he said.

Nevertheless, Mr. Ahmadinejad's speech was considered unusually conciliatory, avoiding fiery denunciations of the West.

In Vienna, Austria, Iran's chief nuclear envoy said yesterday his country wants to negotiate over its uranium enrichment program.

Ali Larijani said the impasse over Iran's nuclear programs "cannot by resolved through force and pressure."

Mr. Larijani met with IAEA Director Mohamed ElBaradei ahead of the release of today's report.

In Turkey, Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said talks on the nuclear dispute should try to achieve an agreement allowing "Iran to achieve its rights" while eliminating "concerns" about its nuclear ambitions.

Iran's call for talks -- voiced separately by Mr. Ahmadinejad, Mr. Mottaki and Mr. Larijani -- suggested an attempt to convey flexibility on the eve of the deadline.

Duke University political scientist Bruce W. Jentleson, in an analysis for the Century Foundation, said it was "virtually certain" that the United Nations will stop short of a total embargo of Iran, which boasts some of the world's largest oil and natural gas reserves.

But he said more limited options are on the table, including: tougher restrictions on Iran's nuclear programs; limits of investment in Iran's energy sector; a freeze on Iranian assets abroad; a cutoff of military sales; targeted sanctions on top Iranian leaders; and general economic sanctions such as boycotting key Iranian exports, banning international flights and opposing Iran's World Trade Organization membership.

International Pressure Mounts On Iran (FT)

By Daniel Dombey

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Iran was on Tuesday struggling to stave off further a fresh round of international censure as controversy over its nuclear programme continued to mount.

In Vienna, Ali Larijani, the Islamic Republic's top nuclear negotiator, met Mohamed ElBaradei, the United Nations' chief nuclear inspector, who will is due to pronounce on Tehran's nuclear activities today.

Speaking to the Financial Times this week, Mr ElBaradei did not bother to hide his near-conviction that Iran would fail to meet UN demands to curb uranium enrichment, a process that can generate both nuclear fuel and weapons grade material.

His observations indicate that Tehran is stepping up its commitment to a nuclear programme. Iran says its purposes are purely peaceful, but its claims protestations are viewed with increasing scepticism and disbelief. in Europe and are downright disbelieved in the US.

Yesterday, in a rhetorical flourish, Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's president, challenged the west to suspend its own uranium enrichment. sidestepping the argument that Tehran should not be allowed permitted such activities because it had hidden its nuclear programme. in the past.

Many western diplomats question why Iran is accelerating its enrichment activities while Bushehr, the nuclear power plant the uranium is intended to feed, is behind schedule and was delayed further this week because of Iran's alleged failure to pay its Russian contractors.

"Iran sees enrichment . . . as a strategic goal because they feel that this will bring them power, prestige and influence," Mr ElBaradei told the FT. "They feel that this will bring them into the company of some of the large and influential [states], the 12, 13 countries with enrichment processing, even if they don't have a weapon."

One common argument is that countries with an extensive enrichment infrastructure can are able to "break out to become nuclear weapon states in a matter of months.

Last year Ernst Uhrlau, the head of German intelligence, said Tehran could not would not be able to produce enough material for a nuclear bomb before 2010 and could would only be able to only make it into a weapon by only about 2015.

Mr ElBaradei's last report, issued in November, said that since August Tehran had used two "cascades" of 164 centrifuges apiece to enrich uranium in a research facility at its Tehran plants.

Spinning uranium in a system of centrifuges increases the levels of the isotope uranium 235. A level of about 3 per cent serves as nuclear fuel; a level of above 90 per cent constitutes weapons grade material.

Mr ElBaradei suggested Iran's test centrifuges were now functioning smoothly after early teething pains. He added that Iran had installed a further 164-centrifuge cascade in the subterranean facility in Natanz, and that the country could be six months to a year away from operating an industrial size cascade of 3,000 centrifuges.

DOJ_NMG_0134931

If 3,000 centrifuges ran smoothly for a year, they could produce enough material for a bomb.

But Iran uses “P-1” centrifuges it acquired from the black market network of AQ Khan, the father of Pakistan’s bomb. They centrifuges are copies of a copy of a Dutch model. They crash and are much flimsier and hence slower than their modern day equivalents. “Using P1s in this way is like competing at Le Mans with a Model T Ford,” said a western diplomat. “You will get around in the end, but it will take much much longer.”And one malfunctioning centrifuge within the cascade is enough to bring the whole cascade down.

If Iran did acquires enough fissile material with the intent to weaponise it, other stages are would still be necessary. The uranium must would have need to be cast into metal, packed into an explosive device and if it were to be targeted at other countries, fitted into a missile warhead.

Meir Dagan, the head of Israel’s Mossad, the Israeli intelligence agency, in December told the Knesset that by 2008, Iran would be able to develop 25kg of highly enriched uranium – enough for a bomb – and a weapon the following year.

His calculations seem appear to assume that Iran will be able to spin the uranium without technical hitches from almost the moment that the centrifuges are installed and that Tehran will ould be able to use its mixture of imported Pakistani and North Korean technology to weaponise the material in a matter of months.

The technical shortcomings of Iran’s programme might mean it that Iran will take much longer to develop nuclear capacity. But even after today’s report nobody will be able to know for sure.

Table Talk (WSJ)

By Michael Rubin And Danielle Pletka

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

Iran faces a deadline today to suspend its enrichment of uranium or, according to the terms of a U.N. Security Council resolution unanimously adopted last December, face further sanctions. While it is only proper that the world wait for the deadline to pass before responding, Tehran's answer is already clear. Gholam Reza Aghzadeh, head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, has said that "Iran will not comply with the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1737."

How will the West respond? Earlier this month Sir Richard Dalton, until recently Britain's ambassador in Tehran, called for direct talks between U.S. and Iranian officials and suggested the West modify demands that the Islamic Republic suspend uranium enrichment. Unfortunately, his eagerness for dialogue is being echoed and amplified elsewhere, especially in the wake of the Bush administration's deal to pay North Korea for similar disarmament. Needless to say, former luminaries such as ex-Secretary of State Madeleine Albright and President Jimmy Carter think sitting down with the mullahs is a very good idea, Security Council resolutions notwithstanding.

Why not talk? The logic of engagement sounds good. But experience shows that engagement means something different in Iran than in the West.

In May 1992, for example, then German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel launched a "critical dialogue" with Tehran. Berlin sought to use trade and incentives to encourage the Islamic Republic to alter its behavior. And, indeed, it did. But not in the way Mr. Kinkel expected.

On Sept. 17, 1992, Iranian hit men assassinated three Iranian dissidents and their translator in a Berlin restaurant. The subsequent German investigation determined that Iranian Supreme Leader Ali Khamenei, President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani and Foreign Minister Ali Velayati ordered the murders. What about the dialogue? "We don't give a damn about your ending the critical dialogue," said Supreme Leader Khamenei upon hearing the German court ruling. "We never sought such a dialogue."

Neither Iran's terrorism nor intelligence indications of an accelerating nuclear weapons program dampened European enthusiasm for engagement, however, especially after the election of President Muhammad Khatami and his subsequent call for a "dialogue of civilizations." "There is more to be said for trying to engage and to draw these societies into the international community than to cut them off," EU External Affairs Commissioner Chris Patten explained in February 2002. And engage they did.

Between 2000 and 2005, EU trade with Iran almost tripled. Officials from both sides of the Atlantic fawned on the "reformist" Mr. Khatami. But the rapprochement -- including an embarrassing "apology" for past American sins against Iran from Ms. Albright -- did not stop Mr. Khatami from flying to Moscow in March 2001 to sign a $7 billion arms and nuclear technology deal. Indeed, under Mr. Khatami, Tehran spent more on arms than it had under Hashemi Rafsanjani.

Iran's exploitation of engagement to advance its agenda is the rule rather than the exception. In December 2001, in the midst of what many cite as the heyday of Iran-U.S. cooperation in Afghanistan, Iranian forces dispatched 50 tons of weaponry to Palestinian militiamen to derail a U.S.- and European-brokered ceasefire between Israeli and Palestinian forces. On June 8,

DOJ_NMG_0134932

2002, three days after a Palestinian Islamic Jihad suicide bus bomber killed 17 Israelis, the Islamic Republic announced a 70% increase in that group's funding.

Western efforts to game the Iranian system, in short, misunderstand the nature of politics in the Islamic Republic. Politicians rise and fall, but the supreme leader's authority remains supreme. Rhetoric notwithstanding, the president is more figurehead than commander. Factional differences add color to the Iranian scene, and there are nuances in economic and social policies. But politicians do not alter the regime's ideological underpinnings.

Upon his accession to supreme leader, analysts labeled Mr. Khamenei a weak compromise candidate. They underestimated him, and all who have attempted to encroach upon his power have found themselves marginalized. Iranians once speculated upon Tehran mayor Gholamhossein Karbaschi's meteoric rise. A stint in prison ended that.

In 2005, Mr. Khamenei rigged elections to teach frontrunner Mr. Rafsanjani a lesson. The result was Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. And as Mr. Ahmadinejad himself has proven obstreperous, Mr. Khamenei has built alternative institutions to undercut him.

Still, the Iranian government is not monolithic, and many academics argue that outreach to more pragmatic factions might encourage them at the hardliners' expense. This is American mirror imaging at its worst: Mr. Ahmadinejad may be a bad guy, but that doesn't make Mr. Rafsanjani a pragmatist or Mr. Khatami a reformer. On key issues relating to nuclear enrichment and terror sponsorship, their differences are rhetorical, not substantive. Thus the "pragmatic" Mr. Rafsanjani on Feb. 1, 2007, dismissing U.N. demands to throttle back nuclear enrichment: "We will break the [international] consensus through wisdom and bravery and foil U.S. conspiracies against Iran."

Despite the Iranian government's unified commitment to forge ahead with the nuclear program, some Western observers persist in their belief that the Islamic Republic is searching for a graceful way back from the brink. They point to mounting economic hardship inside Iran and a backlash against President Ahmadinejad's demagoguery. Couldn't engagement empower his critics?

This makes no sense. Dialogue and the attendant relaxation of U.N. sanctions will strengthen and validate the Ahmadinejad regime.

Far from being susceptible to Western machinations, the Iranians have proven adept at manipulating us. Consider that, since the beginning of the current tensions, the West has retreated from demands that Iran cease conversion of yellowcake to uranium gas and end enrichment entirely to the current demand for nothing more than a temporary suspension of uranium enrichment activities. And all this while Iran funneled weapons to Hezbollah, shipped explosives into Iraq and defied Security Council resolutions.

Proposals for renewed engagement may be well-intentioned, but they are naïve and dangerous, and indeed will undercut any possibility of a diplomatic solution. Let's review the current situation.

On Sept. 24, 2005, the International Atomic Energy Agency determined that Iran was in violation of its nuclear non-proliferation safeguards agreement. Still, the IAEA deferred referral to the U.N. Security Council to give diplomacy a chance. After consulting with her European partners, on May 31, 2006, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice offered Tehran two ways forward: Either Iran could defy its international commitments and "incur only great costs," or it could suspend enrichment and enjoy "real benefit and longer-term security." The Iranian regime chose to forego the benefit. On Dec. 23, 2006, the U.N. Security Council unanimously imposed sanctions.

The 60-day deadline to comply with U.N. demands is up, so what next? Those eager to sit down with Tehran say that dialogue does not mean abandoning sanctions. This is hardly serious. Washington has already offered and delivered inducements to the regime -- a clear path to World Trade Organization accession and spare aircraft parts -- in exchange for behavior modification. In response, Tehran has offered no confidence-building measures. All that remains are direct talks, and even there, Washington has dropped the price from ending Iran's nuclear program to a temporary suspension of enrichment.

The Security Council has spoken. To change course now would signal the impotence of international institutions and multilateral diplomacy. History shows that when the supreme leader believes Western resolve is faltering, Iran will be more defiant and dangerous. Now is not the time to talk. If Washington and Europe truly believe in the primacy of multilateralism and diplomacy, now is the time to ratchet up the pressure.

Ms. Pletka and Mr. Rubin are, respectively, vice president for foreign policy and defense studies and resident scholar at the American Enterprise Institute.

U.S. Navy Buildup Came After Iran Moves (AP)

By Jim Krane
AP, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134933

Iran has brought its war games maneuvers over the past year into busy shipping lanes in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow mouth of the Persian Gulf through which two-fifths of the world's oil supplies pass, the top U.S. Navy commander in the Mideast said.

The moves have alarmed U.S. officials about possible accidental confrontations that could boil over into war, and led to a recent build-up of Navy forces in the Gulf, Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh said in an interview with The Associated Press and other reporters.

During maneuvers, Iranian sailors have loaded mines onto small minelaying boats and test-fired a Shahab-3 ballistic missile into international waters, he said.

"The Shahab-3 most recently went into waters very close to the traffic separation scheme in the straits themselves. This gives us concern because innocent passage of vessels now is threatened," Walsh said in the interview Monday on the base of the Navy's Fifth Fleet in the Gulf island kingdom of Bahrain.

Iran tested the Shahab during November maneuvers, which it said were in response to U.S. maneuvers in the Gulf it called "adventurist." Iran also showed off an array of new torpedoes in war games in April.

The carrier USS John C. Stennis — backed by a strike group with more than 6,500 sailors and Marines and with additional minesweeping ships — arrived in the region Monday. It joined the carrier USS Dwight D. Eisenhower after President Bush ordered the build-up as a show of strength to Iran.

The additional U.S. firepower has ratcheted up tensions with Iran. But Walsh said the increase aims to reassure Arab allies in the Gulf and prevent misunderstandings that could escalate into outright conflict.

"That's certainly what we're trying to avoid, a mistake that then boils over into a war," said Walsh, who departs his command of the Fifth Fleet this month to become vice chief of naval operations at the Pentagon, the Navy's No. 2 post.

Walsh said the Navy was responding to "more instability than we've seen in years" in the Fifth Fleet's region — with conflicts in Iraq, Afghanistan and Somalia, tensions in Lebanon and the standoff with Iran.

The Navy has grown increasingly alarmed at what Walsh called Iran's "provocations." Once cordial Navy ship-to-ship relations with Iran in the Gulf have disintegrated over the past 18 months as Iranian vessels made "probing" incursions into Iraqi waters, he said.

"They threaten to use oil as a weapon. They threaten to close the Straits of Hormuz," Walsh said. "And so it is the combination of the rhetoric, the tone, and the aggressive exercises in very constrained waters that gives us concern."

Since the Stennis was ordered to the region, Iranian leaders have increasingly warned that they would respond to any attack by closing off oil shipping lanes or attacking U.S. interests.

The Straits of Hormuz are 34 miles across, but its shipping lanes are only about six miles wide.

Walsh said it was doubtful that Iran could physically block the entire six-mile lanes with mines — but hitting only a few vessels with missiles and mines would "terrorize" shipping and have the same effect.

"It's more the threat of mines than the threat of closing the straits. That would have dramatic effects on markets around the world," he said.

Walsh said his biggest worry was that Iran would underestimate U.S. resolve to protect its interests in the world's richest oil region. He said the tone of Iranian leaders could make their commanders on the ground more reckless. "It's a mix and a formulation where you can have misunderstanding," he said.

Asked whether the U.S. Navy would launch an attack on Iran if Iranian involvement were confirmed in a deadly incident in Iraq, Walsh said he was unable to discuss the Navy's rules of engagement. But he added, "There are events on land that can spill over onto the sea."

At the same time, Walsh said he understood that U.S.-allied Gulf nations feared that any U.S.-Iranian military conflict could bring attacks on their soil.

Walsh said he was aware that a University of Maryland/Zogby International poll of Arab public opinion this month showed residents of the United Arab Emirates, Saudi Arabia and other allies believe Iran is far less a threat than the U.S. and Israel.

"I'm trying to talk to those in the region, to give them assurances that the reason we're here is to stand by them," he said.

Rice Seeks Arab Backing For Moderate Palestinians (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, February 21, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice was holding talks in Jordan with intelligence chiefs of four Arab states seen as crucial in backing Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas in his power struggle with the radical Islamic group Hamas.

DOJ_NMG_0134934

Rice also briefed Jordan's King Abdullah II on her joint meeting Monday in Jerusalem with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, a summit billed as the launch of a new US push to revive peace efforts but which failed to make any significant breakthrough.

After seeing Rice, Abdullah was to meet Abbas, who is in Jordan en route for Europe to seek support for a unity government deal between his secular Fatah party and Hamas, boycotted by the West as a terror group.

Rice's initiative has been undermined by the power-sharing deal brokered by Saudi Arabia earlier this month which caught the US administration by surprise, according to a senior US official.

Since Hamas gained control of the Palestinian government after a shock election win in January 2006, Washington has led international efforts to isolate the administration with an embargo on critical aid and diplomatic ties.

Washington backed a bid by Abbas to call new elections in hopes of sidelining Hamas, but the initiative led to deadly factional clashes -- bloodshed which the power-sharing deal has managed to stem.

The unity government deal, which will see officials from Abbas's secular Fatah party serve alongside Hamas leaders -- infuriated Israel and almost torpedoed Monday's summit, officials said.

While Rice succeeded in bringing the meeting off and gaining a pledge by Olmert and Abbas to continue talking, tensions were apparent when neither man appeared at her side for the reading of a joint statement.

She also used the meeting to reaffirm US and Israeli insistence that the boycott against the Palestinian government will continue unless it pledge respect for three conditions -- recognise Israeli's right to exist, renounce violence and accept previous peace agreements with Israel.

Abbas argued in Monday's meeting that the deal includes implicit recognition of these conditions and formally authorises him to negotiate with Israel.

During her five-hour visit to Jordan, Rice will seek an explanation of the unity government deal from the Saudi national security adviser Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the senior US official said.

She will also discuss ways the four Arab states can help deal with security issues raised in Monday's Israeli-Palestinian meeting, the official said.

These include putting an end to arms smuggling from Egypt into the Gaza Strip, Hamas's stronghold, and boosting the presence of security forces loyal to Abbas in northern Gaza, from where militants have been firing home-made rockets into Israel.

The official said Washington considers the four Arab nations "critical backers" of Abbas in his showdown with the Iranian-supported Hamas.

The United States initially engaged the so-called "Arab Quartet" as part of efforts to urge Iraqi Sunnis not to boycott the US-backed Shiite-led government in Iraq.

"Then it evolved into the most effective means of supporting responsible Palestinians," the US official said, referring to Abbas and his Fatah party.

Also attending the meeting will be Egyptian intelligence chief Omar Suleiman -- a key mediator between Israel and the Palestinians -- and his counterparts from Jordan and the United Arab Emirates.

Rice said she would also be pushing the Arabs to take a more active role in reviving peace efforts embodied in a 2002 "Arab initiative" that offered Israel diplomatic recognition if it would give up territory occupied since the 1967 Arab war.

"I hope that the Arab states also understand that they have a role to play in this," she said in Jerusalem Monday.

Rice flies from Amman to Berlin for a meeting Wednesday of the Middle East Quartet which comprises the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia.

Abbas is pressing the Quartet to end its aid boycott when the unity government takes office, but Rice will argue forcefully to stay the course during Wednesday's gathering, officials said.

Rice Looks Back For A Way Forward On Mideast Peace (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 20 -- Over Christmas vacation, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice took home a three-foot stack of reports written by the State Department historian on previous efforts by the United States to forge Middle East peace. Rice had read memoirs by her predecessors, but as she embarked on her own effort to help end the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, she decided she needed to study a day-by-day diplomatic narrative of what had gone wrong in the past.

Her conclusion: A diplomat needs to quietly build support behind the scenes in informal talks between the Israelis and Palestinians, seeking the right combination of leverage and circumstance to make an impact. In her mind, Rice and her aides say, the moment is now.

DOJ_NMG_0134935

But the lackluster outcome of the Israeli-Palestinian summit brokered by Rice in Jerusalem on Monday suggests her optimism may be misplaced. Diplomats and Middle East experts applaud her willingness to invest her prestige in trying to solve an intractable problem, but some wonder whether her efforts are six years too late.

Rice is pushing the Israelis and Palestinians to sketch the contours of a Palestinian state, much as President Bill Clinton did before he left office. But diplomats say the prospects have dimmed with years of violence, weak leadership in both camps and the rise of the militant group Hamas, which is dedicated to Israel's destruction and won Palestinian legislative elections last year.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Tuesday described the summit as "tense and difficult," while the Israeli government ruled out discussions on the diplomatic endgame if Abbas goes through with plans to form a unity government with Hamas.

Rice -- who arrived here Tuesday night for talks with European officials after meeting earlier in the day with Arab diplomats and security chiefs in Amman, Jordan -- insists that the conditions have never been better for peace.

This confidence reflects her central role in developing and implementing U.S. policy toward the conflict for the past six years. "I think on paper there was a lot that was close" in 2000, Rice said last month. "But the underlying circumstances, I think, those conditions are better now."

The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was never going to accept a peace deal, Rice argues, but he has been replaced by Abbas. She adds that the Likud Party was not going to support Clinton's proposals, but now much of the Israeli right accepts the idea of a Palestinian state after a Likud-led government, under Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, took the dramatic step of withdrawing from the Gaza Strip. "The breadth of the Israeli political system that is actually united behind a two-state solution is very different than in 2000," Rice said.

Rice's slant on the Middle East has been shaped in part by Israelis, first by Sharon and more recently by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, U.S. officials say.

Rice, for instance, adopted the phrase "political horizon" from Livni, which is intended to illustrate the endgame discussions, though it is not a new concept; then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell used it in 2002. Rice's division of the region into "moderate" elements (Israel, Abbas, Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia) and "extremist" forces (Iran, Syria, Hezbollah, Hamas) was also first articulated by Livni a few weeks before it became part of Rice's rhetoric.

Arabs and Europeans chafe at such clear-cut distinctions. "The Middle East is the Middle East," said Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit. "You have different trends, and you have different interests" that vary from day to day.

Aboul Gheit's view would explain why Abbas, supposedly a member of Rice's moderate camp, would join with the extremists. Abbas said the power-sharing arrangement is intended to stop Palestinian factional violence that has killed scores of people in recent months.

As national security adviser in President Bush's first term, Rice -- not Powell -- generally had control of Israeli-Palestinian policy because of a largely unpublicized back channel with Sharon's chief of staff, Dov Weisglass, according to U.S. and Israeli officials.

The most sensitive issues in the U.S.-Israeli relationship were handled through the Rice-Weisglass partnership. In a tense meeting with Weisglass in September 2002, Rice demanded that Sharon abandon an assault on Arafat's compound, U.S. and Israeli officials say. Rice, through the Weisglass channel, also encouraged in 2003 the development of Israel's plan to withdraw from Gaza -- in part to thwart European demands to push the two sides to begin final negotiations on a peace deal because the plan known as the "road map" was faltering.

Early in her tenure as secretary of state, Rice encouraged the Palestinians to hold legislative elections, even if Hamas participated, despite deep misgivings by Israeli officials. U.S. officials had assumed that Abbas's Fatah party would win, but Hamas unexpectedly prevailed. Rice then decided to push international donors to cut off all but humanitarian aid to the Palestinian government until Hamas renounced violence, accepted Israel and agreed to abide by previous Palestinian accords with Israel.

Although the Hamas victory halted peace efforts, Rice now says the election led to good because it forced the militant group to confront the challenges of governing. But U.S. officials concede that they were surprised when Abbas, with Saudi prodding, reached the unity accord with Hamas.

"She has a personal commitment to be involved now," said former Middle East envoy Dennis Ross. "But the nature of what she is involved in is in greater flux."

Rice's push follows a succession of administration initiatives that quickly faded, including a security plan by then-CIA chief George J. Tenet in 2001, the appointment of special envoy Anthony C. Zinni in 2002 and Bush's inauguration of the road map plan at a 2003 summit in Aqaba, Jordan. Within months, all were largely abandoned.

DOJ_NMG_0134936

In one irony, the United States in 2003 had pushed for the creation of a powerful prime minister because it wanted a way to sidestep then-President Arafat; now, the administration wants to bolster the Abbas presidency as a way of undercutting the Hamas prime minister.

The administration has intervened in the Palestinian factional struggle, funneling money to bolster Fatah's image before the elections and now pushing a plan to train and supply security forces loyal to Abbas.

One Rice aide conceded that there is "diplomatic risk" to Rice forging ahead, but European officials are thrilled that she is now trying ideas they have long urged. A senior European official said Tuesday that just the fact that Rice did not cancel the meeting in the face of Israeli resistance was a signal, because the administration has had a pattern of halting peace efforts at the first sign of trouble. "To us, that is proof the United States is really engaged," he said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Israel Threatens To Ignore Abbas (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 21, 2007

Israel said Tuesday it would stop dealing with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas if he goes ahead with plans to join Hamas in a new government, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Arab allies sought a way to break the Hamas logjam and push forward the stalled peace process.

Jordan's King Abdullah II, after separate meetings with Rice and Abbas, urged the United States to continue seeking to broker an Israeli-Palestinian peace accord. But Israel said it would stop dealing with Abbas on larger peace issues if he went ahead and formed the coalition government with Hamas.

After the meetings Abbas acknowledged for the first time that sessions on Monday in Jerusalem with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Rice had been "tense and difficult" but said "it was not a failure and it will be followed by other meetings."

Abbas said Israel may have "misunderstood" the agreement reached in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, between his moderate Fatah faction and the militant Hamas group, according to Jordan's official Petra news agency.

"We told Israel that this agreement was made to protect the unity of the Palestinian people and its national interests," Abbas was quoted as saying. "The agreement is an expression of support for Palestinian interests, but Israel may have misunderstood it."

But in Israel, Miri Eisin, spokeswoman for Olmert, ruled out any talks on a final peace deal with Abbas if he went ahead with plans to form a new Cabinet including Hamas.

Israeli talks with Abbas would be limited to matters such as improving living conditions for the Palestinians and ending Palestinian attacks against Israel. "We're not talking about negotiations on final status issues," Eisin said.

The planned Palestinian coalition government fell far short of what the United States and Israel wanted, and also disappointed Sunni Arab states — many of them U.S. allies — that had hoped Hamas would soften anti-Israeli policies enough to satisfy the West and restart the flow of vital international aid.

Rice invited security and intelligence chiefs from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates to Amman for the talks to ask their advice on what, if anything, can be done further to persuade Hamas to back down.

Tuesday's session at the government security headquarters in Amman included some of the region's wiliest and best-connected heavies, fixers and go-betweens, including Saudi national security adviser Prince Bandar bin Sultan and Egyptian intelligence head Omar Suleiman.

Suleiman has deep ties across Palestinian politics, including with Hamas. Rice has been meeting with him regularly since Hamas won Palestinian parliamentary elections 13 months ago.

Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and the Emirates have all, in turn, tried their hand in recent months at convincing Hamas to moderate enough to meet Western conditions, with little success.

Rice and Abbas both met with Abdullah but their sessions were separate. Both were reporting on progress from their three-way summit Monday with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. For Abbas, that meant explaining that he had failed to persuade Israel and Rice that the incoming Palestinian government would fulfill conditions for the restoration of foreign aid.

Abdullah and other Sunni Arab allies have strongly urged the Bush administration to energize peace efforts between Israel and the Palestinians, partly to improve the Palestinians' lot, partly to tamp down Islamic extremism that those government see as a threat and partly to counter the influence of Shiite Iran.

After the meetings, Abdullah issued a statement saying, "The longer the time passes without a framework that would help Palestinians and Israelis move forward, the greater the risk of an escalation of tensions."

Abbas also was headed to Germany along with stops in Britain and France in a campaign to convince skeptical Western leaders that the deal he forged earlier this month with the ruling Islamic Hamas reflects his moderate stand.

DOJ_NMG_0134937

At stake is about $1 billion in foreign aid for the Palestinian government cut off after Hamas defeated Abbas' secular Fatah party and took power last year. Abbas was elected separately and retains power, but the two-headed government structure was unwieldy and unable to deliver services or security.

Israel, the U.S. and the European Union label Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction and has killed hundreds of people in suicide attacks, a terror group.

The U.S. and European Union insist that any Palestinian government must recognize Israel, renounce violence and accept past peace accords. Hamas has rejected those conditions. The unity accord pledges only to "respect" past agreements.

No Peace Talks With Abbas If Fatah Joins Cabinet (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

Israel yesterday ruled out any peace talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas if his Fatah faction joins Hamas in a new Cabinet, in spite of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's appeal for continued talks with Mr. Abbas as the legitimate Palestinian leader.

A day after Miss Rice's inconclusive meeting in Jerusalem with Mr. Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Mr. Olmert's aides said future contacts would be limited to daily issues such as improving living conditions for the Palestinians and ending attacks against Israel.

"We are not talking about negotiations on final-status issues," said Israeli government spokeswoman Miri Eisin.

The United States and Israel both have said they will not deal with the proposed unity government unless it meets three international demands -- that it renounce violence, recognize Israel and honor past Palestinian commitments.

"The agreements between Hamas and Abu Mazen disappoint all who supported separating the extremists from the moderates and creating an alternative government in the Palestinian Authority," Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said yesterday, using Mr. Abbas' nickname.

Although Miss Rice agreed that a government that does not recognize Israel cannot be part of any peace negotiations leading to a two-state solution, she has repeatedly said that Mr. Abbas is the only Palestinian leader worth talking to.

"He heads [the Palestinian Authority] with his own authority and his own legitimacy, having been elected to that position on the basis of principles that he went to the Palestinian people on when he was elected in 2005," the secretary said on Monday.

"He is the chairman of the [Palestine Liberation Organization] and discussions, negotiations, whatever, work with Israel, is in the hands of the chairman of the PLO," she said.

Miss Rice also said Mr. Abbas had assured her in several meetings that he is committed to the three international demands, which have been endorsed by the Quartet -- the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations.

But with a Hamas majority in both the parliament and the Cabinet, Mr. Abbas cannot deliver when it comes to final-status issues, said David Schenker, senior fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

"We shouldn't abandon him, because for the most part he continues to say the right things," Mr. Schenker said of Mr. Abbas. "But it's getting harder to deal with him."

Mr. Schenker said it is "impossible to talk about a political horizon," the term U.S. and Israeli officials have been using for the past couple of months, given the Fatah-Hamas agreement, which was reached on Feb. 8 in Mecca, Saudi Arabia.

"That agreement threw a ratchet in U.S. policy," he said. "There were not many concessions from Hamas."

The deal ended a cycle of factional violence in the Palestinian territories that left dozens dead and many more wounded.

"We told Israel that this agreement was made to protect the unity of the Palestinian people and its national interests," Mr. Abbas was quoted as saying by Jordan's official Petra news agency. "The agreement is an expression of support for Palestinian interests, but Israel may have misunderstood it."

He also said that his Monday meeting with Mr. Olmert and Miss Rice had been "tense and difficult."

Miss Rice met with King Abdullah II of Jordan in Amman yesterday before flying to Berlin for a Quartet meeting today.

Mr. Abbas also headed to Germany, Britain and France to lobby for the release of millions of dollars in aid to the Palestinian government, which has been frozen since Hamas came to power just over a year ago.

In Amman, Miss Rice also met with security and intelligence chiefs from Saudi Arabia, Egypt, Jordan and the United Arab Emirates to discuss what can be done to get Hamas to accept the Quartet principles.

Palestinian Factions Labor To Sustain Truce (WSJ)

By Cam Simpson

The Wall Street Journal, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134938

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- Abu Mujahad and Yasser Said are trying to hold together a fragile Palestinian peace here -- via cellphone.

Mr. Mujahad is loyal to the Executive Force led by Hamas, while Mr. Said reports to its rival faction, Fatah. The two groups, responsible for fighting that has left hundreds of Palestinians dead in the past year, are coordinating a peace accord reached Feb. 8 in the Muslim holy city of Mecca, Saudi Arabia, through what they call a "joint operations center."

In reality, it is more like a speed-dial list as rival commanders, ensconced in their separate redoubts, keep in near-constant contact when the smallest trouble flares in the Gaza Strip. An estimated 1.4 million Palestinians share the patch of land spanning about 140 square miles.

Both sides acknowledged in separate interviews yesterday that tensions remain high and that there have been multiple breaches of their accord. Still, they said their fears about open warfare erupting anew were based on political and diplomatic processes far beyond the streets where their men maintain a tense standoff. "We are sure we will have problems in the future, but cooperation between all the parties to solve them will be much easier if they have an agreement at the top," Mr. Said said.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left the Middle East yesterday without openly accepting or rejecting the Mecca deal that brought the tentative peace. Her departure followed three days of talks -- including the first three-way summit since 2003 featuring American, Israeli and Palestinian leaders. There were few tangible results. And no one wants to predict how long after her departure the agreement will last.

In addition to ending the fighting, the Mecca accord calls for the formation of a unity government between Hamas, the Islamist movement that won U.S.-backed elections in the Palestinian territories a year ago, and the secular Fatah movement, which is headed by the separately elected Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas.

Fatah, which was founded by the late Yasser Arafat, had controlled the Palestinian territories since the Oslo peace accords of the 1990s. Since Hamas's rise to power, fighting between the two sides has left more than 400 Palestinians dead, the vast majority of them in Gaza, where Hamas is generally believed to be stronger. While there were no breakthroughs during Ms. Rice's visit, Mr. Abbas, who is trying to navigate between Hamas on one side and Israel and the U.S. on the other, in some ways walked away victorious by maintaining his diplomatic relevance -- at least for now.

But Israel and the U.S. are deeply troubled by the unity-government plan because Hamas still hasn't openly endorsed their demands that any government including the Islamist movement abide by previous peace agreements, reject violence and accept Israel's right to exist. So far, Hamas has only acceded to giving its tacit backing to prior peace accords.

Senior U.S. officials said Mr. Abbas now has a little more time -- probably no longer than six months -- to make something happen. They envision three possible scenarios.

In the most optimistic, Mr. Abbas can continue to gain slow progress in nudging Hamas closer to a more overt acceptance of the international community's conditions. The second scenario would be maintenance of the status quo: The U.S. continues to shun the Hamas-dominated government, even though Mr. Abbas's party is now part of that government, but continues dealing on a personal level with Mr. Abbas. His presidential office is still separate from the Hamas-Fatah government that would be formed under the Mecca accord. This scenario includes continuing military support to Mr. Abbas and his chief strongmen in order to keep pressure on Hamas. The third scenario amounts to giving Mr. Abbas and Hamas enough space to allow their own internal differences to bring about the collapse of the Mecca deal and the unity government.

One key factor, which remains unclear, is whether Saudi Arabia will abide by its pledge to supply $1 billion to the new unity government. If it does, it is possible Mr. Abbas could continue to press ahead with Hamas even if the U.S. and Israel shun the Palestinian government. U.S. officials also have declined to say whether they are pressuring the Saudi regime to freeze that pledge.

Ms. Rice is in a precarious position. If she pushes too hard, she could create an even greater backlash across the region and beyond, since the deal has brought an end to Palestinian bloodshed. Mr. Mujahad, the deputy commander of the Executive Force in northern Gaza, left little doubt whom he would blame if fighting begins anew. "We hold Israel and the Americans responsible for the tensions between Palestinians," he said.

He is based in an armed Executive Force camp on the edge of Jabalya. He sits behind a desk within a small office building behind freshly erected cinderblock walls and mounds of earth plowed high like barricades. The camp is directly across the street from a pile of rubble that used to be the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated military-intelligence command in this part of Gaza, a sign of how powerful the Executive Force became here in the days leading up to the Mecca accord.

Mr. Mujahad said the mechanism for maintaining the peace -- having commanders from the warring sides stay in constant contact -- is so far holding. "We work day and night with those who have intentions in Fatah to make this agreement stick," he said.

Mr. Said, who works from inside his home a few miles away, is the key coordinator for Fatah. He said there are few rules beyond talking. For breaches of the peace, which both sides acknowledge occur nearly every day, there are no proscribed punishments. Creating a stronger deal with a better chance of holding will depend on the quick creation of a unity government, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134939

But he fears the political differences -- between the factions, within the factions themselves and from the U.S. and Israel -- don't give them much time, no matter how hard they work to keep the peace. "It's not enough to have good intentions," he said.

After The Mecca Accord, Clouded Horizons (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

BERLIN, Feb. 20 — With Iran steadily gaining power in the Middle East, the United States recently made a strategic decision to encourage Saudi Arabia to take a more active role in diplomacy in the region. Two weeks ago, the Saudis took a bold step, mediating an accord between warring Palestinian factions whose battles in Gaza had left more than 100 dead.

But that agreement, signed in the holy city of Mecca, brought Hamas — which the United States and Israel consider a terrorist organization — into a unity government without requiring that it recognize Israel or forswear violence against it. And that added to the already formidable challenge the United States faces as it tries to accomplish another strategic goal: getting the Palestinians and Israelis back to the negotiating table for peace talks for the first time in six years.

The Saudi-brokered pact largely torpedoed the American-sponsored meeting on Monday between the Israelis and the Palestinians that was meant to jump-start peace talks.

The crosscurrent is a case study in how the divergent worldviews of America and Saudi Arabia, its closest Arab ally, will color the two countries' attempts to quell violence in the region and put a brake on Iran's ambitions, analysts say.

To be sure, both the United States and its Sunni Arab allies, particularly Saudi Arabia, say they want peace between Palestinians and Israelis and the creation of a Palestinian state. For the Saudis, the end of Israeli-Palestinian hostilities would mute a rallying cry for militants, intent on upending the status quo in the region, who say Arab leaders have done too little to help Palestinians.

So why did Saudi Arabia broker a power-sharing agreement between Hamas and the moderate Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, and his Fatah faction at the same time that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had decided to try to revive peace talks?

One reason, no doubt, is that Saudi Arabia — as a leader in the Arab world — wanted to help end the Palestinian-on-Palestinian violence by Hamas and Fatah. But another big reason, analysts said, is that the war in Iraq has intensified the split between Sunnis and Shiites, and deepened a power struggle between the Sunni royal family of Saudi Arabia, and Iran, which is largely Shiite.

Although the United States is rooting for the Saudis in that power struggle, the two countries have some distinctly different ideas about how Saudi Arabia should fight for its leadership role in the region.

The Bush administration has a view that pits America, its Arab allies, Israel and Europe against Iran, Syria and groups, including Hamas, that the United States considers terrorists.

While that alignment may work for the Bush administration, it is not necessarily how America's Sunni Arab allies view the world. In the battle for influence in the Middle East, Hamas is a prize Saudi Arabia is willing to fight for.

Put simply, in the past year, Iran has been wooing Hamas, which is Sunni. The Saudis did not like that. So they fought to get Hamas back.

"The Saudis did a switcheroo," said Martin Indyk, the United States ambassador to Israel in the Clinton administration. "The U.S. views the Middle East as a battle between the moderates against the Iranian-led extremists. But our regional allies see this as a divide between Sunnis and Shiites, and Sunni extremists like Hamas may be extremists, but they are Sunnis first."

"The Saudis," he said, "don't want Hamas on the Shia side, on the Iranian side."

The fight over Hamas began in earnest last year when the United States and Europe cut off most of the $1 billion in direct aid to the Palestinian government after Hamas took control by besting Fatah in legislative elections. Unable to cover its bills — or even to meet payroll for many of its civil servants — Hamas turned to Iran, which provided it with $120 million. Saudi Arabia meanwhile, shied away from giving much aid to Hamas.

On Dec. 7, the Hamas leader, Ismail Haniya, in his first tour abroad as Palestinian prime minister, went to Tehran, where he met with Iranian leaders, including President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia responded quickly to the deepening ties between Hamas and Iran. On Dec. 29, he sent a plane provided by the Saudi royal family to carry Mr. Haniya and other Hamas leaders to Saudi Arabia, where Mr. Haniya had a private audience with the Saudi king, according to Palestinian officials.

DOJ_NMG_0134940

As all of this was going on, Ms. Rice was working with Tzipi Livni, Israel's foreign minister, to organize peace talks between Mr. Abbas and Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, to present Mr. Abbas as the only leader capable of leading the Palestinians to their own state.

It was a complicated set-up; the American-Israeli hope was that Mr. Abbas, empowered by peace negotiations, could call for new elections and see his Fatah party beat Hamas. Mr. Abbas had threatened several times to call the elections because talks on a unity government were stalled.

But less than two weeks before the scheduled Israeli-Palestinian meeting, Saudi Arabia brokered the power-sharing pact: Hamas and Mr. Abbas would politically cohabitate in a national unity government.

In announcing the agreement, Saudi Arabia promised $1 billion in aid to the Palestinians. The Saudis pressured both sides to reach a pact; Mr. Abbas said he did so because he could not stand to witness intra-Palestinian bloodshed.

The pact put an end, at least temporarily, to the bloodletting. It also put an end, at least temporarily, to Ms. Rice's attempt to restart peace talks. Ms. Rice flew to Jerusalem for the scheduled meeting anyway, which began on Monday morning with a stilted three-way handshake between Mr. Abbas and Mr. Olmert at Ms. Rice's hotel, with Ms. Rice standing in the middle. After about an hour of discussions about the Mecca accord, Ms. Rice tried to move the discussion to the peace agenda.

"Let's go upstairs and talk about your future," she said, according to a senior Bush administration official. The three went up to her 10th-floor suite, overlooking Jerusalem's Old City, where she broached what she has termed the "political horizon" — diplomatic speak for the contours of an eventual Palestinian state.

"She pushed for it in the meeting, but Olmert was adamant about not going for it," said a Palestinian official familiar with the talks.

The reason: the Saudi-brokered Mecca accord. In the end, the Israelis said they refused to open peace negotiations with a unity government that includes Hamas.

Congress Puts Palestinian Funds In Limbo (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON — Congress is holding up $86 million that the Bush administration is seeking to strengthen the security forces of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, in a new setback for the administration's efforts in the region.

Administration officials say they want the money to ensure that the moderate Palestinian leader's security forces will not be overwhelmed by rivals from the militant movement Hamas, which has received pledges of $250 million in aid from Iran.

But Rep. Nita M. Lowey (D-N.Y.), chairwoman of the House Appropriations subcommittee on foreign operations, has put a hold on the funding, saying she is not convinced the money will go to train and equip Abbas' security forces, as promised. Other lawmakers, including Democrats and Republicans, have voiced concern that the money could end up in the hands of Hamas.

The United States and other Western nations have cut off direct aid to the Palestinian Authority after the January 2006 parliamentary election victory of Hamas. The group does not recognize the state of Israel, has not renounced violence and has not fully committed to respecting past agreements between Palestinians and the Jewish state.

Further complicating the issue is a deal announced in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, on Feb. 8 under which Hamas and Fatah will share power in a new Palestinian "unity" government. Some lawmakers fear that shifting lines of authority in the Palestinian government could make it difficult for the U.S. to earmark money for the exclusive use of forces under Abbas' control.

The U.S. aid package is to go toward communications gear, uniforms and other equipment considered nonlethal, and toward hiring private contractors to train the forces. The aid will benefit both the 4,000-member Presidential Guard, and several thousand members of the larger national security forces, which also have been under Abbas' control.

Meanwhile, Egypt and Jordan are rounding out the needs of forces from Abbas' Fatah faction with ammunition and weapons.

The Israeli government, which plays a critical role, originally supported the idea of the aid program. Since the Mecca agreement, however, Israeli officials have become worried that some of the aid could end up helping Hamas.

Lowey began pressing the State Department for more details of the spending program in December, and placed a hold on the grant last month, because she believed she had not received the assurances she needed, aides say.

"It is imperative that we have a fuller understanding of exactly what the funding is for and what the situation is on the ground," Lowey said in a statement.

Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.) said at a House hearing last week that the subcommittee had "deep concern" about approving the money, because the Feb. 8 agreement to form a new government had made Hamas and Fatah a "joint venture."

"I would find it impossible to support any expenditure of funds without knowing how we make sure that those funds stay in the right hands and don't fall into the wrong hands," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134941

Other critics have complained that U.S. assistance might only intensify the fighting between the Hamas and Fatah forces. About 100 Palestinians have been killed in that fighting since December.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice argued that it was important not to halt support for Abbas.

"Hamas is going to continue to build its forces. I don't think we want to be in a position in which Hamas continues to build its forces and [Abbas] doesn't build his, because I don't know ultimately what will become of the Palestinian unity government," she told the panel last week. "I do know that if Hamas has strong forces and Mahmoud Abbas does not, that's not good for the United States, that's not good for the Palestinians, and it's most certainly not good for Israel."

Speaking Sunday in Israel, Rice said the U.S. wanted to continue cooperation with Abbas, but also recognized that it would need to prove to taxpayers that it would not be spending money on a government of which the United States disapproves.

Charade In Jerusalem (NYT)

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

It speaks volumes when Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice flies to Jerusalem to try to revive peace talks between Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel and President Mahmoud Abbas of the Palestinian Authority and cannot even get the two to show up when she reads out the content-free joint statement to which they have grudgingly agreed.

Volume 1 reminds us of the six feckless years during which the Bush administration has squandered America's once commanding prestige in the region. Volume 2 portrays a secretary of state who clearly arrived with no new ideas — and no idea of how to wheedle or pressure either side into making any of the compromises needed to stimulate the dangerously moribund peace effort.

Ms. Rice's diplomatic default was all the keener since this just might have been a moment for breaking the stalemate that has prevailed since Hamas won control of the Palestinian Parliament last year.

Hamas's refusal to accept Israel's right to exist and its people's right to live free from terrorism is undeniably the biggest single obstacle to peace. But Mr. Abbas and his more moderate Fatah movement already accept both points. And the imperfect agreement Mr. Abbas reached with Hamas this month on a cease-fire between the two groups (reeling them back from civil war) and a coalition government gave him more authority, after months of flailing, to bargain on behalf of the Palestinians.

Israel could have reinforced Mr. Abbas's position and increased the chances for progress with a series of low-risk steps: committing to serious negotiations, freezing the expansion of settlements and easing restrictions on civilians' movements in the West Bank. Those steps would have given new hope to Palestinian moderates and thereby increased the political pressure on Hamas to abandon terrorism.

Instead, Ms. Rice indulged Mr. Olmert's inherent caution and his own political weakness, settling for an agreement that the two leaders will meet again some (still to be determined) day. Israel further qualified that promise yesterday, threatening to stop talking to Mr. Abbas altogether if he forms a coalition government with Hamas. With Palestinian frustrations rising — and demographers predicting an eventual Palestinian majority between the Mediterranean and the Jordan — just saying no is not a viable option for Israel. The responsibility of the United States, as Israel's most vital ally, is to keep that uncomfortable reality firmly in Israel's sight.

Going Nowhere Fast (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

DOHA, Qatar -- "Are you on the road, or in the ditch?" Back when I covered labor negotiations 30 years ago, that was the question reporters would ask to get a sense of how contract talks were going. The phrase came back to me last weekend as I listened to a series of relentlessly negative presentations at a conference here on America's relations with the Muslim world.

We are in the ditch in the Middle East. As bad as you think it is watching TV, it's worse. It's not just Iraq but the whole pattern of America's dealings with the Arab world. People aren't just angry at America -- they've been that way to varying degrees since I first came here 27 years ago. What's worse is that they're giving up on us -- on our ability to make good decisions, to solve problems, to play the role of honest broker.

Let's start with some poll numbers presented at the Doha conference by Shibley Telhami, a University of Maryland professor and a fellow of the Saban Center at the Brookings Institution, which co-sponsored the conference with the Qatari foreign ministry. The polling was done last year by Zogby International in six countries that are usually regarded as pro-American: Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon, Morocco, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates.

In these six "friendly" countries, only 12 percent of those surveyed expressed favorable attitudes toward the United States. America's leaders have surpassed Israel's as objects of anger. Asked which foreign leader they disliked most, 38 percent named George Bush; Ariel Sharon was a distant second at 11 percent; and Ehud Olmert was third with 7 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0134942

The poll data show a deep suspicion of American motives: 65 percent of those surveyed said they didn't think democracy was a real U.S. objective in the Middle East. Asked to name two countries that had the most freedom and democracy, only 14 percent said America, putting it far behind France and Germany. And remember, folks, this is coming from our friends.

During the Doha conference, speakers put into words the attitudes summarized by the poll numbers. Sheik Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a fiery Sunni preacher who appears regularly on al-Jazeera, said that America acted as if "some people were created to lead and others to be led," and that America had "lost the trust and confidence" of Muslims. Well, okay, he's notorious for his anti-American and anti-Israeli views. But I heard the same thing from Amr Moussa, the head of the Arab League, who said Arabs were "losing confidence in the U.S. role" as a peace broker.

And my friend Rami Khouri, who is one of most balanced journalists in the Arab world, warned that a broad popular front is emerging to challenge American hegemony. Iraq "discredits what America tries to do in the Mideast," he said. Khouri explained that Arabs admire Hezbollah because it represents "the end of docility, the end of acquiescence."

You don't have to agree with these Muslim critics to recognize that the anger they express represents a serious national security problem for the United States. That's what President Bush seems not to understand in his surge of troops into Iraq, his bromides about democracy and his strategy of confrontation with Iran. It isn't a tiny handful of people in the Arab world who oppose what America is doing. It's nearly everyone.

To get out of the ditch, America must change its Iraq policy, soon. That doesn't mean pulling out of Iraq quickly, as many Democrats in Washington seem to favor. I found few people here who thought a quick American pullout made sense. But it does mean shifting the American focus -- so that we are talking with Iraq's neighbors and negotiating with the Iraqis on a timetable for withdrawal of U.S. troops. Tellingly, the one American who got loud, sustained applause here was Chris Kojm, a senior adviser on the Baker-Hamilton report.

And to get back on the road, for real, America must broker a settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian dispute. I winced when I heard Prime Minister Olmert say last weekend in Jerusalem that "the American and Israeli positions are totally identical" on the terms for recognizing a Palestinian unity government. The Israelis are right in insisting that Hamas must recognize Israel's right to exist. But how to get there? What if Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had responded: America is a mediator in this conflict. Its positions are independent of either side, and it is willing to talk to all parties to achieve peace.

I would have loved to see the looks of astonishment from the America-bashers here.

The 'Crime' Of Blogging In Egypt (WP)

By Raja M. Kamal And Tom G. Palmer

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

A former college student, Abdelkareem Nabil Soliman, is sitting in an Egyptian prison, awaiting sentencing tomorrow. His alleged "crime": expressing his opinions on a blog. His mistake: having the courage to do so under his own name.

Soliman, 22, was expelled from Al-Azhar University last spring for sharply criticizing the university's rigid curriculum and faulting religious extremism on his blog. He was ordered to appear before a public prosecutor on Nov. 7 on charges of "spreading information disruptive of public order," "incitement to hate Muslims" and "insulting the President." Soliman was detained pending an investigation, and the detention has been renewed four times. He has not had consistent access to lawyers or to his family.

Egyptian authorities have made a mistake in prosecuting Soliman. It is Egypt that will be hurt if he is convicted and sent to prison. That's why sincere friends of Egypt call on the government to drop the charges against him. It is the right thing to do, and it is the best thing for Egypt's standing in the modern world.

The case has gained attention in newspapers the world over and from human rights organizations such as Amnesty International. Informal networks of bloggers have spread the word, notably through http://www.freekareem.org. Last Thursday, bloggers and human rights activists around the globe gathered to call on Egyptian authorities to respect freedom of speech. We echo this call.

Soliman has criticized Egyptian authorities as failing to protect the rights of religious minorities and women. He has expressed his views about religious extremism in very strong terms. He is the first Egyptian blogger to be prosecuted for the content of his remarks. Remarkably, the legal complaint originated with the university that had expelled him; once, it was a great center of learning in the Arab world, but it has been reduced to informing on students for their dissent from orthodoxy.

One of us, Tom Palmer, met Soliman at a conference for bloggers in the Middle East last year. In person, Soliman seemed quiet and shy but very committed to championing women's rights and the rights of minorities.

We kept in touch by G-mail chat. Despite occasional admonitions to be careful about what he posted online and to think about possible consequences of public dissent, Soliman said that he was not afraid to express his views.

DOJ_NMG_0134943

Last October, Soliman instant-messaged that he had been ordered to attend an interview with prosecutors the next day. Friends at organizations such as Hands Across the Middle East Support Alliance and the Arabic Network for Human Rights Information quickly found Soliman a lawyer. Word spread when he had been detained, and protests were organized at Egyptian embassies. Soliman had no organized movement or group behind him, but his case came to be known around the world.

We find it shocking that a university would turn a student over to the authorities to be prosecuted for voicing his views. The future of learning and science is at risk when dissenting views are punished rather than debated. Jointly, we have contacted Egyptian authorities to ask that they correct a clear mistake and release Soliman.

Egypt is a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which guarantees the "freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media." The exceptions allowed are narrowly drawn and require proof of "necessity" before restrictions can be imposed. The posting of opinions on a student's personal blog hardly qualifies as a threat to national security, to the reputation of the president or to public order.

Soliman is not a threat to Egypt, but this prosecution is.

Whether or not we agree with the opinions that Abdelkareem Nabil Soliman expressed is not the issue. What matters is a principle: People should be free to express their opinions without fear of being imprisoned or killed. Blogging should not be a crime.

Raja M. Kamal is associate dean for resource development at the Harris School of Public Policy at the University of Chicago. Tom G. Palmer is a senior fellow at the Cato Institute and director of the Byrne Project on Middle East Liberty.

2 Leaders Rebuff Russia's Nuclear Threats (NYT)

By Andrew E. Kramer

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 20 — Officials in the Czech Republic and Poland vowed Tuesday that they would not be intimidated by Russia, a day after a general in Moscow declared that nuclear weapons could be aimed at their countries if they allowed the Bush administration to build ballistic missile defenses within their borders.

Russia has reacted with open hostility to the plan, which comes on the heels of further NATO expansion onto the territory of the former Soviet Union.

On Monday, the commander of Russia's missile forces said he was ready to re-aim nuclear weapons so they would be trained on the missile defense sites chosen in Eastern Europe.

"It is clearly an attempt to intimidate," Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski, said on Polish radio.

The Czech foreign minister, Karel Schwarzenberg, said, "The Czechs will now think the shield is even more necessary," according to a [news] report.

"We have quite an experience with Russians," he said. "You have to make clear to them you won't succumb to blackmail. Once you give in to blackmail, there's no going back."

The American plan calls for a radar site in the Czech Republic and a missile battery in Poland, with the stated aim of countering threats from rogue states like Iran or North Korea. Mr. Kaczynski and his Czech counterpart, Mirek Topolanek, said Monday that they were prepared to accept the offer from the United States.

The dispute is another sign of how quickly relations between Russia and Eastern Europe have been disrupted, descending this week and last into ominous talk of nuclear and military leverage reminiscent of the cold war.

The Russian missile commander, Gen. Nikolai Y. Solovtsov, speaking of the Czech Republic and Poland's consideration of the American plan, said, "If the government of Poland, the Czech Republic and other countries make this decision — and I think mutual consultations that have been held and will be held will allow avoiding this — the strategic missile troops will be able to have those facilities as targets.

"Consequences in case of hostilities will be very grave for both sides," he said.

A NATO spokesman, James Appathurai, called the general's threat "uncalled for."

"The days of talk of targeting NATO territory or vice versa are long past us." he said, Radio Free Europe reported. "This kind of extreme language is out of date."

Just last week, Russia's top general, Yuri N. Baluyevsky, the chief of the general staff, declared that Russia could withdraw from the Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, negotiated by Ronald Reagan and Mikhail S. Gorbachev in 1987.

On Tuesday, General Solovtsov noted that while those missiles were scrapped under the treaty, Russia could quickly resume production. President Vladimir V. Putin set the tone in a speech on Feb. 10 in Munich, denouncing the projection of American power as "the world of one master, one sovereign."

DOJ_NMG_0134944

In the 1990s, Russia bristled, but always backed down, as NATO expanded. But under Mr. Putin, Russia has executed a more forceful foreign policy in Eastern Europe, though one focused on opening markets for Russian commodity exports and maintaining political influence in the former Soviet states.

Antimissile Plan By U.S. Strains Ties With Russia (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

MOSCOW, Feb. 20 -- An increasingly angry dispute over U.S. plans to deploy a missile defense system in Central Europe is adding strain to already fragile U.S.-Russian relations.

Under the proposal, the United States would build silos in Poland to hold 10 interceptor rockets that could destroy intercontinental ballistic missiles fired at the United States or even command sites in Europe. The accompanying radar system would be located in the Czech Republic.

U.S. officials say the system is not directed against Russia, but at the potential threat posed by missiles being developed by Iran.

That argument has been dismissed in Russia as spurious. Senior military officials, who have begun to drive the debate here, have responded with rhetoric rarely heard since the end of the Cold War.

"If the governments of Poland and the Czech Republic take such a step, the strategic missile forces will be capable of targeting these facilities if a relevant decision is made," Gen. Nikolai Solovtsov, commander of Russian missile forces, said at a news conference Monday.

Polish Prime Minister Jaroslaw Kaczynski said Tuesday that Solovtsov's statement "was obviously an attempt at intimidation."

"To make it clear, this is not about Russian security; these installations do not in any way threaten Russia," Kaczynski said on Polish radio. "We are talking about the status of Poland and Russia's hopes that Poland will once again come under its sphere of influence."

Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg told [a] news agency in Warsaw that his nation would not give in to Russian "blackmail."

Relations between the United States and Russia had already taken a hit this month when Russian President Vladimir Putin lashed out at Washington for its unilateral approach. "The United States has overstepped its national borders in every way," Putin said. He also said U.S. plans for an antimissile system could upset the international balance of power. His remarks drew rebukes from the White House.

Russian officials have said that Iran has no missiles capable of reaching the United States or even Western Europe and that Iran is incapable of developing them any time soon. Sergei Ivanov, then defense minister, told the German newspaper Die Welt this month that it would take "at least 20 years" for Iran to develop missiles that could reach Central Europe.

"I think you can draw your own conclusions about which missiles this system actually targets," Solovtsov said. "This is why we are watching the situation with anxiety and concern."

Solovtsov said it would take Russia less than six years to build and deploy upgraded missiles to counter what it sees as a threat. And Putin warned this month that "we need to respond asymmetrically, so that everyone understands that yes, there is an antimissile system, but it's useless against Russia."

If the United States goes ahead with its plans, Russian officials have threatened to pull out of the 1987 Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces Treaty, which eliminated shorter-range missiles. As precedent, Russian officials cite the Bush administration's withdrawal from the 1972 Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty.

"It is possible for a party to abandon the treaty if it provides convincing evidence that it is necessary to do so," Gen. Yury Baluyevsky said this month. "We have such evidence at present."

Irina Kobrinskaya, an analyst at the Institute of World Economy and International Relations in Moscow, said the Russian military might have grudgingly accepted the system if it were deployed on NATO's southern rim in Turkey, Romania or Bulgaria. But its placement to the north -- in the Czech Republic and Poland, which shares a land border with the Russian region of Kaliningrad -- has raised deep suspicion here.

"Elements of this new system can present a threat to Russia and that's the logic of the military," Kobrinskaya said in an interview.

For Russians, the system is part of a deeper pattern of what they see as U.S. encirclement, particularly through the continuing expansion of NATO. From its first expansion into the former Soviet bloc in 1998, when Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic joined, NATO now includes the three Baltic states, Slovakia, Romania and Bulgaria. The former Soviet republic of Georgia also wishes to join. Some politicians in Ukraine, including President Viktor Yushchenko, have advocated membership.

DOJ_NMG_0134945

Some Russian analysts contend that part of the rhetoric is driven by domestic political concerns and efforts to build a nationalist consensus before parliamentary and presidential elections.

"I think the whole episode is being used by the Russian government to substantiate its critical approach to what the U.S. is doing internationally," said Viktor Kremenyuk, of Institute of the United States and Canada in Moscow, in an interview.

U.S. officials have said they accept that Russia could easily overwhelm the antimissile system -- further proof, they say, that it is not directed against Russia.

U.S. Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, head of the Missile Defense Agency, told reporters last month that the interceptors "are directed toward rogue nations' capabilities, not an obviously sophisticated ballistic missile fleet such as the Russians have."

Russian Sabre Rattling Pushes Poles And Czechs Closer To The US (FT)

By Jan Cienski And Robert Anderson

Financial Times, February 21, 2007

Russia has warned Poland and the Czech Republic against hosting elements of a US anti-missile defence shield. For the former Soviet satellites Moscow's sabre rattling underlines the need to forge strong military links with the US.

The missile defence system is designed to protect the eastern US seaboard against a nuclear attack from the Middle East. Poland and the Czech Republic stand to gain little direct security from the shield bases on their territory but they see the US presence as a bulwark against Russian influence and repayment for the US's role in defeating the Soviet Union.

"Considering the relative weakness of the EU's common foreign and defence policies, it comes down to a single question, 'Do we want the Americans in or do we want the Americans out?'" said Eugeniusz Smolar, president of the Centre for International Studies, a Polish foreign policy think-tank.

The 10 missile silos to be located in Poland, and the radar tracking system to be built in the Czech Republic will commit the US to an area where no US bases were located following Poland and the Czech Republic's 1999 Nato accession.

"These installations in no way endanger Russia," said Jaroslaw Kaczynski, Polish prime minister, in a radio interview yesterday. "It's simply about Poland's status and about Russia's hopes that Poland will again in one way or another . . . find itself in the sphere of Russian influence."

Although no one foresees Russian tanks clanking westwards any time soon, Warsaw is apprehensive about overdependence on Russian energy.

For years warnings about Russian intentions were treated as Polish paranoia by west Europeans, who had no experience of Soviet occupation. But the recent murder in London of Alexander Litvinenko, the former Russian spy, and cuts in oil and gas supplies have tarnished Moscow's image in the west.

Russian warnings that it may pull out of the Intermediate Nuclear Forces Treaty and this week's threat to point its weapons at the US anti-missile bases in Poland and the Czech Republic are adding to fears about Russia.

Like Poland, the Czech Republic has been a firm ally of the US since the collapse of the Warsaw Pact. The foreign policy establishment regards the bases as a way of cementing trans-atlantic links and repaying the US for its role in ending Soviet domination.

Tomas Pojar, the deputy Czech foreign minister told the Financial Times that the bases would strengthen co-operation within Nato and erase the rift between the US and Europe. "Any [future] Nato missile defence will have to be integrated with this system. This should be the the beginning of the building of real protection for the European continent."

Alexandr Vondra, the Czech vice-premier for Europe, said in an interview with Hospodarske Noviny, the business daily, this week: "Being in alliances also means that we do not only take - we also have to offer to give back. Should we turn our back on this request, there is a threat that the USA will back off from Europe. Should the Poles and the Czechs reject this base, the Americans will act accordingly."

While the right-of centre governments in Warsaw and Prague are keen to begin negotiations with Washington, opinion polls show opponents of the the US bases significantly outnumber supporters.

Sweeteners could come in the form of a US decision to waive visas for Poles and Czechs, as well as money to modernise the countries armed forces.

"The system itself doesn't actually help Poland's security. In fact it creates additional problems by angering the Russians," says Dariusz Rosati, a former Polish foreign minister. "But it's always good to protect an ally and the US wants this."

Missile sites chosen for geography

The reason for the proposed siting of facilities in Poland and the Czech Republic is simple: geography, writes Stephen Fidler in London.

The proposed interceptor sites in Poland, near the Baltic Sea, are on a direct line drawn between northern Iran and New York or Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0134946

The proposed siting near Jince in the Czech Republic of the powerful X-Band radar that would home the interceptors on to the US-bound missiles is, according to some scientists, to the west of its ideal location. Other suitable radar locations, from a geographical standpoint, would include Lithuania, Belarus, Russia, Ukraine and Georgia.

Philip Coyle, a missile defence expert with the Center for Defense Information in the US, says in practical terms the system poses no threat to Russia since it could not cope with either the number of Russian missiles or their sophisticated decoys and countermeasures. he said the system "has not demonstrated the capability to defend the United States under likely battlefield conditions".

One question is whether the countries concerned have increased risks to themselves by agreeing to site these missiles there. Theodore Postol, a scientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has argued that the curvature of the earth would prevent the US early warning radar at Fylingdales in the UK from seeing missiles from Iran aimed at the Czech or Polish sites. Mr Coyle says that, for this reason, US statements that the system would protect people in the Czech Republic and Poland from Iranian missiles are "misleading".

US Envoy Dispatched After Putin Charge (AP)

AP, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) -- President's Bush's national security adviser is embarking on a high-level mission to Moscow and other European capitals, just over a week after incendiary remarks about Bush and the United States by Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Stephen Hadley was departing Washington Tuesday for a four-day trip to Brussels, Moscow and Berlin, said Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for Hadley and Bush's National Security Council.

In Brussels, Hadley planned to meet with NATO and European Union officials. In Moscow and Berlin, he was scheduled to sit down with his counterparts in the Russian and German governments.

"This is part of ongoing discussions that will cover a full range of issues," Johndroe said.

The trip has been planned for weeks. But it comes at a particularly delicate time in the Washington-Moscow relationship, meaning the Russian portion of his travels would be the most closely watched.

Putin surprised the White House on Feb. 10 by angrily accusing the United States of inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend them from an "almost uncontained use of military force." At a security conference in Germany, the Russian leader said that "one state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

It was Putin's harshest criticism yet of the United States. Bush, at a news conference several days later, said there was a "complicated relationship" between the United States and Russia, but that Putin was "the same strong-willed person" he has known since 2001.

"We have areas of cooperation with the Russians, particularly on our common desire to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction and our approach to fight terrorism," Johndroe said.

At the State Department, deputy spokesman Tom Casey said that "on the broad range of issues, Russia is an important partner" and "a partner that we can have very open and frank discussions with." He dismissed any suggestion that the two countries are moving back "toward some kind of renewed Cold War."

Somalia Plan Adopted (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 20 — The Security Council on Tuesday authorized the dispatch of an African Union peacekeeping force to Somalia to help stabilize the country so a United Nations operation can take over in six months.

The British-drafted resolution, passed 15 to 0, urges African countries to furnish troops. The numbers pledged total less than half of the 8,000 needed, officials said.

It also demanded guarantees of safety and access for international aid workers.

Shelling In Somali Capital Kills 15 (WP/AP)

Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

MOGADISHU, Somalia, Feb. 20 -- Mortar rounds and rockets hit Somalia's capital early Tuesday in a series of attacks that killed 15 people and wounded more than 40, doctors and witnesses said.

DOJ_NMG_0134947

The violence was among the worst since a two-week war in December, in which Ethiopian troops helped government forces drive out an Islamic militia that had taken over much of the country. Somalia's weak interim government then moved into the capital.

The presidential palace and seaport were targeted in Tuesday's attacks. Ethiopian troops returned fire with artillery and heavy machine-gun fire. Families have begun fleeing the city in recent days as violence has escalated.

Mogadishu's mayor blamed the attacks on remnants of the Islamic Courts movement. U.S. and Ethiopian officials have accused the group of maintaining ties with al-Qaeda, an allegation the group denies.

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Tuesday to authorize an African Union force to help stabilize Somalia and set the stage for U.N. peacekeepers to take over the long-term job.

The resolution urges the 53 African nations to contribute troops to an 8,000-strong force and urges other U.N. member states to provide financial support.

The New Somalia: A Grimly Familiar Rerun (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, February 21, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Feb. 20 — Fierce mortar attacks killed at least 15 civilians in Somalia on Tuesday, and for a country that had seemed on the verge of ending 16 years of chaotic violence this is the new status quo.

Nearly every day, government forces and insurgents shell each other across Mogadishu's already dilapidated neighborhoods, scattering bodies and any remaining traces of hope. Gun prices are soaring and more clans are joining the underground, while an outbreak of cholera sweeps the countryside.

"To tell you the truth, I'm pretty worried," said Mohammed Ali Mahdi, a top clan elder. When the government came to Mogadishu, "I felt we were going the right way. Unfortunately, that's not the case anymore and soon it's going to be too late."

It is hard to believe, but Somalia is actually becoming a more violent and chaotic place. That is not how it was supposed to be. Nearly two months ago, an internationally-supported transitional government ousted the Islamist forces and steamed into Mogadishu, the capital, with great expectations. But confidence in the government — never very high — is rapidly bleeding away.

Somalia seems to be just shy of total collapse — again — because the Ethiopian troops who provided the muscle to throw out the Islamists are withdrawing, yet none of the peacekeepers promised from other African countries have arrived.

Hundreds of families are streaming out of Mogadishu, hoisting mattresses on their backs and following pitted roads to villages where there is no electricity, medicine or even the faintest hint of government, but at least no warfare. At least, not yet.

"We can't stand the shelling anymore," said Hassan Mohammed, a father of four, who was headed to a village in the south.

There was a burst of optimism beginning Dec. 28, when government troops, with Ethiopian firepower behind them, marched into Mogadishu and planted the hope that the anarchy was ending. Cheering crowds poured into ruined streets. Aid experts in Nairobi circulated ambitious reconstruction plans. Ethiopian and American officials, who had worked together to overthrow the Islamists, breathed a mutual sigh of relief.

But what has happened in the past few weeks has killed that mood. A deadly insurgency has started, beginning with a few clans connected to the Islamists and now expanding to several more. Many government troops refuse to get involved. "We're not going out there," said Dahir Hassan, a police captain, from the confines of his police station. "If we get hurt, who's going to take care of us?"

All analysts agree that the violence will continue and probably intensify unless the government reconciles with clan leaders, who control, as much as anyone controls, what happens in Somalia.

But so far, there's been very little of that. Instead of reaching out to truly influential figures, analysts say the government has picked ministers not because they have any substantial support among their clans but because they will do the government's bidding. The result is an increasingly isolated, authoritarian and unpopular government in which the transitional president, Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, is accused of behaving more like a clan warlord — which he was — than a national leader.

"Where this government is heading is so far from where the international community wants it to go," said Ali Iman Sharmarke, one of the owners of the HornAfrik radio station in Mogadishu.

A common complaint is that the transitional government — transitional being the operative word — is not working itself out of a job as promised. Donor nations agreed to pay the salaries of Somali officials with the understanding that those men and handful of women would shepherd the country to democratic elections in 2009. But there has been almost no progress toward setting up an election commission, let alone taking a census. Many Somalis say they would be more inclined to support, or at least tolerate, the transitional government if they thought it was indeed transitional.

DOJ_NMG_0134948

To be fair, ruling Somalia, which has not had a functioning central government since 1991, is no easy task. Thirteen previous governments have been formed and 13 previous governments have failed.

Abdirahman Dinari, the government's chief spokesman, said the criticism about the government's selection of ministers was just an excuse. "These people wouldn't be happy with anyone in power," he said, conceding that the government, on its own, did not have the skills to pull the country together. "We need help."

But Mr. Dinari said help had been slow to arrive, partly because international organizations were spending millions of dollars on a staff based in Kenya, which is deemed a much safer place to work, instead of investing those resources in Somalia.

But many say that argument rings hollow. Security in Somalia does not depend on foreign troops or foreign aid. At least, it never has. In the early 1990s, the United States and the United Nations poured hundreds of millions of dollars into stabilizing Somalia and they failed notoriously, leaving the country as capriciously violent and hopeless as ever.

Then along came the Islamists, who during their six-month reign last year pacified the hornet's nest of Mogadishu by persuading clans to voluntarily disarm their militias and persuading Somalis, most of whom are Sunni Muslims, to buy into their Islam-is-the-answer solution.

One Western diplomat laughed when asked if a modest force of peacekeepers — the African Union is proposing around 8,000 — could deliver the level of stability that the Islamists had delivered on their own.

"No way," he said, speaking anonymously under diplomatic rules. "And the government's urgency for peacekeepers shows you just how badly they've done with reconciliation."

Europeans Agree To Cut Emissions Sharply If U.S. And Others Follow Suit (NYT)

By James Kanter

New York Times, February 21, 2007

PARIS, Feb. 20 — Seeking to persuade other nations to curb greenhouse gas emissions, European Union ministers pledged Tuesday to raise their own targets if industrialized countries like the United States made similar efforts.

European governments would be ready to cut emissions 30 percent below 1990 levels by 2020, from a current pledge of 20 percent, but only if other heavy polluters joined in, said Sigmar Gabriel, the German environment minister, who led a meeting in Brussels that formally endorsed the European targets.

Germany, the biggest European economy, was already prepared to cut its emissions even further if there was a broader agreement, Mr. Gabriel said, noting that the German Parliament had supported a 40 percent target.

The pledges, which match a proposal made by the European Commission last month, are signs that nations are gearing up for new negotiations on a global climate accord after 2012, when the first period covered by the Kyoto Protocol expires.

The issue is expected to be on the agenda when Germany serves as host of a meeting in June of the Group of 8 nations. European countries are hoping to win pledges from big developing countries as well, including China and India.

"You get a deadlock in international negotiations when there's the attitude that, 'We're not going to do anything until someone goes first,' so it's good that the ministers committed to 20 percent," said Kirsty Hamilton, a policy consultant for the UK Business Council for Sustainable Energy, a group representing British utilities.

But environmentalists were disappointed that governments postponed a more ambitious goal of 30 percent, unless other countries adopted similar policies.

Choosing a lower target "will send the wrong signal to the international community, casting a dubious light on how serious the European Union is about fighting climate change," said Jan Kowalzig, a climate and energy campaigner for Friends of the Earth in Brussels.

European officials want other parts of the world, including the United States, to adopt European-style restrictions on emissions to fight climate change, thus helping European businesses compete globally at a time when the European Union is toughening regulation in sectors like air travel, car manufacturing and construction.

But splits among member states over how much more Europe can afford to cut back on pollutants have emerged as obstacles to reaching firm targets.

Last week, European Union energy ministers backed away from approving a binding proposal that 20 percent of all energy must come from renewable sources, like wind and solar power, by 2020.

According to Friends of the Earth, Finland, Poland and Hungary resisted the 20 percent target, and only Sweden and Denmark supported a unilateral 30 percent target.

A European diplomat said Finland, Poland and Hungary had expressed reservations about how the burden would be shared so that poorer and more energy-intensive parts of Europe could develop their economies.

Such differences could foreshadow a showdown in March, when political leaders are to meet in Brussels and reach a final position.

DOJ_NMG_0134949

Skeptics Emerge On Technologies For Cleaner Coal (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, February 21, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — Within the next few years, power companies are planning to build about 150 coal plants to meet growing electricity demands. Despite expectations that global warming rules are coming, almost none of the plants will be built to capture the thousands of tons of carbon dioxide that burning coal spews into the atmosphere.

Environmentalists are worried, but they put their faith in a technology that gasifies the coal before burning. Such plants are designed, they say, to be more adaptable to separating the carbon and storing it underground.

Most utility officials counter that the gasification approach is more expensive and less reliable, but they say there is no need to worry because their tried-and-true method, known as pulverized coal, can also be equipped later with hardware to capture the global warming gas.

But now, influential technical experts are casting doubts on both approaches.

"The phrases 'capture ready' and 'capture capable' are somewhat controversial," said Revis James, the director of the energy technology assessment center at the Electric Power Research Institute. "It's not like you just leave a footprint for some new equipment."

Many experts outside the industry share his concerns.

A major new study by faculty members at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, scheduled for release soon, concludes in a draft version that it is not clear which technology — the so-called integrated gasification combined cycle or pulverized coal — will allow for the easiest carbon capture, because so much engineering work remains to be done.

"Other than recommending that new coal combustion units should be built with the highest efficiency that is economically justifiable, we do not believe that a clear preference for one technology or the other can be justified," the draft concludes. The M.I.T. study said it was critical that the government "not fall into the trap of picking a technology 'winner.' "

The study leader, Ernest J. Moniz, a former assistant secretary of energy in the Clinton administration, was more blunt. "Clearly in a lot of discussions, I.G.C.C. has been anointed as the solution," he said referring to integrated gasification combined cycle. He made his comments at a symposium organized by the Aspen Institute in Washington last fall. "We certainly don't agree with that."

Retrofitting either a gasification or pulverized coal power plant is not just a matter of adding new equipment and it might be impractical, the experts say. Temperatures and pressures would be designed to be in one range for a plant that captured its carbon, and another if it merely produced electricity with minimum use of fuel. Less fuel means less carbon dioxide production.

Adding carbon capture later also has implications for power supply. Early estimates are that carbon capture will require so much energy that it could reduce plant output by 10 to 30 percent.

Some experts say that the best choice may vary according to the type of coal used. Coal with high moisture content may be less suitable for gasification.

The technical assessment is certainly at odds with the hopes expressed by environmentalists. The TXU Corporation of Dallas is planning a fleet of huge new coal plants of the pulverized variety. In Austin, Tex., Tom Smith, a researcher at Public Citizen, who is helping lead the opposition, said, "It's clear that coal gasification is by far preferable to building traditional pulverized coal plants." On Tuesday a Texas District court judge blocked a plan by the governor to "fast track" TXU's application.

Getting carbon out of the gas stream before combustion must be easier, Mr. Smith said, because the post-combustion gases in a pulverized coal plant are 160 times as great.

Some utility executives agree. David Crane, the chief executive of NRG Energy, said that at some point engineers might work out an economical way to capture carbon after combustion in a pulverized coal plant, but that does not exist now.

Because carbon regulation is coming, he said, gasification plants will be needed.

"For the next generation, it's clear to me that rather than build a bunch of pulverized coal plants, with their 50-year life, the country is much better off if we go to I.G.C.C.," he said. The company is planning such a plant in Tonawanda, N.Y.

Others point out that carbon capture from gas made from coal has proved workable, at least at a relatively small nonpower plant that manufactures methane, but that it is still unproved at a large power plant. They say the only way to prove its feasibility is to go ahead now, rather than simply build plants to be modified later.

"There is no reason to wait," Robert H. Socolow, a professor at Princeton who is an expert on carbon capture, said in an e-mail message. "We are going to learn on the job."

Some environmentalists dispute the need for new coal plants, but unless there is very rapid progress soon in realizing energy efficiencies or developing the ability to extract and store huge amounts of wind and solar power at reasonable cost, more coal plants seem certain. Compared with cleaner fossil fuels, like natural gas and oil, coal is cheaper and more widely available. So finding a way to capture the greenhouse gases from these plants is critical.

DOJ_NMG_0134950

At American Electric Power, which plans to build two gasification plants and add carbon separation later, Bruce H. Braine, the vice president for strategic policy analysis, acknowledged that there was a "retrofit factor" that would raise the price of such a plant above the cost of waiting a few years and building in the separation technology from the start. But because there is demonstrable evidence that separating carbon from gasified coal would work better than at a pulverized coal plant, he said, "we think it's the right thing to do to move the I.G.C.C. technology forward."

Engineers agree that it is easier to remove sulfur, mercury, particles and other conventional pollutants from plants that use gasification. But they are more expensive to build, and the industry has little experience with their reliability. Even the manufacturers concede this.

"It will work," Randy Zwirn, the chief executive of Siemens Power Generation, said of the ability to separate carbon from a gasified coal plant. "The question is, Can it be done economically?"

Power companies need to start getting experience in this field, he said, but they will need subsidies or agreements with state regulators to avoid being unfairly penalized for testing designs that turned out not to run very well, at least not at first. Otherwise, he said, they would stick with tried-and-true methods and the early steps to a truly revolutionary technology might never be taken.

John Thompson, director of the Coal Transition Program at the Clean Air Task Force, an environmental group, argued that coal gasification was superior because it allowed far better control of conventional pollutants, like mercury, and because it offered new ways of making money from coal-fired plants. For example, he said, they might use a gasifier that made fuel for a power generator during peak hours, and in off-peak hours made gas that could be turned into liquid fuel for vehicles or other valuable chemicals.

But at the Electric Power Research Institute, which surveys the technologies for low-carbon generation, Steve Specker, the president, refers to a "horse race" between pulverized coal and combined cycle.

For all the questions about the coal technologies, any new plant should at least be an improvement on what is operating now. The reason is that many plants now running require about 10,000 B.T.U.'s of heat to make a kilowatt-hour. But newer designs, called "supercritical," use hotter steam, with no moisture, and get more work out of it.

The newest designs, which the industry calls "ultra supercritical," push down the amount of heat needed to make a kilowatt-hour; engineers expect to reach the range of 7,500 B.T.U.

This will be small consolation, however, if the total number of kilowatt-hours rises sharply at the same time that reducing carbon emissions becomes a national goal.

A Battle Over The Costs Of Global Warming (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

New York Times, February 21, 2007

New Haven

There is an unofficial code of conduct that dictates how intellectuals should behave when they're jousting with each other, a sort of Geneva Convention for the ivory tower.

Before they attack somebody else's work, they first need to praise their opponent. A typical way to do so is to describe another professor as a distinguished scholar who has made an important contribution to the research literature. When you hear that, you can be pretty sure things are about to get nasty.

The rest of us can usually ignore these spats, but once in a while there is an academic fight that really matters. The economics profession is engaged in one of those right now and, as luck would have it, it's even more entertaining than most.

Last week, Sir Nicholas Stern, a top adviser to the British government, came to the United States to talk about climate change. In October, a commission he led released a 700-page report calling for "urgent action" against global warming to prevent economic damage that could rival that of the world wars and the Great Depression. Given its source and its tone, the Stern Review has nudged people to talk more seriously about climate change.

In the minds of a lot of American economists, however, the review is a badly flawed piece of work. These economists don't doubt that earth is getting hotter, that human activity is the cause and that the results could be bad. But they think that Sir Nicholas may have exaggerated the likely speed of warming, among other things, and overstated the case for big, quick action.

The epicenter of the opposition has been here at Yale, and so last week, after stopping in Washington to testify before Congress, Sir Nicholas came to New Haven for a public debate with his critics. With a couple of hundred students and professors in the audience — and a sculpture of an angry Zeus-like figure looming above the stage — the two sides went at it in the dignified, vicious way that academics do.

DOJ_NMG_0134951

Sir Nicholas spoke during the morning, and his case is really quite simple. The carbon dioxide that has already been pumped into the atmosphere guarantees that the planet will keep getting warmer. But the decisions that people make over the next couple of decades will determine how much warmer — and, in all likelihood, how many floods, droughts, hurricanes, crop failures and species extinctions occur. The surest way to reduce emissions is a big economic deterrent, like a carbon tax.

"The later we leave it, the more difficult it will be," he said, "and the more risks you run."

The Stern Review's most influential critic has probably been William Nordhaus, a 65-year-old Yale professor who is as mainstream as economists come. Jeffrey D. Sachs, the anti-poverty advocate, calls Mr. Nordhaus "about the most reasonable man I know."

He was the first speaker after lunch, and, of course, he had some very nice things to say about Sir Nicholas. The report "was presented here very eloquently by a distinguished scholar," Mr. Nordhaus said. But then came the juicy stuff: the Stern Review "commits cruel and unusual punishment on the English language," Mr. Nordhaus said, and the British government's opinion on climate change is no more infallible than was its prewar view about weapons of mass destruction in Iraq.

This was fairly tame compared with the comments of another Yale economist, Robert O. Mendelsohn. "I was awestruck," he said, comparing Sir Nicholas to "The Wizard of Oz." But "my job is to be Toto," he added, in the same good-humored tone Mr. Nordhaus used. "Is it in fact The Wizard of Oz, or is it nothing at all?"

The two professors raised some questions about the science in the Stern Review. Mr. Nordhaus wondered if carbon emissions and temperatures would rise as quickly as the report suggests, and Mr. Mendelsohn predicted that people would learn to adapt to climate change, reducing its ultimate cost.

But their main objection revolved around something called the discount rate. The Stern Review assumed that a dollar of economic damage prevented a century from now (adjusted for inflation) is roughly as valuable as a dollar spent reducing emissions today. In effect, the report argues for spending the money to cut emissions because future generations have as much claim on resources as current generations. "I've still not heard a decent ethical argument" for believing otherwise, Sir Nicholas said at the debate.

I'm guessing that your instinct is to agree with him. Mine certainly was. The problem is that none of us actually behave this way. If we really thought that our great-grandchild deserved our money as much as we do, we would never go out to dinner again. Instead, we would invest the $50 we would have spent on dinner, confident that it would grow over time and become perhaps $1,000 for our great-grandchild to put toward health care, education or a supercomputer. Any of that is preferable to our measly dinner.

But a dollar today truly is more valuable than a dollar a century from now. For one thing, your great-grandchild will almost certainly be richer than you are and won't need your money as much as you do. So spending a dollar on carbon reduction today to avoid a dollar's worth of economic damage in 2107 doesn't make sense. We would be better off putting the money toward something likely to have a higher return than alternative energy, like education.

Technically, then, Sir Nicholas's opponents win the debate. But in practical terms, their argument has a weak link. They are assuming that the economic gains from, say, education will make future generations rich enough to make up for any damage caused by climate change. Sea walls will be able to protect cities; technology can allow crops to grow in new ways; better medicines can stop the spread of disease.

No one knows whether this is true, let alone desirable, because no one knows what life will be like on a planet that is five degrees hotter. "If ever there was an example where there was uncertainty, this is it," said Martin L. Weitzman, a Harvard economist who attended the debate.

While sitting there, I was reminded of the speeches that Alan Greenspan gave a few years ago about the risks of deflation. It wasn't the most likely outcome, he said, but the consequences of it could be so bad that policy makers had to take steps to prevent it. Focusing attention on this point — the catastrophic risks of climate change — is Sir Nicholas's biggest accomplishment, whatever you think of his math.

As Mr. Weitzman puts it, the Stern Review is "right for the wrong reasons."

Even its critics seem open to this idea. When Mr. Nordhaus and Sir Nicholas were exchanging e-mail messages before the debate — to their credit, some academics keep their arguments from becoming personal — Mr. Nordhaus sent a note that summed up his view. "I think it's a great study, but it's 50 years ahead of its time," he recalled writing. "Since everybody else is 50 years behind the times, if you average the two, you might come out just right."

In other words, it's time for a tax on carbon emissions.

Where Warming Hits Home (LAT)

By Henry Chu

Los Angeles Times, February 21, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0134952

In Bangladesh, rising oceans are surging up rivers, making life difficult — and salty — for residents of the low-lying region.

Bhamia, Bangladesh

Global warming has a taste in this village. It is the taste of salt.

Only a few years ago, water from the local pond was fresh and sweet on Samit Biswas' tongue. It quenched his family's thirst and cleansed their bodies.

But drinking a cupful now leaves a briny flavor in his mouth. Tiny white crystals sprout on Biswas' skin after he bathes and in his clothes after his wife washes them.

The change, international scientists say, is the result of intensified flooding caused by shifting climate patterns. Warmer weather and rising oceans are sending seawater surging up Bangladesh's rivers in greater volume and frequency than ever before, experts say, overflowing and seeping into the soil and water supply of thousands of people.

Their lives are being squeezed by distant lands they have seen only on television — America, China and Russia at the top of the list — whose carbon emissions are pushing temperatures and sea levels upward. Earlier this month, a long-awaited report by the United Nations said global warming fueled by human activity could lift temperatures by 8 degrees and the ocean's surface by 23 inches by 2100.

Here in southwestern Bangladesh, the bleak future forecast by the report is already becoming reality, bringing misery along with it.

The heavier than usual floods have wiped out homes and paddy fields. They have increased the salinity of the water, which is contaminating wells, killing trees and slowly poisoning the jungle that forms a natural barrier against the Bay of Bengal.

If sea levels continue to rise at their present rate, by the time Biswas, 35, retires from his job as a teacher, the only home he has known will be swamped, overrun by the ocean with the force of an unstoppable army. That, in turn, will trigger another kind of flood: millions of displaced residents desperate for a place to live.

"It will be a disaster," Biswas said.

Bangladesh, a densely crowded and painfully poor nation, contributes only a minuscule amount to the greenhouse gases slowly smothering the planet. But a combination of geography and demography puts it among the countries experts predict will be hit hardest as Earth heats up.

Nearly 150 million people, the equivalent of about half the U.S. population, live packed in an area the size of Iowa and about as flat. Home to where the mighty Brahmaputra, Ganges and Meghna rivers meet, most of Bangladesh is a vast delta of alluvial plains that are barely above sea level, making it prone to flooding from waterways swollen by rain, snowmelt from the Himalayas and increased infiltration of the ocean.

Global warming trends have already exacerbated that, and the situation will probably get worse, scientists say.

"A little increase in temperature, a little climate change, has a magnified impact here," said A. Atiq Rahman, director of the Bangladesh Center for Advanced Studies — the country's leading environmental research group — in Dhaka, the capital. "That's what makes the population here so vulnerable."

Other low-lying countries also are at risk, including the Netherlands and tiny islands in the South Pacific that could eventually be swallowed by the expanding oceans. But the population of these countries is only a fraction of that of Bangladesh.

If the sea here rises by a foot, which some researchers say could happen by 2040, the resulting damage would set back Bangladesh's progress by 30 years, Rahman said. As much as 12% of the population would be made homeless.

A 3-foot rise by century's end — a possible scenario if the polar ice caps melt at a more rapid pace — would wreak havoc in Bangladesh on an apocalyptic, Atlantis-like scale, according to scientific projections and models.

A quarter of the country would be submerged. Dhaka, now in the center of the nation, would sit within 60 miles of the coast, where boats would float above the underwater remnants of countless town squares, markets, houses and schools. As many as 30 million people would become refugees in their own land, many of them subsistence farmers with nothing left to subsist on.

"Tomorrow's poverty will be far worse than today's," Rahman said.

For years, the government here either denied or downplayed the danger posed by global warming. Bangladesh is hardly unique in that regard; many accuse the U.S. of doing the same. Rahman recalls overhearing officials ridicule him as a madman when he warned that Bangladesh risked being inundated.

But the weight of scientific opinion has grown, as has evidence that climate patterns are already shifting and producing harmful effects in this region. Politicians who had previously dismissed global warming as a far-off problem are starting to see it as a clear and present danger.

"Part of it is sheer reality hitting you on the head — there's stronger floods, more frequent floods," Rahman said. "Now the game is much clearer. The connection ... has been proven beyond a reasonable doubt."

Three years ago, the government set up a climate-change unit in its Environment Ministry, but it employs only a handful of staff and depends largely on the British government for funding.

DOJ_NMG_0134953

Lately officials have also begun appealing to wealthy, fossil-fuel-consuming nations such as Japan and the countries of the European Union to help Bangladesh prepare for a catastrophe it has few resources to combat.

"Lives in Bangladesh will be devastated through no fault of the people concerned," Sabihuddin Ahmed, the ambassador to Britain and a former Environment Ministry official, wrote in the Guardian newspaper in September.

For people in the West, Ahmed said, the onslaught of global warming may seem decades away. In Bangladesh, "the future has arrived."

Here in the coastal southwest, in an area called Munshiganj close to the Indian border and the famed Sundarbans mangrove forest, grizzled farmers describe the relentless encroachment of the sea.

Thirty years ago, an embankment built to hem in the tidal rivers around them was sufficient to protect villagers from major inundations. Now they estimate that the high-tide mark has climbed 10 feet, and breaches such as one that happened in September, which swamped hundreds of homes, have become depressingly common.

"The water came up to here," said Iman Ali Gain, sweeping his hand up to his chest as scores of men behind him hauled baskets of gloppy gray soil to repair the dike. "We were afraid when we saw it."

Like many, perhaps most, Munshiganj residents, Gain, 65, does not understand concepts such as carbon footprints, greenhouse gases, the ozone layer or melting icecaps. The vast majority of the people in this area are illiterate; only one in five has finished primary school.

But Gain knows how his life has changed over the last several years because of new environmental conditions. He once grew rice to support himself and his family, but his harvests started shrinking as the salinity of the water increased. To cope, he followed the example of many of his neighbors and switched to shrimp farming, a way to take advantage of the salty water washing over the fields.

For the first time in Munshiganj, shrimp farming occupies more of the cultivable land than do traditional crops.

Though the shift has enabled some villagers to survive, it has created other headaches. Because it is less labor-intensive, shrimp farming has boosted unemployment. Thousands of residents have migrated to other parts of Bangladesh or India in search of work.

Worse yet, deliberately trapping so much briny water to raise shrimp has increased the sodium concentration in the soil, which aggravates the salinity creeping into drinking-water supplies.

"From ancient times, our people used [local] ponds for drinking water. Now they need to go four to five kilometers to collect sweet water," said Mohon Kumar Mondal, a local environmental activist who is trying to promote awareness of and adaptation to climate change.

The small pond here in the village of Bhamia draws women with their jars from several surrounding villages that used to have their own, or closer, sources of drinking water. But Bhamia's pond is becoming more saline, and the nearest abundant source of untainted fresh water is nearly fives miles away.

Residents report an increase in health problems such as diarrhea, skin diseases and dysentery. The salty water has also killed many of the palm and date trees that once lent a fecund beauty to the sunbaked landscape.

Those here who are strongly religious, a mix of Muslims and Hindus, have tended to ascribe the changes in climate and the natural disasters befalling them to God, Mondal said.

Perhaps it is punishment for their impiety, the people murmur; perhaps, with repentance and prayer, God will relent and spare them the heavier floods, the stronger cyclones and the hotter summers they are experiencing. And perhaps there will be more fresh water to slake their thirst.

A geographer with a master's degree, Mondal, 31, knows humans are responsible for the problem that is making life more difficult here — and threatens to make it impossible if the temperatures and the oceans keep rising.

And so it is to humans, especially those in developed societies, that he issues his plea.

"I request people, please understand the situation of the Earth. Please make your decisions according to the situation," Mondal said. "And please think of poor people like us, who have not created greenhouse gases. Please think of our situation."

New Fight, Old Foe: Slavery (CSM)

By Jane Lampman

The Christian Science Monitor, February 21, 2007

Zach Hunter was only 12 years old when he became an abolitionist. During Black History Month three years ago, as he read about Harriet Tubman and Frederick Douglass, he thought he, too, would have fought against slavery if he'd lived back then. But to his astonishment, Zach found soon afterward that people are still held as slaves today.

"When I learned there were about 27 million slaves in the world, it blew me away," says the high school freshman from Atlanta. "I wondered what I could do."

DOJ_NMG_0134954

He noticed loose change lying around the house, and a project was born. He formed Loose Change to Loosen Chains, and with the help of friends, collected some $10,000 to fight modern-day slavery.

This year, Zach is part of a much broader antislavery initiative, serving as student spokesman for "The Amazing Change." Next month marks the 200th anniversary of the end of the British slave trade, which was spurred by a young parliamentarian and reformer, William Wilberforce. A feature film on Wilberforce, "Amazing Grace," opens in US theaters nationwide on Feb. 23. The filmmakers are partnering with modern antislavery organizations to enlist students and others in a contemporary abolitionist movement. (See: www.theamazingchange.com).

For his part, Zach has penned a book, "Be the Change," and travels across the country to speak to young people at music festivals, schools, and churches.

"I tell them they can channel their passion into something that makes a difference," he says. "Small groups of people have changed things all through history."

Slavery is illegal everywhere in the world, yet it persists. Zach finds inspiration in the courage of Wilberforce, who kept fighting under difficult circumstances. The reformer spent 20 years collecting evidence of the crimes of Britain's slave trade. He introduced bills that were repeatedly rejected by parliament before the trade was finally ended in 1807.

The Amazing Change campaign encourages people to sign a petition to end modern-day slavery, donate to the cause, and learn how they can take an active part in the movement. A percentage of funds donated will help four nonprofit groups (Free the Slaves, International Justice Mission, Rugmark, and Child Voice International) collect evidence, go to court to free people from current forms of slavery, and help former slaves establish a new life.

Last Sunday, churches in all 50 states and several countries participated in "Amazing Grace Sunday." Praying together for freedom, the congregations also joined in singing the well-known hymn written by John Newton, a former slave trader.

Newton wrote the beloved "Amazing Grace" around 1770 after a Christian conversion led him into the ministry; he was once Wilberforce's pastor.

While slavery takes different forms today, the impact remains devastating to lives around the globe, according to UN and US government statistics. An estimated 300,000 children have been forced to serve as child soldiers in more than 30 conflicts. Each year, human trafficking for sexual servitude or forced labor moves 800,000 people across international borders, including some 17,500 foreigners trafficked into the United States. Some 200,000 people are considered to live enslaved in the US.

The number of bonded slaves – men, women, and children who toil in agriculture or industries – has reached an estimated 20 million worldwide, says Free the Slaves.

While total figures for slaves vary (the International Labor Organization has used 12.3 million for forced labor and sexual servitude), the 27 million estimate Zach Hunter cites is widely supported.

Remarkably, many slaves are in the public eye, yet invisible. For example, Kim, a young teen from a family of Tibetan exiles, was surreptitiously sold by a relative to an American minister traveling in India. He brought her back to a rural town in Massachusetts in 1985, where she became his sex slave and household servant. The pastor told Kim her family would be thrown in jail if she told anyone, so while she attended school, she kept the secret for five years. Only when Kim learned her cousins were to share the same fate did she go to the police.

Kim's poignant story is told in "Not for Sale: The Return of the Global Slave Trade and How We Can Fight It," by David Batstone, one of three new books associated with the Amazing Change campaign.

A professor of ethics at the University of San Francisco, Dr. Batstone traveled to five continents last year to investigate the workings of modern slavery, including going undercover to gather evidence. He defines slavery as "forcing someone else's labor without compensation, and using violence to keep them in their position."

Batstone's interest in the subject was first ignited, he says in an interview, when his favorite Indian restaurant, where he and his wife ate regularly, figured in an exposé by the San Francisco Chronicle. The story revealed that the young waitresses at the restaurant had been brought from India against their will and were also forced to perform sexual favors. The restaurant owner had trafficked in hundreds of young girls and boys.

"In the US, 47 percent of trafficking is in the commercial sex business," Batstone adds. The women are brought mostly from China, Mexico, and southeast Asia.

On his journeys, Batstone found that the most prevalent form of slavery globally is in agriculture, involving labor in rice mills or on plantations, as well as rock quarries and brick kilns. In some cases, people borrow small amounts of money from a local landowner to buy food or pay for a wedding, and the lender begins adding egregious levels of interest, requiring work until it's paid off.

"In India, I met a family of four generations of women," Batstone says, "great-grandmother to daughter, who had spent their entire lives under obligation to a landowner for a loan the great-grandfather had taken out for the equivalent of $10. This is illegal, but hardly enforced."

DOJ_NMG_0134955

While exploring this dark side of the global economy, Batstone found a silver lining: "a rising tide of modern-day abolitionists who are building an underground railroad for the 21st century." So inspired was he by the efforts of many small, understaffed, and underfunded groups working to free people, that the focus of his book shifted to profiling these new abolitionists.

He decided to mount his own international advocacy and fundraising project, too: the "Not for Sale Campaign" (www.notforsalecampaign.org). The campaign enlists athletes, musicians, and others in "making whatever you love best an abolitionist activity."

Figure-skating star Brian Boitano, for instance, "has pledged to give $10 every time he does a triple loop," Batstone says. A "Concert to End Slavery" with top-notch artists has just been filmed in a Los Angeles recording studio, and a documentary related to the book will be ready for TV in March.

But more is needed than raising awareness and funds, Batstone says. "People who should be acting to stop slavery say they don't know where it is." So his students at the University of San Francisco have taken on the job: mapping slavery in the area – where it occurs in agriculture, the restaurant business, domestic servitude, etc. They are also creating a model for how to map slavery so that students and others could do the same in other cities.

"We'll take that report each year to the mayor's office, the chief of police, and the media, saying 'Here's where slavery can be found in our city,' " he says. "My students are unbelievably charged up."

Zach Hunter, too, is enthused about what young people can accomplish. "My vision is that my generation would be written about in the history books as a generation that really cared about others and brought about change," he says.

In Haiti, Abductions Hold Nation Hostage (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, February 21, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti -- Kidnappers came for Petit-FrÃ¨re Desilus in the early afternoon, as he was driving away from his office.

The street was busy and he was just 10 feet outside the gated compound where he worked as a billing clerk. But they got him anyway, Desilus recalled recently in a hushed voice, trying to steady his trembling hands.

Two young men, their faces hard but calm, flashed pistols at him. When he turned, he saw four more gun barrels behind him. Pedestrians did nothing, merely swerving around the unfolding scene, he said.

"Lie down, shut up," Desilus remembers being told. "Today you're going to get yours."

Pressed flat against the back seat, Desilus was about to begin a downward spiral that severed his tenuous hold on a working-class lifestyle, leaving him poor and depressed more than four months after his captors released him. His troubles have become commonplace here. One year after a presidential election that generated optimism and marked only the second peaceful handover of power in Haitian history, Port-au-Prince is a city of fear.

Despite the presence of thousands of U.N. troops and a new military offensive to root out gangs, armed thugs still rule much of this hilly capital, where many of the 2 million residents live in tin or cinder-block shacks. A swarm of recent kidnappings is terrorizing residents and scaring away foreign investment.

Dozens of schools closed in December after students were kidnapped in a series of incidents and a school bus was hijacked. That month, at least 100 people were reported kidnapped, the most since August, when 115 were abducted. Victim advocates say the real numbers may be much higher; once freed, people often are afraid to go to the police.

Haiti's government has been powerless to stop the crisis. International advisers describe the police force and judicial system as critically dysfunctional and profoundly corrupt.

"We are a failed state -- our institutions are bad, they don't work," said Kesner F. Pharel, a Haitian economist who was trained in the United States and runs a business consulting firm in Port-au-Prince. "It is crucial for Haiti to solve the security problem if we have any hope of making progress."

The kidnapping plague, which began in 2004 after the ouster of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide and peaked during the past six months, is the latest horror in a long history of upheaval that has sealed Haiti's position as the Western Hemisphere's poorest nation. A hip destination for the adventurous rich in the 1970s -- a place where Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones hung out and where tourists lounged at the Club Med -- Haiti is now a barely functioning country, dependent on the largess of international donors for two-thirds of its budget. The United States, which provides $200 million a year, is Haiti's largest bilateral donor.

Decades of coups and political instability have ruined Haiti's economy and tourism industry, leaving factories closed and once-thriving beach resorts abandoned. According to the International Monetary Fund, 76 percent of Haitians live on less than $2 per day and 55 percent of those live on less than 44 cents a day.

DOJ_NMG_0134956

Many here had hoped for stabilization after the election last February of President RenÃ© PrÃ©val, a soft-spoken agronomist who held the presidency from 1996 to 2001 and who promised reconciliation among 100 political parties. But crime has soared under PrÃ©val, exacting its heaviest toll on the poor and working class, who cannot afford ransoms or the bodyguards and bulletproof vehicles that shield every movement of Haiti's entrenched elite.

Desilus, 42, a slender man with big, sad eyes, was far from joining Haiti's elites. But he had scratched his way out of the slums and gotten a decent job. Before being kidnapped, he had managed to buy a tiny one-room apartment, where he lived with his wife and three of his six children.

The kidnappers, he said, took him to Cite Soleil, a 2 1/2 -square-mile seaside slum of more than 200,000 people that is ruled by gangs. The kidnappers beat him inside a second-story room that had been converted into a makeshift cell with heavy bars on the windows. They made him drink his own urine, he said.

Following a practice typical of kidnappers here, Desilus's abductors called all the numbers stored in the address book of his cellphone, each time threatening to kill him and demanding $100,000, the equivalent of 20 years' salary for Desilus. A day later, they settled for $4,800 and released him. But his troubles were just starting.

Traumatized by the experience, he asked his boss to let him switch to a job that would require moving around the city less. His boss responded by firing him.

Meanwhile, the friends and associates who had paid for Desilus's ransom were pushing to get their money back. Desilus said he sold his little apartment, as well as a small plot of land that he owned in the country, to pay off his debt. He drained his bank account.

Suddenly homeless, he was forced to move his family into a cousin's home. Jobless, he had to pull four of his children out of school, as even Haitian public schools charge tuition and require parents to buy materials.

"For me to build up what I had, it took me 10 years," he said. "I have to start all over. But being in this country, I don't see how I can."

Desilus desperately wanted someone to face justice. He tried repeatedly to get the Haitian police interested in his case. But each time the officers refused to write a report, he said.

It was a futile exercise that another kidnapping victim, a music vendor who goes by the nickname "Peaceful Michel," didn't even consider embarking upon. Michel, who was abducted in December, was seized in front of a police station and said he is certain the officers witnessed the kidnapping. Friends who have also been kidnapped told him they were "just laughed at" by police when they tried to file complaints, he said.

"Unless you're a millionaire, they're not listening to you," said Michel, who was deported from the United States after serving a four-year drug sentence and now is active in organizations that try to aid Haitian deportees.

The United Nations, which is engaged in background checks of police that officials believe could lead to the dismissal of 1,000 corrupt officers, is now overseeing the largest military operation to defeat gangs since being deployed here in 2004. U.N. officials hope to stem the flow of kidnap ransoms to gangs, some of which need as much as $70,000 a month to pay for their operations.

PrÃ©val initially opposed military intervention, opting to negotiate with the gangs, and invited several top gang leaders to the National Palace. Edmond Mulet, the U.N. special envoy to Haiti, described the talks as a "very strange" strategy.

"By mid-September PrÃ©val said, 'This is going to work. This will be over by October,' " Mulet recalled during an interview at his headquarters in the Hotel Christopher in Port-au-Prince. "I said, 'Okay, if you say so.' But I knew in my heart it would not work."

In the past year, kidnappers appear to have been targeting victims throughout the city rather than staying in the slums that are patrolled by the U.N. troops. Residents of neighborhoods once considered safe now feel anxious.

Christian Duvivier was nabbed after leaving Magdoo's, a hip hangout for Port-au-Prince's young, moneyed set in the prestigious hilltop neighborhood, Petionville.

Kidnappers rammed their car into Duvivier's vehicle, he recalled in an e-mail from the Dominican Republic, where he fled after a ransom was paid and he was released. They pulled out guns and told him they were "the devil's sons" and that "they kill for fun," Duvivier said.

Young people and professionals are pouring out of Haiti. By some estimates as many as 50,000 have left in the past several years, creating a massive "brain drain," according to Pharel, the economist.

But for some kidnapping victims, fleeing is not an option. Emmanuelle Poncet, a Port-au-Prince math teacher, has spent the five months since his kidnapping and release trying to get a visa to enter the United States so he can leave Haiti and "never come back." He finds his solace in chain-smoking and bottles of rum, a form of self-medication that he knows is ruining his health.

DOJ_NMG_0134957

Poncet's brother, a Catholic priest, and a group of friends paid nearly $14,000 to free him. Like Desilus, Poncet has sold what little he had to pay off his debts. His car and a small farm were gone within days of his release, sold cheap because the buyers knew he was desperate.

One week after his release, Poncet got a phone call from another group of kidnappers. They were holding his brother-in-law, they told him. And they wanted money.

Weed's Biofuel Potential Sparks African Land Grab (WT)

By Karen Palmer

The Washington Times, February 21, 2007

ACCRA, Ghana - Jatropha, a scruffy bush producing dry, black nuts, is triggering a scramble for land in Africa, with Norwegian, Indian and British companies looking to producing clean-burning biodiesel for cars and trucks.

It's not much in the looks department, but jatropha has a big advantage over alternatives. The nuts can't be eaten because they are poisonous.

Long used as nothing more than living fences meant to hold back the encroaching Sahara and Kalahari deserts, jatropha oil, the evidence shows, burns cleaner than fossil fuels.

That, in turn, has experimental plantations popping up in Africa from Kenya to Ghana to South Africa.

"You can't keep from winning on this one," said Jack Holden, director of GoldStar Biodiesel, a self-described "serial entrepreneur." He is one of a small number of businessmen, based in Ghana, who hope to profit from jatropha by helping investors find places for their money.

As a natural defense against erosion and desertification, jatropha already is a darling of the development world. Plant it once and it will grow for 50 years, even in some of the poorest soil conditions on the planet.

When drought descends, jatropha bushes keep producing.

Thousands of rural African women's groups have been trained to hand crush the seeds, turning the resulting oil into soap and the organic waste into fertilizer cakes.

But the oil inside its seed also burns with one-fifth the emissions of conventional fuel.

With the growing attention of major oil distributors, jatropha is the little plant that could lift African farmers from lives of poverty and the continent into a fuel oil producer.

That's a lot of pressure on one lowly weed.

It could, however, go the way of the emu farm: just another expensive farming fad that went bust instead of boom.

"You would think the way people talk that it's very easy to go out there and plant jatropha, but we figure it will take about $6 million to do ," said Mr. Holden, whose company is promising to tie community development to biodiesel profits.

Scientists estimate that if even a quarter of the continent's arable land was ploughed into jatropha plantations, output would surpass 20 million barrels a day, almost enough to satisfy the U.S. appetite for oil.

But it's Europe that's driving the thirst for biodiesel. The European Union has said they will use 5.75 percent biodiesel in fuel products by 2010 and 20 percent by 2020, meaning that within four years, the EU will need billions of gallons of biodiesel.

European environment ministers said yesterday they plan to reduce carbon-dioxide emissions 20 percent by 2020, adding that they were ready to go to 30 percent if other industrialized nations matched their efforts. There was no agreement on how the cuts would be achieved or how they would be divvied up among member countries.

Ghana, an English-speaking West African nation, has earmarked $1.6 million in government funds to help establish jatropha plantations.

A Norwegian company has been running ads in the state-owned newspaper looking for land to use for jatropha crops, and Ghana recently received $35 million from the government of India for jatropha research.

A ton of crude jatropha sells for about $300, according to a report prepared for the Ghana Chamber of Mines, which is pushing jatropha production as an alternative to illegal, small-scale gold mining. Farmers could make about $150 per acre, a 50 percent increase over harvests of other cash crops such as tobacco.

Analysts predict that experienced workers can hand-pick more than 65 pounds of jatropha seed pods in an hour, translating into more than 13 pounds of pressed crude, or an hourly wage of nearly $2.

Considering that more than 300 million Africans live on less than a dollar a day, jatropha could help farmers lift themselves out of poverty, something the world has already spent billions trying to achieve with little success.

Still, Ghanaian farmers are not all that interested in jatropha.

"The way things are now, it has potential, but we haven't seen anything for now," said Anthony Mainoo, agricultural technical coordinator at Adventist Development and Relief Agency, which used a $50,000 U.N. Development Program grant to persuade 3,000 farmers to set aside an acre each for jatropha production three years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0134958

When the time came to harvest, there was no one willing to buy the seeds.

"We have no real information on the yield in Ghana, no sense of how the money will flow, no idea," he said.

It's difficult to determine exactly how much African land is currently being cultivated with jatropha, but there are fields slated for planting in Benin, Mali, Senegal, Burkina Faso and Nigeria, plus acreage in Kenya, Malawi, Zimbabwe, Zambia, Namibia and South Africa.

"It's really like gold. You have to put money into it to make it," said Daniel Osei-Bonsu, environmental director of AngloGold Ashanti, a South African-owned gold mine operating on 160,000 acres in Ghana's lush central region.

A year ago, Mr. Osei-Bonsu and his team cleared 56 acres and planted jatropha into ground he compares to asphalt.

Four months later, it was producing its first seeds.

With all analyses pointing to the fact that the AngloGold Ashanti gold vein will be depleted by 2016, Mr. Osei-Bonsu said he is determined to find an alternate source of income for the mine's 3,000 workers.

"If we can demonstrate it can give not big money, but satisfactory money on a regular basis, rather than on a seasonal basis, farmers will pick it up," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0134959

Miller, Charles S

From: Miller, Charles S
Sent: Wednesday, February 21, 2007 10:53 AM
To: Ablin, Erik; Agarwal, Asheesh (CRT); Ames, Andrew; Battaglia, John T; Baxter, Felix (CIV); Beckner, Rick (CIV); Blomquist, Kathleen M; Branda, Joyce (CIV); Bucholtz, Jeffrey (CIV); Bukvics, Jennifer (CIV); Claterbos, Barbara (CIV); Cohen, David M.; Cohn, Jonathan (CIV); Davidson, Jeanne (CIV); Davis, Dan (CIV); Davis, Deborah J; Fargo, John (CIV); Fielding, Gabrielle (CIV); Fischer, Gerard (CIV); Flentje, August (CIV); Frost, Peter (CIV); Garren, Timothy (CIV); Glynn, J.Patrick (CIV); Gorsuch, Neil M; Gunn, Currie (SMO); Hertz, Michael (CIV); Hollis, Robert (CIV); Hunt, Jody (CIV); Hussey, Thom (CIV); Jeweler, James (CIV); Katsas, Gregory; Keisler, Peter D (CIV); Kohn, Chris (CIV); Kopp, Robert (CIV); Letter, Douglas (CIV); Levine, Larry (EOIR); Lindemann, Michael (CIV); Magnuson, Cynthia; McCallum, Robert (SMO); McDonald, Esther Slater; McMahon, Linda M (CIV); Miller, Charles S; Nichols, Carl (CIV); Nowacki, John (USAEO); O'Quinn, John C; Osborn, Tara (CIV); Pyles, Phyllis (CIV); Rivera, Jennifer (CIV); Roehrkasse, Brian; Schiffer, Stuart (CIV); Scolinos, Tasia; Seidel, Rebecca; Shaw, Aloma A; Spellberg, Dianne (CIV); Swenson, Lily F; Thirolf, Eugene; Wilson, Karen L; Zwick, Ken (CIV)
Subject: 2/21/07 Civil Division News

Judge rejects delay of phone wiretap suits; U.S. seeks dismissal in appeals court over national security

Court Endorses Law's Curbs on Detainees

High Court to Hear Microsoft Patent Case

Press Release: CREW SUES COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY OVER GLOBAL WARMING DOCUMENTS

DM&E expansion critics sue for railroad's financial information

San Francisco Chronicle

February 21, 2007

Judge rejects delay of phone wiretap suits; U.S. seeks dismissal in appeals court over national security

Bob Egelko, Chronicle Staff Writer

A federal judge rejected the Bush administration's request Tuesday to put wiretapping lawsuits against telephone companies on hold while the government asks an appeals court to dismiss the suits on national security grounds.

The ruling came from Chief U.S. District Judge Vaughn Walker of San Francisco, who is hearing more than 40 suits from around the nation accusing telecommunications companies of illegally collaborating with the government's electronic surveillance program.

Walker refused in July to dismiss the leading case, a suit accusing AT&T of sharing its telephone records and e-mail network with the National Security Agency. Walker rejected Bush administration arguments that allowing the case to proceed would expose vital secrets about the clandestine program and the company's alleged role in it.

The Justice Department has asked the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to overturn the ruling and dismiss all the lawsuits. While that appeal is pending, government lawyers argued, any further action in Walker's court would waste time and money and increase the risk of a security breach.

But Walker ordered the companies Tuesday to respond to the suits by March 29 unless plaintiffs in particular cases agreed to a delay.

The judge also said lawyers for AT&T customers could ask him for permission to question company officials and to seek evidence on limited issues. Attorney Kurt Opsahl of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, which represents the plaintiffs, said those topics could include the company's structure and operation of its networks.

Opsahl said plaintiffs' lawyers may also ask AT&T to present to Walker, in private, any evidence of government authorization that exists for its actions -- a subject that Justice Department lawyers have described as among the most sensitive in the case. Such secret submission of evidence, a procedure spelled out by federal law, would allow the judge to determine whether any surveillance in which the company participated was legal, Opsahl said.

Walker "is trying to advance the case while being very sensitive to national security concerns," Opsahl said.

An AT&T spokeswoman was unavailable for comment. The phone companies joined the administration's request to put the cases on hold.

In a separate order, Walker denied a request by The Chronicle and other news organizations to unseal some documents in the AT&T case. They include a statement by a former AT&T engineer, Mark Klein, about installation of equipment that allegedly would allow the government to screen customers' Internet messages, and a supporting declaration by J. Scott Marcus, a former Federal Communications Commission technology adviser.

AT&T says the documents contain trade secrets. Walker noted that the company released edited versions of the material last year, after negotiations with the plaintiffs, and said he may reconsider unsealing the rest of the documents if their content becomes critical to the outcome of the case.

Karl Olson, an attorney whose clients include The Chronicle, the Los Angeles Times, the Associated Press, the San Jose Mercury News, Bloomberg News and USA Today, said he was disappointed that Walker had deferred to AT&T's claim of trade secrets, which he described as flimsy. Among the information that remains sealed, Olson said, were the names of the city, San Francisco, and the street, Folsom, where the company's facility is located.

END

New York Times

February 21, 2007

Court Endorses Law's Curbs on Detainees

By STEPHEN LABATON

WASHINGTON, Feb. 20 — A divided federal appeals court on Tuesday upheld a new law stripping federal judges of authority to review foreign prisoners' challenges to their detention at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

The decision set the stage for a third trip to the Supreme Court for the detainees, who will once again ask the justices to consider a complex issue that tests the balance of power among the White House, Congress and the courts in the murky context of the fight against international terrorism.

It also prompted some senior Democratic lawmakers, who have fought the Bush administration on the matter before and who now hold sway in Congress, to vow enactment of a law more favorable to the prisoners.

The Supreme Court previously ruled twice that federal statutes empowered the courts to consider Guantánamo prisoners' habeas corpus petitions challenging the grounds for their detention. In response to those rulings, Congress twice rewrote law to limit the detainees' avenues of appeal. The most recent rewriting was at issue in Tuesday's 2-to-1 decision.

That law, the Military Commissions Act of 2006, was signed by President Bush last October. Its enactment followed the Supreme Court's rejection of his administration's earlier arguments that the right of habeas corpus — the fundamental right, centuries old, to ask a judge for release from unjust imprisonment — did not apply to foreigners being held outside the United States as enemy combatants.

The new law explicitly eliminated the federal courts' jurisdiction over habeas challenges by such prisoners. It instead set up military panels to review the justification of detention in individual cases, with limited right of appeal to the courts afterward.

In its ruling Tuesday, the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit found that the new law did not violate the constitutional provision that bars the government from suspending habeas corpus except in "cases of rebellion or invasion." Two of the three appeals court judges, citing Supreme Court and other historical precedent, held that the right of habeas corpus did not extend to foreign citizens detained outside the United States.

The majority decision was written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph, whose two earlier opinions on habeas corpus and Guantánamo prisoners had also favored the Bush administration. Those opinions were reversed by the Supreme Court, but on statutory grounds rather than constitutional ones.

The dissenting judge on Tuesday, Judith W. Rogers, said the new law did violate the constitutional provision restricting the suspension of habeas corpus.

Administration officials welcomed the decision as a vindication of its position on the rights of detainees, after years of its halting efforts to create a legal process that would withstand tests in court.

"The decision," said Erik Ablin, a Justice Department spokesman, "reaffirms the validity of the framework that Congress established in the Military Commissions Act permitting Guantánamo detainees to challenge their detention through combatant status review tribunals with the opportunity for judicial review before the D.C. Circuit."

Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said at his daily news briefing, "The court decided the position that we put forward." He declined to say more.

Lawyers representing the detainees vowed to seek a new review by the Supreme Court.

Shayana Kadidal, a lawyer at the Center for Constitutional Rights, which represents many of the detainees, said, "This decision empowers the president to do whatever he wishes to prisoners without any legal limitation as long as he does it offshore."

Mr. Kadidal said the ruling encouraged "a contempt for international human rights law" and "such notorious practices as extraordinary rendition": sending terrorism suspects abroad for interrogation, where, rights advocates say, they may face torture.

Democrats now in control of Congress said they would move quickly on legislation they recently introduced that would unambiguously give federal courts the right to consider detainees' habeas petitions.

"The Military Commissions Act is a dangerous and misguided law that undercuts our freedoms and assaults our Constitution by removing vital checks and balances designed to prevent government overreaching and lawlessness," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy, the Vermont Democrat who heads the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Last week Mr. Leahy joined a group of other Senate Democrats, including Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin and Robert Menendez of New Jersey, in introducing the legislation restoring habeas rights for the Guantánamo prisoners. Senator Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, the Judiciary Committee's ranking Republican, also endorsed that measure last week, and said Tuesday that he believed the dissent from the new appeals court decision would ultimately prevail in the Supreme Court.

But other Republican lawmakers, including Senators John Cornyn of Texas and Lindsey Graham of South Carolina, both of whom also serve on the committee, applauded the ruling.

The decision, Lakhdar Boumediene v. George W. Bush, involved a consolidation of the cases of 63 detainees, all from foreign countries, who had sought review in two federal district courts. One judge had ruled that she had the authority to consider the cases, while another had ruled that he did not, and granted the administration's motion to dismiss the inmates' habeas petitions.

Writing for the appeals court, Judge Randolph first turned to the statutory issue. He said arguments put forward by the detainees' lawyers that the new law was not meant to apply to the prisoners at Guantánamo Bay "are creative but not cogent." Congress, he said, clearly meant to keep the federal courts from considering the detainees' cases.

Turning to the question of whether Congress had acted within the Constitution, he said there had been no earlier cases in which a court had granted a habeas corpus petition for a foreign national held at an overseas military base. The Constitution, he said, "does not confer rights on aliens without property or presence within the United States."

The opinion was also signed by Judge David B. Sentelle.

In her dissent, Judge Rogers said: "Prior to the enactment of the Military Commissions Act, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the detainees held at Guantánamo had a statutory right to habeas corpus. The M.C.A. purports to withdraw that right but does so in a manner that offends the constitutional constraint on suspension."

END

AP
Feb 21, 1:23 AM EST

High Court to Hear Microsoft Patent Case

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Supreme Court is ready to hear from lawyers from Microsoft and AT&T as it considers a long-running patent dispute between the industry giants.

At issue when the lawyers make their oral arguments Wednesday is whether Microsoft can be held liable for violating an AT&T patent overseas. Generally, patents are valid only within a country's borders.

AT&T Inc. holds a patent on technology that converts speech into computer code, so the speech can be transmitted electronically. It accused Microsoft Corp. of infringing the patent by including similar capabilities in its Windows software. Microsoft acknowledged it violated the patent domestically but disputes that it is liable for infringement when the software is shipped overseas.

The case centers on a provision in patent law that bars companies from shipping parts of a patented invention overseas for assembly. The intent of the provision, when it became law in 1984, was to prevent companies from circumventing patents by sending parts offshore to assemble them in a way that would infringe the patent in the United States.

AT&T charges that Microsoft is liable under that provision for violating its patent when it ships its Windows software abroad to foreign computer manufacturers for copying and installation on computers.

Microsoft, however, has argued in court filings that it only sends a "master version" of the software abroad, either on optical disk or by electronic transfer, and it is the foreign manufacturer that is responsible for copying the software and placing it on computers. AT&T should pursue those companies for patent infringement under their countries' laws, Microsoft says.

AT&T, for its part, dismisses the distinction that Microsoft draws between the master version of the software and the copies made in foreign countries. The company argued in court filings that Microsoft supplied the software code "to foreign computer manufacturers, with the intent that those companies would pay Microsoft a royalty each time they combined that code with other components to form devices that would infringe AT&T's patent if made or used in the United States."

Solicitor General Paul Clement largely sided with Microsoft in his brief that had urged justices to take the case.

The section of patent law in question "generally prevents companies from manufacturing the components of a patented invention in the United States for assembly overseas," said Clement, the government's top Supreme Court lawyer. "But the statute permits the manufacture and assembly of identical components overseas - conduct that is properly the domain of other nations' patent laws."

Two lower federal courts ruled in favor of AT&T. The Supreme Court is expected to decide the case by July.

The case is Microsoft Corp. v. AT&T Corp., 05-1056.

END

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington

February 20, 2007

Press Release: CREW SUES COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY OVER GLOBAL WARMING DOCUMENTS

Washington, DC – Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) has sued the Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ) today for its failure to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request for records related to global warming science and policy. CREW filed its FOIA request after media reports -- including a 60 Minutes piece -- and documents gathered by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform revealed that political appointees at CEQ, including former Chief of Staff Philip Cooney, edited various government reports to downplay and obscure scientific findings about global warming.

On May 12, 2006, CREW sent a FOIA request to CEQ asking for all records in the agency's possession mentioning or relating to the causes associated with global warming or climate change.

In late October, 2006, CREW agreed to accept documents from CEQ on a rolling basis, along with an accounting of all documents redacted or withheld by CEQ. Since that time, the records CEQ has provided to CREW have consisted almost exclusively of publicly available documents. To date, CREW has not received any information from CEQ regarding the substance of any Bush administration global warming reports.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of CREW, said today, "Despite claiming that it would comply with the Freedom of Information Act, CEQ has instead kept potentially explosive documents hidden from public view, leaving CREW with no option other than to sue." Sloan continued, "Luckily for the American public, the Bush administration must abide by the law whether or not it is politically expedient."

END

AP

February 21, 2007

DM&E expansion critics sue for railroad's financial information

By FREDERIC J. FROMMER | Associated Press Writer

.WASHINGTON — The Rochester Coalition and the Mayo Clinic filed a lawsuit on Tuesday seeking the financial records of the Dakota, Minnesota and Eastern Railroad, which wants a $2.3 billion federal loan for its planned coal train project.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia asked a judge to direct the Department of Transportation's Federal Railroad Administration to release the material, which was sought last April in a Freedom of Information Act request.

According to the lawsuit, the law firm representing the coalition and clinic has not received the material, which includes financial information such as balance sheets, income statements, market capitalization, debt, feasibility and market studies related to DM&E.

The Rochester Coalition and Mayo oppose the train project because it would mean more trains running through the city and close to the clinic.

FRA spokesman Steve Kulm said the agency has not received the lawsuit so could not comment on it. But he did say that under federal law, federal agencies are prohibited from releasing trade secrets or privileged or confidential commercial or financial information obtained from a non-governmental entity.

"However, the law also directs that upon receipt of a FOIA request of this type, the entity submitting the materials to a federal agency must identify and justify information that it believes should not be publicly released," Kulm said in an e-mail response. "FRA is currently reviewing the justifications made by DM&E. FRA will make the final decision on what information will be released."

Stephen Ryan, legal counsel for the Rochester Coalition and Mayo Clinic, said in a statement that the FRA has permitted DM&E's "secretive behavior" for 10 months.

"It is time for our government to require some public disclosure if DM&E wants the public's money," he said.

Kevin Schieffer, DM&E's president, said he took exception to the "secretive" characterization.

"Obviously, we are not going to disclose information that competitors or opponents would use to undermine our business," he said. "Nobody would." But he insisted that the process has been open.

Last month, the FRA determined the DM&E's project had met the requirements of the federal environmental review process, triggering a 90-day period during which the FRA must approve or reject the loan.

The DM&E wants to add track to the Powder River Basin coal fields in Wyoming and upgrade its existing line in South Dakota and Minnesota. The $6 billion project would involve building about 280 miles of new track and upgrading 600 miles of existing track so trains could haul coal for power plants.

END

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Thursday, February 22, 2007 8:29 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Thursday, February 22, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070222.pdf; dojclips070222.doc

Thursday's Department of Justice News Clips is attached.

Website: You can also read today's briefing, including searchable archive of past editions, at http://www.BulletinNews.com/justice.

Full-text Links: Clicking the hypertext links in our write-ups will take you to the newspapers' original full-text articles.

Interactive Table of Contents: Clicking a page number on the table of contents page will take you directly to that story.

Contractual Obligations and Copyright: This copyrighted material is for the internal use of US Department of Justice employees only and, by contract, may not be redistributed without BulletinNews' express written consent.

Contact Information: Please contact us any time at 703-749-0040 or Justice-Editors@BulletinNews.com. Use of this email address will automatically result in your message being delivered to everyone involved with your service, including senior management. Thank you.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Two Chicago-area Men Arrested In Ohio Terrorism Case (ABJ) 5
Local Men Indicted In Terror Probe (CHIT) 5
2 Chicago Cousins Are Charged With Plotting Overseas Attacks (NYT) 7
Al-Arian Supporters Lobby For Release As Hunger Strike Continues (AP) 7
Judge Rules Terror Suspect Held Without Bond (AP) 8
American Said To Have Ties To Al Qaeda Is Denied Bail (NYT) 9
The Spanish Connection (WSJ) 10
Affirming Military Tribunals (WSJ) 12
American Liberty At The Precipice (NYT) 13
A War Under Law (WP) 14
Drop This Case (WP) 15

Homeland Response:

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Safe (AP) 15
AG Rates Supermax Up To Par (DENP) 16
Attorney General Tours Supermax (PUEBCHF) 17
Supermax Security Concerns Are Being Addressed, AG Says (RMN) 18
No Promises For Supermax Fence, Guards (COLOSG) 19
Supermax Tour (KXTU) 20
US Attorney General Addresses Supermax Security (KRDO) 20
Guard Union Calls 'new' Staffers Shell Game By Feds (PUEBCH) 21
Volunteer Group Lags In Replacing Gulf Houses (NYT) 22
Post-Katrina Baton Rouge Struggles With Its Identity (USAT) 24

War News:

Britain To Remove 1,600 Troops From Iraq By Spring (LAT) 26
Ally's Timing Is Awkward For Bush (WP) 28
Britain To Withdraw Troops In 'Coming Months' (USAT) 29
Democrats Seize On UK Troop Cuts (FT) 31
Rice Calls Iraq Coalition 'Intact' (WT) 31
Democrats Seize On British Iraq Withdrawal Plan (HILL) 33
Democrats Hail British Pullout (WT) 33
Britain Cuts Its Losses (NYT) 34
Lithuania Mulling Iraq Troop Withdrawal (AP) 35
Blair Plans To Withdraw 1,600 Troops From Iraq (WP) 35
Iran, Militias Could Gain From British Pullout (USAT) 36
Britain To Trim Iraq Force By 1,600 In Coming Months (NYT) 38
As US Surges, British Start Exiting Iraq (CSM) 39
The End Of The Alliance (NYT) 41
Cheney Slams Iraq Plan Advocated By Dems (AP) 42
Cheney Says Democrats Won't Be Able To Stop Surge (HILL) 43
A Lack Of Courage In Their Convictions (WP) 44
Cheney Visits An Australia Roiled By Guantánamo, Iraq (CSM) 45
Iraq Insurgents Use Chlorine In Bomb Attacks (NYT) 46
Another Chlorine Gas Bomb Attack In Iraq (LAT) 48
Three Die In Attack On Chlorine Truck (WP) 49
Chopper Shot Down; All Aboard Evacuated (WT/AP) 50
Iraq Insurgents Again Use 'Dirty' Attack (AP) 51
National Guard May Undertake Iraq Duty Early (NYT) 52
Military Tells Congress Of Equipment Shortfalls (POL) 53
A Retreat From Big Cities Hurts ROTC Recruiting (WSJ) 54
U.S. To Investigate Iraq Rape Case (USAT) 57
Maliki Fires Official For Criticizing Response To Rape Account (NYT) 57
Iraq Rape Charge Stirs Sectarian Storm (CSM) 59
Prodi Quits After Foreign Policy Defeat (FT) 61
Italy's Prime Minister Resigns After Foreign Policy Defeat (USAT) 61
Italy's Prime Minister Quits (LAT) 62
Italian Premier Resigns After Foreign Policy Loss (NYT) 63
How Prodi's Exit Stunts Italy (WSJ) 65

Prime Minister Quits On Afghanistan Vote (WT) 66
Italian Premier Quits After Narrow Defeat Over Foreign Policy (WP) 67
Crimes Of Politics (LAT) 67

DOJ:

Pelosi Seeks Tougher Oversight On Ethics (AP) 68
`Pink Rhinoceros' Not That Hard To See (CHIT) 69

Corporate Scandals:

Court Reverses Conviction Of Ex-Trading Specialist (LAW) 70
JUDGE: FEDS FAILED (NYPOST) 71
U.S. Judge Voids Guilty Verdict Of Big Board Specialist In G.E. (NYT/AP) 72
U.S. Won't Seek To Restore Fraud Conviction Of Ex-Westar Officials (BLOOM) 72
Software Firm To Pay $30 Million In AOL Case (WP) 73
EDITORIAL: Fannie's Pay (WSJ) 73

Criminal Law:

Libby's Fate Now Rests In The Hands Of The Jury (WP) 74
Jury Has CIA Leak Case To Decide Former Cheney Aide's Fate On Perjury, Obstruction Charges (AP) 75
Libby Perjury Hearing Casts Cloud Over Cheney (FT) 76
Jury In Libby Case Begins Deliberations (NYT) 77
Jurors Begin Deliberations In Libby Perjury Trial (USAT) 77
Politics Meets Intelligence At Trial (WSJ) 78
Scooter Libby And Reputation (WSJ) 79
Guard Sentenced In Prison Sex Scandal (AP) 81
Former DOD Civilian Guilty Of Taking Bribe (S&S) 81
Lessons Lurking In Fumo's '80 Case? (PHI) 82
'Bandido' Software Pirate Arraigned In U.S. On 2 Charges (INFOWEEK) 83
Cold Case: Keeping Snowmobilers Off Straight And Narrow (WSJ) 84
Probe Targeting Las Vegas Doctors And Lawyers Moves Forward (KLAS) 86
Financial Adviser Charged With Bilking Elderly Clients (BOS) 87
Customer Data Breach Began In 2005, TJX Says (WP) 87
The Trial Of The Sensory (LAT) 88
O'Malley Seeks End To Md. Executions (WP) 90

Civil Law:

High Court Says Concealment Of Assets Can Take Away Important Right In Bankruptcy (AP) 91
CRMC Settles Federal Fraud Case (MOULOBS) 92
Fighting Faith-based Spending In Court (LAT) 93
EDITORIAL Reining In Juries (LAT) 94

Civil Rights:

U.S. To Step Up Rights Enforcement (UPI) 94
Man Who Helped Scare Black Neighbors Sentenced To 27 Months (AP) 95
Rhode Island Steps Toward Recognizing Same-Sex Marriage (NYT) 96
Nativity Scene Is Too Religious For New York City Schools (CSM) 97
Death Of The Chief (WP) 98

Antitrust:

EMI Sounds Out Suitors After Move By Warner (FT) 99
EU Penalizes Elevator Makers With Its Largest Antitrust Fine (WSJ) 100
Brussels Imposes €992m Fine On Lift Cartel (FT) 100
Europeans Slap $1.3 Billion Price-fixing Fine On 5 Elevator Makers, Including Otis (USAT/AP) 101
EU Fines Otis, Four Other Elevator Makers For Cartel (Update6) (BLOOM) 102
Otis To Appeal Against EU Elevator Cartel Fine (AFP) 104
Patent Held By Genentech Is Revoked By Government (NYT) 104
EU Approves Lukoil Purchase Of ConocoPhillips Filling Stations (AFP) 105
Regulator Clears Japan Deal For Gallaher (AP) 105
EU Approves Japan Tobacco Takeover Of Gallaher (AFP) 106
Steel Mill Sale Order Questioned (AP) 106
Mittal Sorry About Ruling (BSUN) 107
House Plans Hearing With Sirius Exec (CNET) 108
Verizon, Vonage Rumble Over Patents (WSJ) 109
Apple, Cisco Reach Accord Over IPhone (WSJ) 110
Settlement Lets Apple Use 'iPhone' (NYT) 110
Analysts Say Apple Appears To Have Topped Cisco In IPhone Agreement (USAT) 111
Microsoft, AT&T Argue Software-Patent Case (WSJ) 112
Court Takes On Software Patents (WP) 113

Environment:

9 States Sue Over Mercury Emissions (AP) 114
That 'Drought' In Southwest May Be Normal, Report Says (NYT) 115
Report Warns Water Crisis Looming In Arid Southwest (USAT) 116
Key Water Source Is Affected By Global Warming, Report Finds (LAT) 116
In Far North, Peril And Promise (WP) 118

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

U.S. Is Sued Over Position On Marijuana (NYT) 120

DOJ_NMG_0134969

Group Sues U.S. Over Medical Marijuana Claims (AP).....120
Medical Pot Advocates Sue Feds Over False Info (SMCT) .121
Medical Pot ID Card Cost To Skyrocket (SMDJ).....122
Long-Term Marijuana Use May Impair Lung Function (HDN) 122
Federal Agents Crack Down On Web Pharmacies (NBC) ...123
Colombians Convicted On Drug Charges (WT).....124
NATION IN BRIEF (WP).....124

Immigration:

Senate Illegals Bill Near Complete (WT).....125
Along US-Mexico Border, Not Enough Hands For The Harvest (CSM).....126
2 Groups Compare Immigrant Detention Centers To Prisons (NYT).....128
Detention Facility For Immigrants Criticized (WP).....128
Report Criticizes Conditions At Immigrant Detention Centers (MCT).....130
High Profile Raids Leave Immigrants Across U.S. Living In Fear (AP).....131

Congress-Administration:

Bush Pushes Plan To Shift Costs Of Health Coverage (USAT).....133
In Chattanooga, Bush Touts Plan To Help Uninsured Get Health Coverage (AP).....133
Chattanooga Visit Goes Off Smoothly (CHA).....134
In Tennessee, Bush Talks Up Tax Breaks For The Uninsured (WP).....136
Bush, In Talk-Show Manner, Promotes His Health Plan (NYT).....137
Bush Pushes Health Care Plan In Tennessee (LAT).....138
Supporters Outnumber Protesters As Bush Arrives In Chattanooga (AP).....139
Protesters, Supporters Demonstrate Near Convention Center During President's Visit (CHA).....139
Democrats Blast Bush Health-care Proposal (MRKTWTCH)140
At Walter Reed, 'We're Going To Fix It' (WP).....141
Obama, McCaskill Sponsor Bill On Care For Veterans (HILL) 142
Lawmakers Seek Action On Walter Reed Problems (CQ) ...142
AARP To Push For Social Security Fix (POL).....143
Women Call For Change In Caucus (WP).....144
At Mock Briefing, Less Give-and-Take And More Sharing (WP).....145
Role Reversal: The White House Press Corps Faces Answers Questions From Tony Snow (POL).....147
For Norton And The City, The Wait May Be Over (WP).....149
Cheney At Odds With McCain Over Rumsfeld (AP).....150
Cheney Chastises McCain (POL).....151
Cheney Argues Rumsfeld Served Well (WP).....152
"Ghosts Of Abu Ghraib": Fearlessly Facing The Shame (WP)152
FEDERAL DIARY: Retiree Health Care Back On Hill Agenda (WP).....154

Other News:

Fresh Inflation Data To Keep Fed On Guard (WSJ).....155
Consumer Price Gauges Rise More Than Expected (NYT)156
Slowing Economy Isn't Cooling Prices (WP).....157
Inflation Fears Rise As Price Index Gains 0.2% (USAT).....158
Fed Remains Cautious On Inflation (FT).....159
Global Economy Shrugs Off Oil, Housing Strains (WSJ).....160
Stocks Brush Off Inflation Data, Crude's Rise (WSJ).....161
McCain Slams Bush On Global Warming, Iraq Policy (LAT)162
Schwarzenegger Lavishly Praises McCain (AP).....163
GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-cut Pledge (WT).....164
So You Want To Run ... (NYT).....165
Obama's Big Screen Test (NYT).....166
Obama, Clinton Rivalry Flares Over Donor (AP).....167
Obama Dismisses Clinton Campaign Complaint (DMR).....168
Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open (WP).....169
Clinton, Obama, Come Out Swinging (CHIT).....170
Barack, Hillary Trade Body Blows (NSDY).....172
An Insult From A Hollywood Money Man Sets Off A Democratic Feud (MCT).....172
In Both Parties, 2008 Politeness Falls To Infighting (NYT)...173
Clinton-Obama Fight Rattles Party Faithful (WSJ).....175
Gentle Jabs Turn To Punches For Clinton, Obama (LAT) ..176
Democratic Race Gets Rolling With Nevada Forum (USAT)177
Clinton In Attack On Obama Over Donation (FT).....178
Hillary, Obama Producing Their Own Hollywood Drama (WT).....179
Rivals At Democratic Presidential Forum Push Positions On Iraq War Into Spotlight (NYT).....181
Edwards Needles Clinton About Iraq Vote (AP).....182
Ex-Senate Leader Daschle Endorses Obama (AP).....183
No Way To Elect A President (WP).....183
Ex-lawmakers Find Work With Lobbyists (USAT).....184
Can Free Trade Be A Fair Deal? (WP).....185
EDITORIAL: Mortgage Insecurities (NYT).....186
Rigged Game In Richmond (WP).....187
Rice Urges Iran To Reconsider Defiance As Nuclear Deadline Passes (AFP).....187
Iran Risks Further Isolation, Says US (FT).....188

DOJ_NMG_0134970

U.S. Weighs Extra Steps On Iran (WSJ).....189
Iran's President Vows To Keep Enriching Uranium Despite Expiration Of U.N. Deadline To Stop (NYT) 190
A Dangerous Partnership (WSJ).....191
Splits Emerge Between U.S. And Europe Over Aid For Palestinians (NYT).....192
United Front On Unity Government (WP) 193
Quartet Plays Wait-and-see With Palestinian Government (AFP).....194
Russia And US Split Over Palestinian Unity Government (FT)195
Blair Hints UK May Deal With Hamas (FT) 195
Germany Urges Tamer Mideast Expectations (AP).....196
Arabs Say Israel Is Not Just For Jews (LAT).....197
In Israel, A Chasm Widens (WSJ).....198
US Lashes Out At Kremlin Over Missiles (FT) 200
Rice Slams Russian General Over Comments (AP) 200
U.S. Tries To Ease Concerns In Russia On Antimissile Plan (NYT) 201
Rice: Missile-defense Criticism 'Unfortunate' (WT) 202
N Korea To Reveal Extent Of Uranium Activity (FT) 203
North Korea Accuses U.S. Of Fabricating Lies (AP) 204
Why US Is Now Turning To Diplomacy (CSM) 205
Bush Administration Won't Change Approach To Cuba, Official Says (MCT) 206
Gutierrez Stands By U.S. Ban On Cuba (WT).....207
Cuba's Known For Cigars Now, But Oil Could Change That (USAT).....207
U.S. Urged To Reconsider Venezuela Ban (AP).....210
Paramilitary Scandal Takes Colombian Elite By Surprise (WP) 210
In China, Stern Treatment For Young Internet 'Addicts' (WP)212
Farm Tariff Cuts Won't Help Africa (WSJ) 214
Africa's Last Best Chance (WSJ).....215
Canada Cautions U.S. On Pending Passport Rule (WT).....216

Online Version
Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0134971

TERRORISM NEWS:

Two Chicago-area Men Arrested In Ohio Terrorism Case (ABJ)

By Mike Robinson

Akron Beacon Journal, February 22, 2007

CHICAGO - Two Chicago-area cousins were arrested Wednesday on federal charges out of Cleveland accusing them of conspiring to wage holy war against Americans overseas, including U.S. military forces in Iraq.

Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, of suburban North Chicago, and Khaleel Ahmed, 26, of Chicago, were accused along with three other men from the Toledo, Ohio, area who already had been under indictment on charges of plotting acts of terrorism against Americans overseas.

The fresh indictment returned by a grand jury in Cleveland added the two Chicago-area men to the roster of defendants and brought additional charges against the three men from Ohio.

The cousins, both American citizens, appeared briefly in Chicago before U.S. Magistrate Judge Geraldine Soat Brown, who ordered them sent to Ohio for arraignment. Prosecutors asked her to order them held in custody and sent to Ohio as federal prisoners. Defense attorneys asked for bond.

A hearing on whether to permit bond was set for 2:30 p.m. Monday.

Defense attorneys Gerald Collins and Brian Sieve said they had just met the two defendants, knew little about them and had no comment on the case.

The indictment claims that, between June 2004 and February 2006, the cousins and the other three men - Mohammad Zaki Amawi, 27, and Marwan Othman El-Hindi, 42, both formerly of Toledo, Ohio, and Wassim I. Mazloum, 22, formerly of Sylvania, Ohio - conspired to "kill or maim persons in locations outside of the United States, to including U.S. armed forces personnel serving in Iraq."

The conspiracy allegedly included finding fresh recruits to commit terrorist acts and seeking out sites for training in firearms, hand-to-hand combat and the use of explosives. The men also allegedly agreed to raise funds for "jihad training" and download Internet information on improvised explosive devices (IEDs).

A shadowy figure was described in the indictment only as the trainer, a U.S. citizen with a military background. The indictment said the two cousins met with the trainer in July 2004 and discussed sniper tactics, counter-surveillance techniques and the use of heavy machine guns.

The three Ohio men, currently in federal custody, were charged in the original indictment with conspiring to provide material support to terrorists. Amawi was also charged with verbally threatening the president of the United States and unlawful distribution of a video concerning suicide bomber vests.

Wednesday's indictment charged Amawi with distributing information about explosive chemicals downloaded from the Internet and charged El-Hindi with distributing information about explosives and making false statements to officials.

The five men face a maximum penalty of life in prison if convicted of conspiring to kill Americans overseas, according to federal prosecutors.

Meanwhile, prosecutors in Cleveland said a separate indictment was returned charging Bilal Mazloum, 22, of Sylvania, Ohio, brother of Wassim I. Mazloum, with making a false statement to federal agents.

In addition, El-Hindi and Ashraf Zaim, 39, of Ottawa Hills, Ohio, are charged in a separate, seven-count indictment with conspiring to commit theft of public funds, making false statements and wire fraud in connection with a $40,000 federal grant they obtained to operate clinics for low-income taxpayers.

The government contends that no clinics were ever operated.

Local Men Indicted In Terror Probe (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Tonya Maxwell, Tribune staff reporters

DOJ_NMG_0134972

Chicago Tribune, February 22, 2007

Federal agents swarmed a suburban apartment complex and a house on the Northwest Side early Wednesday, arresting two cousins allegedly linked to a terrorism conspiracy to kill Americans overseas, including U.S. troops.

Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, of North Chicago, and his cousin, Khaleel Ahmed, 26, of Chicago, have ties to three Toledo men charged in the conspiracy last year, authorities said. Federal prosecutors said the cousins had spoken to at least one of the three about receiving training and at one point were headed to Afghanistan or Iraq.

Zubair Ahmed allegedly wanted to learn to use a .50-caliber machine gun.

"Man, we've been waiting for this," he said, according to the indictment.

The Ahmeds were named in a superseding indictment returned by a federal grand jury in Ohio, joining the three Toledo men, whose indictment was announced by Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales in February 2006.

Mohammad Zaki Amawi, Marwan Othman El-Hindi and Wassim Mazloum have pleaded not guilty and are expected to go on trial in Cleveland in the spring. They were accused of gathering information on explosives and tactics, planning to send money and computers to the Middle East and recruiting others to attack American forces in Iraq.

Recruits were "to train for violent jihad against the United States and its allies in Iraq, and elsewhere, and would propose potential training sites for use in providing ongoing firearms, hand-to-hand combat, explosives, and other paramilitary training to prospective recruits," the indictment states.

Two of those who were recruited were the Ahmeds, according to court documents. They were allegedly brought into the conspiracy by El-Hindi, who has Chicago ties. The Tribune has reported that El-Hindi, who used to live in the suburbs, ran a travel agency in the Loop near the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse that opened in the late 1990s and closed a few years ago.

El-Hindi allegedly took the cousins from Chicago to Cleveland in 2004 to meet a man described in the document as "the Trainer," a man with military experience who was associated with the group.

"Zubair and Khaleel discussed sniper tactics with the Trainer and their desire to receive training in, among other things, firearms and counter surveillance techniques," the indictment states. It was El-Hindi who stopped the two from going overseas because he believed they needed more training, it states.

The document does not allege that the cousins actually received any substantive training.

Bill Edwards, first assistant U.S. attorney in the northern district of Ohio, said the men discussed sniper tactics and were willing to travel to carry out terror plots.

"We wouldn't have charged them if we didn't think they were serious," said Edwards.

A federal judge in Chicago ordered them transferred to Ohio during a brief hearing Wednesday.

Lawyers for the two men declined to comment.

FBI agents arrived at the family's one-story brick home about 5:15 a.m. Wednesday, said Khaleel Ahmed's father, who showed a reporter a warrant calling for the seizure of evidence of his son's Ohio trip, travel to Egypt and other evidence, including communication between him and co-conspirators in the case.

The agents left in the afternoon and gave the family a list of things that had been taken. It included computer hard drives, cell phones, Islamic books and a sword.

Khaleel Ahmed's parents, who did not want to be identified, said they did not believe the charges.

"As far as my family knows, he didn't do anything. He is not a terrorist," said his mother. "It's a sin to kill anyone."

She said she has never heard her son, who had been studying computer engineering at several local colleges, express anger toward Americans or the war. He wasn't interested in politics, she said.

Khaleel's mother said the cousins did go to Egypt for several weeks in 2004 for vacation but said she has no knowledge of her son's going to Ohio.

In North Chicago, a man who answered the door at Zubair Ahmed's apartment identified himself as his roommate but declined to give his name. He said that the two met online in recent months when each was looking for a roommate. Before Wednesday he "hadn't seen [Ahmed] in two or three weeks," the man said. "We barely talked."

He said he thought Ahmed was a student at a nearby college or university but he wasn't sure which.

Neighbors said they woke to FBI agents' banging on the door of Ahmed's third-floor apartment.

"I woke up, and they were knocking so hard on his door that it sounded like they were hitting our door," said Tim Johnson, 24, whose apartment is diagonally across the hall from Ahmed's.

"Finally when they opened the door, [the agents] shouted 'Freeze, don't move,'" said Johnson's roommate Bobby Watson, 21.

Tribune staff reporter Andrew L. Wang contributed to this report.

2 Chicago Cousins Are Charged With Plotting Overseas Attacks (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, February 22, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 21 — Two cousins were arrested here Wednesday on charges of conspiring to commit terrorist acts against American military personnel in Iraq, as well as others abroad, in an Islamic holy war against the United States and its allies.

The defendants, Zubair A. Ahmed, 27, and Khaleel Ahmed, 26, were taken into custody at their Chicago homes after a federal grand jury in Cleveland returned a fresh indictment in a pending terrorism case in which three Ohio men are already awaiting trial in Toledo.

The new indictment accuses the two Chicago men of plotting with the Ohioans "to kill or maim persons in locations outside of the United States," including members of the armed forces serving in Iraq.

It says the cousins, both United States citizens, sought training in firearms and countersurveillance from a person with an American military background. The indictment identified that person only as the Trainer. It describes the Trainer as an American citizen who communicated extensively with the three original defendants about paramilitary training but who was not engaged in the conspiracy.

The original defendants are Mohammad Zaki Amawi, 27, and Marwan Othman el-Hindi, 42, both formerly of Toledo, and Wassim I. Mazloum 24, formerly of Sylvania, Ohio, a Toledo suburb. They have been in federal custody a year, having been charged last February with conspiracy to commit terrorist acts overseas and with providing material support to terrorists.

Mr. Amawi was also charged then with making threats against President Bush and with distributing a video depicting the construction and use of a suicide bomb vest. Wednesday's indictment included new charges against him and Mr. Hindi involving further counts of distributing information regarding the manufacture and use of explosives.

In addition, a second new indictment charged Mr. Hindi and Ashraf Zaim, 39, of Ottawa Hills, another town in the Toledo area, with defrauding the government by claiming to have used $40,000 in federal grant money for charitable purposes when in fact, the government said, it actually went to their personal use.

And yet another indictment charged Bilal Mazloum, 22, of Sylvania with making false statements to federal agents by denying knowledge that his brother Wassim had participated in firearms training.

Al-Arian Supporters Lobby For Release As Hunger Strike Continues (AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

Supporters of former professor Sami al-Arian - now in the fifth week of a prison hunger strike as he refuses to testify in front of a federal grand jury - on Wednesday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to deport al-Arian prior to his scheduled release from prison.

Al-Arian, a former computer science professor at the University of South Florida, was accused by prosecutors of being a leader of a terrorist group called Palestinian Islamic Jihad. He is being held at a medical prison in North Carolina.

After a six-month trial ended in an acquittal on some counts and a hung jury on others, al-Arian struck a plea bargain in May 2006 and admitted to conspiring to aid Palestinian Islamic Jihad, specifically by helping a family member with links to the group obtain immigration benefits and by lying to a reporter about another individual's ties to the group.

Al-Arian would be up for release in April, but his prison term is being extended indefinitely after a judge found him in civil contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury in Alexandria, Va., investigating a cluster of Islamic charities in northern Virginia that has ties to al-Arian.

DOJ_NMG_0134974

Al-Arian believes his plea deal specifically exempted him from cooperating with authorities. But two federal judges have ruled that al-Arian must testify.

Al-Arian began his hunger strike Jan. 22 to protest of the subpoena and contempt citation. His family says he has been drinking only four glasses of water a day. Last week he fainted and hit his head. He has since been transferred to a medical prison in Butner, N.C.

Al-Arian's lawyer, Peter Erlinder, said it is only fair that Gonzales release al-Arian now because prosecutors initially recommended to the judge that al-Arian receive time served when he struck the May 2006 plea deal. A judge rejected that recommendation and sentenced al-Arian to an additional 11 months.

"Mr. Gonzales, you have the power ... to release Dr. al-Arian for voluntary departure from the U.S. with the stroke of your pen," Erlinder said in an open letter to Gonzales.

Erlinder was joined at a press conference outside the Justice Department by representatives of the Muslim American Society, the American Muslim Alliance and the ANSWER Coalition, an anti-war group.

Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the attorney general does not have the power to unilaterally free al-Arian. Deportations are handled by the Department of Homeland Security rather than the Justice Department.

Typically, immigration officials deport an individual only after they have served their entire sentence. Erlinder said there is precedent for deporting an individual before their prison time is up.

Judge Rules Terror Suspect Held Without Bond (AP)

By By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press

AP, February 22, 2007

A U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government will remain behind bars until his trial, a federal judge ruled Wednesday.

Daniel Joseph Maldonado was ordered held without bond. U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley also found federal authorities were justified in arresting Maldonado on charges related to his alleged training at an al-Qaeda camp in Somalia.

"These activities, in the court's judgment constitute crimes of violence," Botley said. "Mr. Maldonado is a danger and a flight risk."

During a two-day probable cause and detention hearing, FBI agents and prosecutors painted a portrait of a violent young man who willingly trained alongside al-Qaeda operatives to learn firearms and bombmaking skills. He was also accused of working to turn Somalia into another Iraq where insurgents would come in and terrorize the country and of recruiting others for this cause.

But defense attorneys described Maldonado as a man who, driven by anti-Muslim sentiment in America since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, moved out of the country with his family so they could live at ease as Muslims.

Botley said while the evidence showed Maldonado received weapons and bomb making training, it wasn't clear if al-Qaeda was in charge of the camp.

Maldonado faces charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a weapon of mass destruction, specifically a bomb. If convicted, he faces up to life in prison.

Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, is accused of traveling in November to an al-Qaeda terrorist camp in Somalia, where he was trained to use firearms and explosives in an effort to help another group, the Islamic Courts Union, topple the government and install an Islamic state. He was captured by the Kenyan military while trying to flee Somalia on Jan. 21.

Maldonado grew up in Pelham, N.H., and lived in Houston from August 2005 to November 2005 before moving with his wife and three children to Cairo, Egypt.

In a statement he gave to FBI agents in Kenya after his arrest, Maldonado said while living in Egypt he heard about an emerging Islamic state in Somalia and decided to move there with his family.

"I did intend to open up a bookstore to generate some money," Maldonado said in the statement, parts of which were read in court Wednesday by defense attorney Brent Newton.

DOJ_NMG_0134975

But prosecutor Abe Martinez said Maldonado lied in his initial statements to FBI agents, later saying he forgot to mention he also went to Somalia to fight a jihad or holy war against the government there.

Newton said Maldonado didn't seek out al-Qaeda members and eventually changed his mind about fighting a jihad.

"I was never sure in my heart whether it was worth my life or not," Maldonado said in his statements to FBI agents. "I was asked to join jihad but I was worried about my family."

After he and his family tried to leave Somalia and go to Kenya, Maldonado became separated from his wife and kids. She later died of malaria. His children are being cared for by his parents in New Hampshire.

Maldonado had earlier contracted malaria, which stopped his training. He also became malnourished, losing 60 pounds while in Somalia.

Martinez said Maldonado also tried to recruit a friend in the United States to join him at the camp in Somalia, telling his friend in coded language that he was at a culinary institute.

"But what that really meant is he was at a terror training camp learning how to kill people," Martinez said.

